THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER deprecated the strong language used by the hon. Member. When high duties were imposed upon leases and agreements which could not be levied, that appeared to the hon. Member to be a satisfactory state of things. The matter had been discussed on the previous evening, and decided by a majority of the House. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), it was true that in certain cases the effect of the Bill would not be to reduce the duty upon letting houses where the rent was under £20, but there was no reason why, when the duty was moderate, there should be no means of levying it. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) he could only say that he did not see how if the stamp was cancelled the other party could be liable to the penalty. As to sending letters by post he thought ninety-nine out of every one hundred were sent by post, and to omit that requirement would be to nullify the clause.

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed that as the defacement of the adhesive stamp was for the protection of the revenue, its cancellation by more than one person was unnecessary.

MR. HENNESSY repeated his objection that, as the adhesive stamp was to be defaced by both parties to the agreement, if one omitted to write his name upon the stamp not only both parties but all who were concerned in the preparation of the agreement would be liable to a penalty.

MR. AYRTON said, that the general form of penal clauses was to impose the penalty upon persons who violated the law; but this clause said that unless a certain thing was done every person who signed the document, or was concerned in preparing it, should be liable to a penalty. That was not the mode in which the House had been accustomed to legislate, and he hoped that it would not now adopt such a system.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not wish to punish any one except on his own default. He would, therefore, not ask the House to read the Bill a third time that night, but would consider this matter.

House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

EAST INDIA (COVENANTED SERVICE).

PAPER MOVED FOR.

MR. VANSITTART moved for an Address to the Crown for copies of the Report of a Special Committee of the Council of India to the Secretary of State upon the subject of opening, upon certain conditions, the Covenanted Service of India; with dissents, if any, therefrom. The hon. Member said the answer given the previous evening by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India was most unsatisfactory, and unless he could obtain a response of a more assuring character he should be reluctantly compelled to divide the House. The right hon. Baronet had not offered any opposition to the production of papers relating to two of the Bills, and the information he now sought had reference to the third, which was regarded out of doors as the most important of these measures.

SIR CHARLES WOOD felt it his duty to resist the Motion, which he hoped would not be pressed by the hon. Member, who had always acted in a spirit of perfect fairness and candour. The papers which he had formerly produced were despatches from the Governor General and the Governor of Madras; but those now asked for were Reports of the Council to the Secretary of State for India, which partook of a confidential character.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR supported the Motion, thinking it most important that the House should have before it every paper bearing on that subject.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he opposed the Motion, as the House was not entitled by the Act to have the dissents of a Committee of the Council laid before it.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD regarded the production of the papers as essential for the guidance of the House in forming its opinion on the Bill for regulating the Indian Civil Service.

MR. AYRTON did not think it was usual or proper to seek to compel the Secretary of State to give those papers.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought the House was bound to insist on their production.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Report of a Special Committee of the Council of India to the Secretary of State, upon the subject of opening, upon certain conditions, the Covenanted Service of India; with dissents, if any, therefrom."

The House divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 43: Majority 15.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Monday, June 10, 1861.*MINUTES.] Took the Oath.—The Lord Clanwilliam.PUBLIC BILL.—1<sup>a</sup> Volunteers Tolls Exemption.

RIBBONISM (IRELAND)—CHIEF JUSTICE MONAHAN.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM presented a Petition of Farmers and Inhabitants of the Barony of Kilmacrenan County, Donegal, praying for the Suppression of Ribbonism. The noble Earl, in presenting the petition said, that the state of things in Donegal was owing, in great measure, to the course pursued by the authorities; and if, among the rest, Judges acted as political partisans, he apprehended that there was very little anticipation of peace in any country. Chief Justice Monahan, in his address to the grand jury of the county, congratulated them on the lightness of the calendar; and said, he did this the more gladly inasmuch as from the officers of the county he had reason to believe that no crime had been committed there for a considerable period where the party had not been made amenable to justice; so that, he added, the lightness of the calendar was not attributable to any difficulty experienced in procuring evidence. He stated, also, that this was matter of satisfaction, because he had often had reason to remark, as he did then with truth and sincerity, that the quietness of the country had mainly resulted from the vigilance, activity, and conduct of the magistrates of the country. By this Chief Justice Monahan referred not to the country gentlemen, but to the police magistrates. This speech, rather than a charge, was utterly untrue, for it was notorious that much crime of a serious character had been committed in Donegal, which had never been punished, and that the whole machinery of government in that district was most defective. He hoped, in conclusion, that Her Majesty's Government would take the state of this district into consideration, as there was no doubt the whole machinery of law and police was defective.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR:—I feel it my duty to ask the noble Earl whether he has given notice to Lord Chief Justice Monahan that these complaints were to be brought against him in the House of Lords?

THE EARL OF LEITRIM:—No.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Then I must say that the noble Earl has behaved most improperly. The Judges of the land acted under responsibility; and any misconduct of which they may be guilty may be inquired into, and animadverted upon by either House of Parliament. But to bring forward such a complaint as we have just heard from the noble Earl without any notice to the high officer complained of is, I must say, most unjust and most unconstitutional. I can only express my hope that as Lord Chief Justice Monahan is one of the most honest and upright, as well as learned Judges that ever adorned the bench, he may long continue to do so, and that he will be so considered to the end of his career.

Afterwards—

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, in consequence of the challenge which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had thrown out to him in respect of the comments he had felt it his duty to make on the charge of Chief Justice Monahan, he would give the noble and learned Lord full and ample opportunity to give any explanations which the Chief Justice might wish to make; and for this purpose he gave notice that he would move for papers on the case on Thursday next.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl proposes to discuss the charges he has to bring against Chief Justice Monahan, who is now discharging his duties in Ireland, on Thursday next. The noble Earl must see that it is impossible that I can communicate with the Chief Justice, and that the learned Judge can forward his explanations by that day.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE wished to put it to his noble Friend that the time he proposed was scarcely sufficient to allow explanations to be forwarded. The noble Lord on the Woolsack was the natural guardian of the honour and character of the Judges in this House, and it was reasonable that he should have time to obtain from Chief Justice Monahan his answer to the charges that were brought against him. He suggested that the noble Earl should postpone his Motion till Thursday week.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM would be happy to fix any day that would be more convenient. All he desired was to check a gross abuse. He would bring forward the subject on Thursday week.

INDIAN PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

LORD BERNERS asked the noble Earl (Earl De Grey and Ripon), If there was any objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence that has taken place between the Indian Government and the prize agents on the subject of interest due on the Delhi Prize Money? He understood there had been some misapprehension as to the speech of the Secretary of State for India in the other House, who was reported to have said that interest would not be allowed on the prize money.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, there was no correspondence to be laid before the House on the subject; but it appeared there was some misconception either as to the Question put to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India, in the other House, or as to the answer given by him. He was represented to have said that interest would not be paid on the prize money in the Indian Treasury. The fact was that interest at the rate of 5 per cent would be paid on all the money taken, but of course interest would not be paid on the value of the jewels.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, who was almost wholly inaudible said, the Bill had been greatly altered, and as he considered greatly deteriorated in the Select Committee; but he should bow to the decision of the Committee, and should not propose the rejection of the alterations that had been made.

LORD CHELMSFORD: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, in presenting the result of the labours of the Select Committee stated, that great alterations have been made in the Bill, but that he doubted whether they ought to be called Amendments. He also expressed a fear that some of the alterations, if allowed to remain, would prevent the efficient working of the measure. I confess that it appears to me that the Bill has come out of the Select Committee very considerably improved. Of this, my Lords, I am certain, that there was not a single Member of the Committee who did not evince the most sincere and earnest desire to make the Bill as useful as it possibly can be made. We may have differed with regard to our views, but there was only one object I am certain which animated the minds of every Member of the Committee, which was to render the Bill as complete and satisfactory as possible. Nobody can appreciate the great difficulties which attend the framing of a Bill which would be satisfactory to all parties upon this important subject, but those who have paid very considerable attention to the matter. The commercial community may be said to be divided into two distinct classes, advocating completely opposite opinions with regard to the mode in which the administration of bankrupt's estates should take place. My noble and learned Friend the other evening presented a petition praying that your Lordships would pass the Bill exactly as it came out of the House of Commons. Now, undoubtedly, the petitioners could not have been very well informed with regard to the character of the Bill, because there were very great inaccuracies in it as it came up to your Lordships' House, and there were parts which it was impossible should work. On the other hand, I have this evening presented an important petition, in which the principal merchants of Manchester state that the alterations which have been made in the Bill by the Select Committee have their entire approval, and they pray your Lordships to agree to those Amendments. Your Lordships have probably read some printed papers which have been circulated by the Mercantile Law Amendment Society, in which they deplore the striking out of the Chief Judge, which they say was the most popular and the most useful feature of the Bill. In the very petition to which I have referred your Lordships will find that the Manchester merchants take a very different view of the matter, and think that the Chief Judge was a useless and unnecessary expense. Now, the difficulty is to reconcile the conflicting views of parties on this important subject. If you were to take your stand upon one ground, and to view the Bill only in that direction, you would find powerful arguments, indeed, in favour of that side; whereas if you take the opposite ground, and look on the case from that only, you would find equally strong arguments in favour of the other view of the question. But on the present occasion I am not calling on your Lordships to decide between the conflicting opinions of the commercial community; I am anxious to call your Lordships' attention to a point in which, as it appears to me, there is a very considerable blot upon the face of the Bill, because it seems to violate one of the first principles of legislation by making the law—the new law which is introduced by the Bill—retrospective in its operation. I tried to persuade the Select Committee to introduce the clause which I am now about to propose to your Lordships. I was defeated by a very slender majority; but I, like my noble and learned Friend, should have bowed to the decision of the Committee if I had not felt that this was a matter of vital importance; that it was a violation of the universal principle of legislation; that it would create the greatest possible injustice if the Bill were allowed to come into operation as proposed. I will explain the matter to your Lordships as shortly and as plainly as I can. Under this Bill, for the first time, non-traders are made liable to the bankrupt laws. Down to this time no person can be made a bankrupt unless he carries on business in buying and selling. But that distinction is now proposed to be entirely abolished by this Bill, and non-traders are, for the first time, to be made subject to the bankrupt laws. Now, my Lords, there are many persons whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect, who doubt the policy and expediency of this change of the law, and who think that it may be attended with mischievous consequences. When these objections were urged to the proposal on a former occasion my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor met us by reference to the example of Scotland, where he said the distinction of trader and non-trader does not exist, but where all persons, whatever, are subject to the operation of the law. But, my Lords, with very great submission, it appears to me to be a very different thing where persons are born under a particular system of law, and where, of course, they will accommodate their habits and opinions and feelings to that law; and, on the other hand, where for the first time a new law is introduced which unsettles previous habits and ideas, and introduces a different relation between the important classes of debtor and creditor as this Bill does. I have no doubt that the Roman who lived under the law of the “Twelve Tables” thought it an exceedingly good system of law, and if he were a creditor probably even thought the law De debitore in partes secundo very humane, which gave him a dividend of the insolvent debtor’s body instead of a dividend of his estate; but it would certainly startle your Lord-

ships, as it probably startled the Romans to have such a law suddenly introduced into their code. I have no objection myself—none whatever—to this blending of the system of insolvency and bankruptcy. I describe it in that manner, because I think it is a mistake to say that you can abolish the distinction between a trader and a non-trader. You cannot do it. The distinction between the two is so broad—the two classes are so totally different—there are so many circumstances which distinguish one class from the other—that it is a better description of the Bill to say it is one for blending the two systems of bankruptcy and insolvency. Although I quite agree that it is desirable that this distinction between the two classes of debtors should no longer exist, yet I think all of your Lordships will be of opinion that it is necessary, in changing the law in this striking manner, that you should guard in every possible way against any inconvenience and any injustice that may result. It would be quite fair to say to the non-trader, “if you incur debts for the future, they shall be accompanied by such and such consequences;” but it appears to me to be most unjust to say that existing debts and liabilities shall have consequences attaching to them which made no part of the contract into which the parties entered, and were never in their contemplation, and that they should render the debtor liable to punishment for that which was not previously any crime. My noble and learned Friend seems to doubt whether this is the case. If he will allow me to give an instance I will at once satisfy him upon the subject. There is a clause in the Bill by which the Court of Bankruptcy is empowered, if a person has contracted debts without any reasonable expectation of paying them, to commit him to prison for a year. Now, my Lords, I dare say at the present moment there are many young, and, perhaps, some old gentlemen, who have contracted such debts, who certainly are morally guilty of a very serious offence, but are not legally punishable for it as a crime. It is right that they should be punished for this hereafter; but it seems to me to be manifestly wrong, and contrary to every sound principle, that you should make them liable to punishment for that which was not an offence when the debt was contracted. This is the evil, the injustice of an ex post facto law, which is the most vicious species of legislation. It is a remarkable thing, and I beg your Lordships' particular attention to this part of my observations, that the Government yielded to this principle, recognized it as the proper one to be introduced into this Bill as it was originally framed; for when the Bill was introduced into the House of Commons it contained a clause of precisely the same description as that which I am now asking your Lordships to adopt. I am not using this as an argumentum ad hominem. I do not say to the Government, "you cannot after that course object to the re-introduction of this clause," but I think I am entitled to say, "We are told that this Bill occupied the care and attention of the Government for several months before its introduction into Parliament; and it appears that after a most careful consideration the Government deliberately and advisedly determined that it was just and proper there should be a clause protecting non-traders against any retrospective liability to punishment or disability. Your Lordships may be curious to know how it happened that this clause no longer formed part of the Bill when it came up to your Lordships' House. The truth is, that there is in the other House, as there is in your Lordships' House, a period of the evening in which the House falls into what one may describe as a syncope, which, as we all know, is attended with a suspension of the action of the brain. In this House the attack generally terminates fatally. But, in the other, after a period longer or shorter of suspended animation, the House is restored to all its powers and its functions, and proceeds in the vital and active discharge of its duties. In this unconscious interval, if I may so call it, not the Government, but an hon. and learned Friend of mine (Mr. Malins), moved, to the surprise of every one, the rejection of this clause. Whether my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had partaken of the general insensibility, or whether he had exhausted himself in defending the other clauses, I cannot tell; but so it was, that my hon. and learned Friend said, "Gentlemen, you may do just as you like." A short and languid discussion took place of twenty minutes' duration; the House had not energy enough for a division; the Attorney General threw away his sword, and the clause was surrendered at discretion. Under these circumstances I should have thought that the Government would have been glad to have supported me in the re-introduction of this clause, in restoring the Bill to the state in which it was when it came out of their hands, inasmuch as the clause was not struck out after the usual mature consideration. Had there been a debate in the House of Commons on the subject, followed by a division, and had the clause been then rejected by a large majority, the Government might very well have said, "Our original opinion was that the clause was right; but inasmuch as the House decided differently, we bow to the decision." But such is not the case; and I do sincerely hope that the noble Earl on the other side will consider that I am only assisting in the views of the Government when I seek to restore this clause to the Bill. I need not enter into the subject of the vicious character of all retrospective laws, nor need I show you instances in which homage has been paid to the great principle of making the laws prospective only. You may take up the statute book and go from one end to the other, and you will find there no instance of retrospective legislation, except—and I wish the distinction to be marked—except cases in which relief has been given, but in no case in which persons have been subjected to civil liabilities, much less to punishment. I will just mention one case in which I think in the strongest possible manner the Legislature showed its objection to retrospective laws. An Act had been passed forbidding printers to advertise foreign lotteries under a penalty of £50, payable to any person who chose to lay an information. A great number of persons printers, in ignorance of the law—which the law, however, says is no excuse—had printed a number of these advertisements, and the consequence was that they were pounced upon by a set of informers, and an immense number of informations for penalties were prosecuted against them. The mischief was felt to be so great that the Legislature thought it right to interfere, inasmuch as the printing of the advertisements had taken place inadvertently; and, therefore, a Bill was brought in by which the parties were relieved from the actions then pending, but they were relieved only on payment of all the costs up to that time. In every case in which a common informer had obtained judgment the Bill did not operate, but his rights were protected by an express provision. This is a striking proof of the great reluctance of the Legislature to inroduce any retrospective law; and if I were to search the statute book I do not think I could furnish a stronger illustration of my position. I trust I have now satisfied your Lordships that it is proper to reintroduce the clause providing that the non-trader portion of the Bill should not have a retrospective operation. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving an Amendment, to insert the following clause:—

“The Debt of the Petitioning Creditor of any Debtor not being a Trader must be a Debt contracted after the passing of this Act; and the Judgment Debtor Summons must be a Summons in respect of a Debt contracted or a Liability incurred after the passing of this Act.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that although he did not join in the warm eulogium pronounced by his noble and learned Friend on the performances of the Select Committee, he did not dispute that they had been actuated by the most laudable motives in what they had done, as well as in what they had undone. But he must repeat his opinion that what they called amendments were in some cases rather alterations, and even deteriorations. His noble and learned Friend comforted himself very much by a petition that he had presented to their Lordships that evening. If the noble and learned Lord had been in the House at an earlier hour he would have seen petitions presented in a different sense. For himself, he could declare most solemnly that he had had representations made to him, not only from the society which had been referred to, but from various other quarters and from mercantile bodies of the greatest importance, lamenting the alterations made in the measure by the Committee, and especially lamenting the rejection of the provisions relating to the Chief Judge. That was, in fact, a most important part of the Bill, which in the House of Commons never met with the slightest opposition, which was universally approved by both sides of the House, and which was hailed with satisfaction by almost all who were connected with the administration of the law of bankruptcy. He did not now call on their Lordships to resist what had been done on that subject by the Select Committee; but he believed that without the Chief Judge the Bill would not work or produce the good effects which were anticipated from it. An unexpected attack had been made on that part of the Bill in the Committee, for no notice was given, either publicly or privately, that such an Amendment would be moved; and a noble Friend who sat near him, as well as other members of the Committee, were absent in the discharge of a public duty when the Motion was made. He could take upon himself to say that no answer whatever was given to the arguments which had been adduced to show the indispensable necessity for the appointment of the Chief Judge. It was supposed that his duties would be the same as were now performed by the Lords Justices of Appeal in the Court of Chancery. But that was not so. The Chief Judge in Bankruptcy was to have most important functions. He was to hear appeals from all the County Court Judges, as well as from the District Bankruptcy Judges; and now, when non-traders as well as traders were to be included in the Bill, the business of appeal would be so much accumulated that it would be utterly impossible for the Lords Justices in the Court of Chancery to answer the expectations which had been formed of them. He had no doubt the result would be such that the noble Earl opposite would regret that he had acquiesced in the alteration. For himself, he had no difficulty in expressing his belief, his hope, his expectation, that in “another place” the clause as it originally stood would be restored. He had no Amendment to offer on the subject; but he trusted a remedy would be found elsewhere, and that afterwards their Lordships would agree to that Amendment, so that the Bill might answer the expectations of the country. With regard to the Amendment moved by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford), he must acknowledge that it would be by no means fatal to the Bill. It would only delay its operation in a few cases. His noble and learned Friend had given a description of what had taken place in the House of Commons on Mr. Malins’s Motion, which was certainly more humorous than correct. Mr. Malins made a solemn Motion; he gave his reasons at considerable length; there was no division, because there was no difference of opinion. But his noble and learned Friend should have gone on to tell their Lordships what took place afterwards; for when the state of syncope was over, when the House was in full vigour, when its benches were crowded and the intelligence of all was awake, that distinguished ornament of the House, Sir Hugh Cairns, made a Motion, the substance of which was to reverse that vote. There was a debate on it;

the subject was canvassed on both sides, the House divided, and there was a majority of twenty-five—a majority beyond its teens—against him. He, therefore, trusted their Lordships would follow the example of the Select Committee, where the subject was debated, when a division took place and it was carried by a majority of two to leave the Bill in that respect as it now stood. He must say he agreed most heartily with what his noble and learned Friend said against retrospective legislation; but he denied that this could fairly be considered a retrospective law. The object was not to punish debtors, but to provide that they should cede their property for division among their creditors. There was nothing in the Bill which would subject a debtor to punishment for anything hitherto done; it was only in respect of what might be done hereafter that an adjudication of bankruptcy could take place. It was the going abroad with the intent to delay creditors—it was the staying abroad with the intent to defraud creditors—it was the making a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of property with the same intent—it was only where these acts were done after the Bill had received the Royal Assent that the debtor committing them could be made a bankrupt. He maintained this was prospective, not retrospective legislation. It was necessary and, he believed, would be salutary. His noble and learned Friend had talked of petitions; there ought certainly to be petitions from Boulogne and Calais in favour of his Amendment; for he believed both would be very much unpeopled if he did not succeed in it. He trusted their Lordships would agree with the House of Commons and the Select Committee, and negative the Motion of his noble and learned Friend.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he should hardly have troubled their Lordships on this subject, but for the pointed reference made to him by the noble and learned Lord. The noble and learned Lord appeared to be exceedingly shocked or distressed at the striking out of the clause with respect to the Chief Judge. For that alteration neither he nor any noble Lord on his side of the House was responsible; but it was introduced on the authority of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth) who was sitting just behind his noble and learned Friend. The clause was struck out after full and careful discussion, because it was thought that the motives alleged for the appointment of a Chief Judge —namely, that he would promote regularity and uniformity of decision—would not have any real effect, because the original jurisdiction of the Chief Judge would be comparatively very small. The original jurisdiction in bankruptcy would be divided amongst a larger number of persons by this Bill than it was at present, and, therefore, the Committee could not see how a greater uniformity could be obtained than now, the appeals being at present to the Lords Justices instead of to a Chief Judge. Further, the Select Committee thought that the appointment of a Chief Judge was a great and an entirely unnecessary expense, and that it would very largely increase the expenses attending bankruptcy proceedings. If the Bill had not been altered in this, or some similar respects, the public would soon have found that the bankruptcy law would have been much more expensive and complicated under this Bill than it now was. When the clause relating to the Chief Judge was struck out, he could only say there were seventeen Members present, and he believed the only Member who, although ordinarily regular in his attendance, happened not to be in the room at the time was the Lord President of the Council.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: And Lord Stanley of Alderley.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Then there were only sixteen Members present; but the subject was fully discussed, and when the Lord Chancellor put the Question, “that this clause stand part of the Bill,” there was not a single Peer who raised his voice in favour of it.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: I did.

EARL SPENCER: I also said “Content.”

THE EARL OF DERBY was not aware of the fact. He thought there was not a single voice which said “Content,” but undoubtedly there was no Member of the Committee who ventured to say “The Contents have it.” When the retrospective operation of the Bill was discussed there were eighteen Members present, of whom ten voted against doing away with the retrospective operation, and eight in favour of the Amendment to that effect. The Committee consisted of twenty-one Members. Lord Lyndhurst unfortunately was unable to give his attendance, and the other two Members who happened to be absent on the occasion in question entertained strong opinions as to the impropriety of the retrospective clause. Therefore, the Committee might be said to have been equally divided, and, consequently, his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) thought it right to submit the question to their Lordships. He was glad to hear the Lord Chancellor say that he disapproved retrospective legislation; but the statement of the noble and learned Lord that there was nothing either retrospective or penal in the Bill was one in which he could not concur. If their Lordships would only refer to Clause 82, they would find that—

“If any person, not being trader, shall, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, depart this realm, or being out of this realm shall with such intent remain abroad, or shall with such intent make any fraudulent conveyance of his estate, such person shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy.”

Therefore, the Bill proposed this penalty should be imposed on any person who had contracted a debt years ago. This, he contended, was undoubtedly retrospective legislation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Certainly, if he does not conform to the law.

LORD CHELMSFORD: If he does not surrender in a certain time.

THE EARL OF DERBY: If the person did not return to this country he came under the operation of the Act for a past debt. Then what did the noble and learned Lord say with regard to the penal effect of the Bill? Clause 164 said that if the Court should be of opinion that the bankrupt, being a trader, had carried on business by means of fictitious capital; or, with the intent to conceal the true state of his affairs, wilfully omitted to keep proper books; or, whether a trader or not that he had not at the time when any of his debts were contracted any reasonable and probable ground or expectation of being able to pay the same, then he might be sentenced to imprisonment for one year, although the debt was contracted before the passing of this Act. He thought on all these grounds their Lordships would insert the clause proposed by his noble and learned Friend, and for the reason he had stated, the noble and learned Lord Chancellor, being opposed to retrospective legislation, ought to vote for it.

LORD CRANWORTH would be the last man to concur in any legislation which was really retrospective; that was to say, by which any existing right was infringed or taken away; but he maintained that the Bill did not contain any such principle—all that the Bill now did was to give a new, an easier, and a cheaper means of enforcing rights which actually existed. The term “retrospective” might as well be applied to every Act for facilitating the recovery of debts which had been passed in modern times. Lord Eldon was no bold Legislator who would have interfered with existing rights, but by his Consolidated Bankruptcy Act many classes of persons were brought within the operation of the bankruptcy laws who were not subject to them before, and yet it never occurred to the mind of Lord Eldon that, because persons by that means might be made criminally responsible, therefore, the Act should apply only prospectively to debts afterwards incurred. The same thing was done by Lord Hardwicke, who brought bankers and brokers for the first time within the operation of the bankruptcy laws. Therefore, on authority, as well as on principle, he contended that their Lordships were not interfering with the retrospective rights of any individual. Their Lordships proposed to introduce, under the plea of bankruptcy, something to exclude retrospective legislation with regard to non-traders, and to that proposition he could not agree, and he should, therefore, conscientiously adhere to the principles which actuated him in the Select Committee, and vote for the Amendment.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he could state nothing as to what passed in the Committee either on one side or the other because he was not there, and, therefore, could not say how the retrospective clause passed; but it was clear that the clause was carried in Committee by a bare majority. But upon the merits he must say that even if the clause had been carried by a large majority, he should still entertain the most positive opinion that the creation of a Chief Judge, as proposed, would be utterly useless. The Chief Judge, it was proposed, should be equal in dignity to the puisne Judges, and was to have a salary of £5,000 a year; and he would have to do literally nothing. If there were any necessity for superintendence of the proceedings of the Commissioners, why not make one of the Commissioners head of the others, and let him superintend the court? This would be unobjectionable, because the Chief Commissioner would have other duties to perform, whilst the proposed Chief Judge would have no functions but those of superintendence. He had some experience as regarded an appeal within the Court of Bankruptcy, for the Act of 1831 a Court of Review, with a Judge to preside over it, was created, which took the position which the Court of Chancery previously occupied in respect to bankruptcy. At that time a very large portion of the time of the Lord Chancellor was occupied by appeals from bankruptcy—indeed, the sittings in reference to bankruptcy frequently occupied four or five weeks; but after the Court of Review was formed it was found that the Commissioners performed their functions so satisfactorily that there was nothing for the Court of Review to do, and it was allowed to fall into disuse. He strongly recommended their Lordships to agree to the Amendment now proposed. The precedents mentioned, and with which Lord Eldon and Lord Hardwicke were connected, applied to a totally different state of things.

 In that case it was sought to bring within the bankrupt law bankers and brokers and others quasi-traders, who by some caprice of legislation had been left without the pale of the bankrupt law; but there was a wide distinction between that and the present Bill by which it was proposed to enter the penalties and consequence of the bankrupt law to persons who had nothing whatever to do with trade. Suppose there were no imprisonment for debt, as was formerly the case—for such imprisonment was the creature of the statute, and did not exist at common law—would it not be thought hard upon passing an Act instituting imprisonment, to make it apply to debts contracted before the statute?
 He agreed, however, that there were many reasons why there should be a prospective operation to the clause. If the Bill passed in its present shape it was possible for a Member of either House of Parliament to become a bankrupt for a debt at a time when he felt he was perfectly safe in contracting it; and the consequence of bankruptcy in the case of a Member of the House of Commons was that the Member was expelled from that House and lost his seat by Act of Parliament.

LORD WENSLEYDALE was understood to oppose the Amendment.

On Question, Whether the said Clause shall be there inserted? their Lordships

LORD CRANWORTH said, he had given notice of his intention to strike out Clause G., introduced by the Select Committee on the Motion of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), though he did not intend to give their Lordships the trouble of dividing. The noble Earl had put this case in support of his view. Suppose a father, aged 50, and a son, aged 25, the father having a life interest, and the son having also a life interest in remainder after his father, producing an estimate made by an actuary, the noble Earl showed that the value of the son's reversionary life interest would be worth only two years' purchase; and his argument was that it would be very hard to make a bankrupt of such a man, and to sell so small a reversionary interest. Now, he could see no hardship at all in the case supposed. The question was what was the interest worth? and if the person who owned it was indebted and had no other property, why should it not be applied in payment of his debts, as well in the case of a non-trader as of a trader? Though there was probably no intention of this kind on the part of those who framed the clause, it looked as if their object was to protect the upper ranks of the community and those not engaged in trade, while those who were engaged in trade were left without any such protection. The exception was liable to the charge of being something like class legislation without effecting the object in view, for the son's reversionary life interest, might certainly be taken in execution, and sold at the instance of a creditor. He moved that the clause be omitted, but would not divide their Lordships on the point.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the clause had been introduced by the Select Committee at the instance of his noble Friend (Lord St. Leonards). The case was this. A man, aged 50, had a son, aged 25, who had an infant son. An estate of £10,000 a year was settled on the son, with remainder to the children. If the son became bankrupt his interest would, under the Bill as it originally stood, be sold, and he (the Earl of Derby) took the opinion of an actuary as to the value of such a life interest under such circumstances. The answer was that such a sale would be very difficult to effect, as few persons would be found to purchase such property. The value, according to the chances of life, would be about two years' purchase. Let their Lordships consider the effect of a sale of the estate under the circumstances referred to. The tenant in possession would take no interest in it knowing that it would go to a stranger; and when that stranger came into possession all he would care about would be to screw as much out of it as possible. What would be the condition of that property when it came into possession of the grandson? Well, then, what the new clause proposed was this, that under such circumstances the sale should not take effect except under the express direction and sanction of the Court.

CRAVEN HILL, PADDINGTON.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General what he proposes to do with the surplus arising out of the cause The Attorney General v. the Craven Hill Estate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that many years ago, Lord Craven gave a piece of land for the purpose of establishing pesthouses for the benefit of five of the parishes of London. In the course of time that land became very valuable, and was afterwards sold and other land bought with the proceeds at Paddington. That site was selected from the notion that the population of London would never extend so far. However, that had not been the case. The land there had become very valuable, and a decree of the Court of Chancery had been taken. It produced very nearly £400 a year, but in the next century, when certain leases fell in, it would bring in a very large amount indeed. It was his (the Attorney General's) desire to apply the money for the benefit of the different parishes, but to divide it among them would not answer any useful purpose of the charity. He, therefore, had proposed to give it to St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, being the nearest hospital, provided the trustees would build an additional wing for the accommodation of persons affected by contagious disorders in those five parishes. They had taken a considerable time to deliberate on the proposal, but a fortnight ago he (the Attorney General) received a letter stating that they declined the offer. He was now desirous of finding some other hospital which would undertake on receiving the income to provide sufficient accommodation for patients who might be sent from the five parishes. He regretted that so much time should have been lost, but it was unavoidable. He would endeavour to have a scheme for the application of the money ready as soon as possible.

CHINA.—MR. PARKES' REPORT.
QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Report from Mr. Parkes of his four interviews with the Taeping authorities at Nankin, to which reference is made in Commander Aplin's letter, dated the 2nd of April, 1861, in the China correspondence, respecting the opening of the Yang-tze-Kiang River, would be laid upon the Table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say that the Report had been received, and the substance of it given in the papers already produced.

JAPAN.—CASE OF MR. MOSS.
QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any decision has been come to in the case of Mr. Moss, sentenced by Mr. Alcock to fine, deportation from Japan, and imprisonment at Hongkong; and if he is prepared to lay any papers on that subject upon the Table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the matter had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown; but he thought it would not be proper to lay the Papers upon the Table, as there were legal proceedings arising out of them at Hong Kong.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.

COMMITTEE. FIRST NIGHT.

Order for Committee read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS moved that the Speaker leave the Chair in order to go into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EARL JERMYN said, he rose to move as an Amendment that the House will upon that day six months resolve itself into the said Committee. Nothing could be further from his desire or more foreign to his purpose than to implicate himself in the countenance of bribery and corruption, and the remarks which he should address to the House would completely refute any such imputation. He appeared principally to advocate the claims of the borough of Sudbury to preserve its representation, and he was ready to discharge the same office for St. Albans, though he had no direct authority to make any statement on her part. It might be taken, however, that Sudbury acknowledged the abstract justice of her punishment, but through him, as her representative, took exception to the scheme of the Government, which created a double condition of the law, and which allowed two different classes of punishment to be meted out to one and the self same offence. Such a state of things ought not to command either the approbation or acquiescence of the House of Commons. Since the last election for Sudbury had there been no election petitions, no Committees to try charges of bribery, and no Royal Commissioners to inquire into cases of corruption of a still more extensive and systematic nature? Had there been any decrease of electoral offences, or any relaxation of electoral immorality since Parliament, penetrated with serious anxiety, had once and for ever by the exercise of the full weight of its displeasure swept away a body which, to his mind, could not be spoken of or thought of except as a national disgrace? He would not weary them with details, but he entreated them to recollect the enormous mass of petitions complaining of corrupt practices which were presented immediately following the last general election. He admitted that many of those petitions were withdrawn, but enough still remained, after making all due allowance for the excited feelings of disappointed candidates and partisans, to show how inveterate was the evil, and how widespread its operation. He had no hesitation in averring that the borough of Sudbury had been made the scapegoat to bear the burden of electoral sins. He maintained that the measure of disfranchisement was intended to be no less remedial than penal. He appealed, however, to the candour of the House to say whether that intention had been fulfilled? Bribery and corruption still existed, flourished, and permeated our constituencies with an obstinate energy and perseverance which completely falsified all expectation of amendment from the terror of the example which Parliament had made. It might be worth while, then, to inquire why their legislation had been attended with such ill, or rather such little effect. He thought he could tell the House one reason, and could show them at least one cause of the inutility of their Act. It was this—that Parliament had ignored one of the first and most important principles of penal legislation. He submitted that the efficacy of punishment as an agent to deter from the commission of any offence materially depended upon the impartiality and certainty of its infliction. Unless they showed constituencies that they were prepared to act on a broad and comprehensive principle on a well-considered and statesmanlike system, an act of isolated severity would become, as he feared it had already, merely the laughing-stock of those to whom it was meant as a warning. Had he seen the slightest trace of a disposition on the part of the Government to recommend Parliament to legislate on a statesmanlike and impartial basis, or on the part of the House to take the matter into their own hands, and endeavoured earnestly to cure the evils which now disgraced our electoral system, he would not have troubled the House with his Motion. He could, however, perceive no such intention on the part of the Government; and, whatever might be the feeling of the House at large, his Motion would at least afford an opportunity to those hon. Gentlemen on both sides who took a genuine interest in the matter to express their views. As a reason for the assumption that the Government were not prepared to deal with the question on its merits, he would remind the House of the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had met the distinct question which he put to him in the beginning of the Session, as to whether it was the intention of Government to visit any constituency that might have been already or should be hereafter convicted of gross bribery and corruption with the same punishment which had been inflicted on Sudbury and St. Albans. The right hon. Gentleman in reply favoured the House with the rather stale news that it would be competent for any hon. Member to move the re-issue of writs to Gloucester and Wakefield. He also informed them that the Law Officers of the Crown had been consulted as to whether there was a ground for prosecution in the Berwick case. That surely pointed to a prosecution of individuals, whereas his question applied entirely and exclusively to constituencies. He submitted, then, that when it would have been so easy for the right hon. Gentleman either to have met his question with a direct affirmative or negative, he was right in his assumption that the Government had not yet determined on the way in which they should deal with this position, as the right hon. Gentleman rather avoided the real point at issue. Therefore, it was not unreasonable to ask the House to pause before it took the final step of destroying the political entity of these boroughs. They ought first to consider, not the mere abstract, but the comparative and relative justice of the proceeding—they ought, in fact, to consider what ought to be their future procedure with respect to constituencies that were found to be corrupt and rotten at the core—constituencies not a whit less worthy of extinction than those the appropriation of whose seats they were now discussing—nay, those constituencies were far more deserving of punishment, because their offence had been committed in a generation which it was the fashion to believe was of a pure spirit and a higher political morality than that which had gone by. It would have saved the Legislature of the present day much time, trouble, and inconvenience if the Parliament which undertook the immolation of these unfortunate boroughs had made some proper and satisfactory disposition of their bodies. Unfortunately, they did nothing of the sort. They left their victims hanging, and trusted everything else to chance; and it had, therefore, fallen to his right hon. Friend to undertake—there was something significant in that word—the task which ought to have been performed long ago. Accordingly, all the necessary arrangements and preparations for the dismal event were made, the mournful occasion at length arrived, the right hon. Gentleman was ready to perform the sad duties of his self-appointed office, when he was startled, dismayed, and thunderstruck by hearing, mirabile et horribile dictu, a noise in the coffins. He should be the last person in the world to attribute to the right hon. Gentleman anything approaching to superstitious terrors; but he must confess that it did appear to him that from that time the right hon. Gentleman had been, for he did not know how many weeks, scampering away as fast as his legs would carry him from that most supernatural and portentous cry. The hon. Member for Knaresborough halloed to him to stop, but he might as well have halloed to the moon. He perfectly sympathized with the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman. It must have been a severe shock to his system, that just when he was about to consign to their eternal house what he fondly believed were the mortal remains of defunct constituencies they should emit sounds which gave unmistakeable evidence of the presence of at least some remnants of vitality. It was because he believed that it would require no very superhuman effort to resuscitate the semi-animate bodies of these unfortunate constituencies that he was making this Motion. It was not the Act of Parliament that stood in their way. Of course if the House, after passing that Act, had proceeded to appropriate the seats there would have been an end to the whole question; but they might, if they pleased, repeal the statute by which the boroughs were disfranchised. He owed the House an apology for interrupting the harmony of the evening—if, indeed, that word were appropriate to what was likely to be a deadly conflict. He sought to play rather the part of some noble or royal personage, who, at a joyous passage of arms, thought fit, from whatever motive—were it of humanity or caprice—to fling down his “gauntlet” into the arena of the tilting ground, and so prevent the impending mélée. He knew very well that many hon. Members had come down to the House somewhat prejudiced against the Amendment. It was no wonder that, after a Session of more than ordinary dulness, hon. Members should be disappointed at the idea of losing the spectacle of a great tournament. Already, no doubt, many hon. Gentlemen in their mind’s eye beheld the shock of the heroes as they closed in fight, heard the cries of the spectators, the lamentations at the overthrow of some favoured champion, and the shouts of the victors. He confessed that it was hard to make a sacrifice of such a spectacle; but he had consolation to bestow. He did not seek to oppose the progress of the Bill longer than the period when the House had settled what course it would pursue with regard to constituencies convicted of gross and systematic corruption. He believed that philosophers had decided that pleasure consisted rather in anticipation than in enjoyment, and the hon. Gentlemen to whom he was referring might next year, perhaps, be permitted to enjoy the fruition of their hopes; let them this year, however, be content with the philosophic delights of expectation. There were some Gentlemen out of the House to whom his apologies were also due, amongst whom were a very respectable body of men who were anxious to become the constituents of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He felt confident that the House would discuss this question gravely and temperately; he hoped that they would construe favourably the attempt to prevent inequality and unfairness of punishment, and he felt sure that, with the strong feeling which existed in the country against inflicting capital punishment upon offending electoral bodies, and, in the absence of any comprehensive scheme of reform for abolishing small boroughs, they would not sanction the Bill which was now under their consideration.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,”—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The noble Lord in the very temperate remarks which he has addressed to the House stated that it was not his wish to arrest the progress of the measure further than for the purpose of discussing the question what should be done with the boroughs convicted of bribery? It appears to me that the most fitting opportunity of discussing that question will be when the Bill regulating the conduct of elections comes under discussion. In that Bill there is a clause providing that the suspension of the writ for a certain number of years shall take place in cases where a commission has reported the prevalence of bribery. That provision is intended to meet the cases where bribery is not universal and long-continued; but in flagrant cases, no doubt, it would be proposed to disfranchise the boroughs altogether, as was done in the case of Sudbury. The speech of the noble Lord is, in point of fact, an appeal to the House for a rehearing on the subject of the disfranchisement of Sudbury; and an attempt to resuscitate that defunct borough—

“The times have been
That when the brains were out the man would die,
And there an end: but now they rise again,
With twenty mortal murders on their crowns,
And push us from our seats.”

I confess I was not all prepared to hear any attempt to induce the House to reconsider the question of the disfranchisement of Sudbury. If it were restored to its lost franchise I do not see that Grampound might not put in a claim to revival, and the county of York might be asked to give up the two Members which it received from that borough. Nothing could be more notorious than the character of Sudbury for a long-continued and flagrant corruption. Even a century ago its fame was well established. A recent Constitutional History, for which we are indebted to Mr. Erskine May, who sits at the table of this House, and with which I have no doubt many Members of this House are acquainted—[Cheers—]referring to the electoral abuses which prevailed at the commencement of the reign of George III., contains this passage—

“Sudbury, infamous for its corruption until its ultimate disfranchisement, publicly advertised itself for sale.”

[Laughter.] And the Act which was passed by this House, after a full inquiry in the year 1844 recites that “systematic and extensive bribery prevailed in the borough of Sudbury at the last election,” and it was, therefore, enacted that the said borough should cease to return any Member or Members to serve in Parliament. That measure was fully considered during its passage through both Houses; counsel were heard at the bar on the second reading both in this and the other House of Parliament, and the Bill passed without any serious difference of opinion. The Bill was introduced by the Solicitor General of the day, and to show the House that persons of all opinions concurred in the disfranchisement, I will read merely a few lines from the speech of Mr. Charles Wynn, well known as an authority on constitutional questions, but who at that time had quite retired from public life, except to the extent of sitting, when he was able, in this House. Owing to infirmity he spoke from his seat, and said

Sir George Lewis

“He thought the House ought to be consistent with itself and should proceed at once to pass the Bill. The evidence adduced was amply sufficient for the House to act upon in legislating, and he regarded the Bill not merely as penal but as a remedial measure. He believed no borough had exhibited more systematic bribery and corruption than had been shown to exist in the borough of Sudbury.”

After this statement of the circumstances under which the Bill was passed I scarcely think it will be necessary for me to dwell at any length on that part of the subject. I will only mention that both sides have concurred in regarding the disfranchisement of Sudbury as a final act. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) in the Bill which he proposed in 1853, for assigning the same four seats which are under consideration to-day, treated that Act as final, and in his general Bill for the reform of this House he likewise included them. Therefore, the disfranchisement of Sudbury must be treated as a matter which is beyond the reach of discussion. The noble Lord says we have been inconsistent, and that we have dealt to other boroughs a measure less severe than what we have dealt to Sudbury. I can only say that it is quite competent for any Member of this House, who is of opinion that Gloucester and Wakefield ought to be disfranchised, to bring a Bill under the consideration of the House. It is not peculiarly the office of the executive Government to propose a measure on that subject. The borough of Grampound was not disfranchised on any proposal of the Government for the time being. Those, therefore, who think that the evidence is sufficient to justify a stronger step than we have taken in suspending the writs of those two boroughs during the present Parliament may make any proposition they think fit to the House. My own opinion unquestionably is that, where a borough is not of first rate importance in point of magnitude, and where the bribery has been extensive, the House ought not to be too tender in regarding the interests of the innocent minority, but might with propriety proceed to final disfranchisement. I am aware, however, that on that matter great difference of opinion prevails. I can only say that the House, no doubt, will be ready at any time to consider whatever proposition any hon. Member may think it his duty to bring forward. Under these circumstances the noble Lord, I hope, will not think it necessary to press this Motion to a division, but will allow us to proceed to the discussion of the clauses of the Bill before us.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, he did not desire to raise any discussion with respect to the disfranchisement of Sudbury, but he must say that it was contrary to all principles of justice to punish the innocent many for the offences of the guilty few. Was that course adopted in our courts of law? Did hon. Gentlemen recognize it in the discharge of their magisterial duty? The right hon. Baronet had given them the opinion of an hon. Member entitled to respect on the point; he (Major Parker) could refer the right hon. Baronet to the opinion of a man equally respected. Sir Robert Peel had said, speaking of bribery, "he wished to punish the individuals who might be proved to be guilty of bribery; but he thought it would be unjust to punish the whole constituents of a borough for the crime of a portion." He (Major Parker) hoped the time would never come when the House would depart from that wholesome Christian method of never condemning and punishing any one who was not proved to be guilty, and, therefore, that the House would not concur in the views of the right hon. Baronet.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he hoped the noble Lord would press his Motion to a division. Had he not found the notice of the noble Lord upon the paper, he should himself have given notice of a Motion to a similar effect. The House was not in a position to dispose of the four seats at all. The present Government had been put into office to carry out a great and real measure of Reform, and their predecessors had been defeated because they had proposed a mere pitiful instalment.

But, paltry as those proposals had been molehills as they were thought at the time, they were mountains to this miserable abortion. Members at that side of the House were expected to vote on all occasions that black was white for the purpose of keeping the Government in office, and yet that very same Government not only violated its pledges, but did not scruple to vilify and slander its supporters, both in the House itself and in the lobbies outside, for the purpose of gaining votes to strengthen its position. He should certainly not allow such a miserable Bill to be proposed without dividing against it, even if he were to walk out into the lobby alone. He could not regard such a measure as in any way a settlement of the question upon which the Government took office. As honourable men the members of that Administration were bound, he thought, to place their posts at the disposal of Her Majesty, now that they had failed to fulfil the pledge upon which they took them. Apart from all angry feeling, however, he would ask was the measure before the House the sort of Reform the country expected? He maintained that so far from furthering the cause of Reform, it would impede it, and that in any general measure it was important to have a few seats for disposal among important constituencies, upon some recognized principle of distribution. So far as the measure went it would stand in the way of the consideration of new ideas which might be broached upon the theory of representation. For instance, it was the opinion of some persons that no constituency ought to have more than one representative. Then, again, the metropolitan boroughs were already over-represented. He did not complain nationally upon that subject, as he thought that Chelsea, if formed into a borough, would be very likely to return a countryman of his own, but he objected altogether to proceeding with a fragmentary scheme whilst the great question of Reform was still unsettled.

MR. STIRLING said, that if the noble Lord who moved the Amendment went into the lobby he should not follow him, though he thought they were indebted to the noble Lord for having brought his Motion forward. The Bill required more consideration with Mr. Speaker in the chair than had yet been given to it; but he believed that, though imperfect in many respects, it was a step in the right direction.

Ever since he had had the honour of a seat in that House it had been engaged in devising schemes to put down bribery and corruption; but it appeared to him that the remedy most likely to be successful had been on all occasions neglected. Public opinion in this country would not permit, and ought not to permit, any very severe punishment to be inflicted on the poor and ignorant man for taking the bribe which the rich and intelligent man gave; but our Legislators had never yet thought of the mild and simple remedy of depriving the voter of his vote whenever he was found guilty of selling it. That punishment would be simple, equitable, suitable to the offence, and not over severe, while it would have the additional advantage of increasing in severity according to the position in life of the offender. Applying the same rule to the person who gave the bribe, he would deprive him of the privilege of voting, not only in the place where the bribe was given, but also in any other part of the kingdom. Let the punishment follow on the finding of a Committee of that House, subject, of course, to any appeal which justice might seem to require. He thought that seats forfeited for offences like that committed at Sudbury and St. Albans ought to be given to other constituencies without unnecessary delay; and it was because this Bill proposed to do tardy justice to those corrupt places that it should receive his support. He thought, however, that Sudbury and St. Albans had a right to complain that other offenders escaped while they were punished. Why had Wakefield and Gloucester been left out of the Bill? Why was Berwick left to pursue its evil courses without a check? Why should the Government—who so frequently warned private Members off this and that field of legislation—leave the important question of bribery to independent Members? As to the disposal of the seats, it was argued that, being English, they ought to be kept for England, and must not be given to Ireland and Scotland. Speaking in the presence of a hostile majority he ventured to think that that argument was unsound. If the geographical argument was to prevail at all, why should it not prevail in favour of the counties in which the punished boroughs were situate? If it were good for England as against the rest of the Empire, why was it not good for Suffolk and Hertfordshire as against the rest of England? He thought the Bill would have been much much more equitable if it had been proposed that one of the seats should be given to Scotland and another to Ireland. The argument that those seats were English had no weight with the political leaders on the front benches when they were preparing their Reform Bills. In the last two Reform Bills, and, indeed, he believed he might say in three, all these four seats were to have been given to the sister kingdoms, and he could not see how what was equitable when those Bills were introduced could be unjust now. He should greatly deprecate the introduction of national jealousies into the consideration and disposal of those seats. He had put an Amendment on the paper in favour of the Scotch Universities, not because those institutions were in Scotland, but because they were the only institutions of that character, and of the same venerable antiquity and national importance which were now unrepresented. He would venture to notice some remarks on the subject which appeared that morning in the great English journal. They were told that in the selection of representatives for seats in Parliament, Scotch and Irish constituencies chiefly considered whether the candidates were Scotchmen and Irishmen. He must say that that statement so far as it concerned Scotland was untrue. His countrymen had not forgotten the generosity of England in adding eight to the Scotch representatives at the time of the Reform Bill, and raising their number from forty-five to fifty-three. Of those eight additional Members no less than seven were Englishmen, which was about the number of Scotchmen returned by all England. There was another statement to which he should not have alluded but for the importance of the journal in which it appeared. The Times said that the House of Commons was asked to admit “some deputy from the young gentlemen who elect Lord Rectors and similar Abbots of Misrule at their Annual Saturnalia.” On a former occasion the same journal called those young gentlemen “raw boys.” The constituents of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Cambridge, might as fairly be accused of holding Saturnalia as that Scotch University constituency which he hoped to see enfranchised. The body for which he asked a representative was the General Councils of the Scotch Universities, a body corresponding with the Convocation of Oxford and the Senate of Cambridge. The General Council of the University of Edinburgh included, or might include, Lord Brougham, the Marquess of Lansdowne, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, the noble Lord the Prime Minister, and all the Judges of Scotland, besides many other distinguished persons who might be cited as specimens of the "raw boys" for whom it was thought so impertinent to ask for a share in the representation of their country. He hoped he should have the support of the great body of the Scottish Members when he brought forward his Motion; and he would venture to suggest to the Irish Members that they ought on that occasion to restrict their claim to one seat only, and to make up their minds among themselves as to where that seat should be.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he had given notice of a Motion for assigning two of the vacant seats to Ireland, and his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had also given notice of a Motion for assigning two of the vacant seats to Dublin city and Cork county respectively. His hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire had urged them to be satisfied with one Member for Ireland, and as the Irish were always moderate, he should be content if they could get one seat from the Government. He did not see why the West Riding of Yorkshire or South Lancashire required additional Members; he had gone through the statistics of the Southern division of Lancashire and the county of Cork, and he should at a future stage state the grounds on which he considered that the latter had the stronger claim for one of these seats. Ireland was not properly represented in that House. He should not move the Amendment that stood in his name, that two of the seats be transferred to Ireland, but he should move, with the assent of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan, that the county of Cork be substituted instead of the Southern division of Lancashire in this Bill.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had had some experience in Reform discussions, for he had taken an active part when the measure of 1832 was under consideration, and he certainly could not congratulate the House on the prospect before them of entering into a controversy as to the merits of different constituencies. He thought that a course full of danger, and it was one which had always been systematically avoided. The composition of that House from its beginning had been of Members sent up by counties, cities, and boroughs, and the rule had always been that a borough should have a species of municipal government before it was made a Parliamentary constituency. It never could be the interest of that House to run one great community against another, and to compare the respective merits of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The wiser course would have been for the Constitutional advisers of the Crown, on their own responsibility, to say what places they thought should have the vacant seats; and submit their decision to the consideration of the House.

MR. WARNER said, there were two very important but distinct questions involved in the discussion. First, whether it was right at that time to fill up the vacant seats; and, secondly, if so, by what constituencies the seats were so to be filled up? He thought the noble Lord opposite (Earl Jermyn) had injured his case by overstating it. He had recommended the House not merely to abstain from filling up the seats but to restore them to Sudbury and St. Albans. They could not listen to the noble Lord's proposal to negative this Bill. Some more substantial grounds must be given for adopting such a course than any they had already heard. He (Mr. Warner) thought that the Government would act wisely by leaving the question of filling up the vacant seats in the hands of the House. Nothing could be more unfortunate than to treat it as a party question. The Government, dealing with it as a party question, had chosen the new seats very well; but what was more important was that each seat should have a character, an importance, and an individuality which should do honour to the representation. As an English Member, in no way whatever connected with Scotland, he would not resist the claims of the Scotch Universities, which he thought stronger than those of any of the important constituencies which had yet been proposed. No one could regret more than he did the failure of the efforts of the Liberal party in the way of Reform, but he saw no early prospect of a better state of things. The Liberal party, once so strong, was now thoroughly disorganized. How far the noble Lord who was their recognized leader was responsible for such a result he would leave it to history to say. Seeing no hope of any substantial or useful Reform Bill, he should advise the House to avail itself of the present opportunity of obtaining the small increase to the representation that was offered it; and with that view he should support the Bill.

Clause 1 (Additional Member for West Riding of Yorkshire and Southern Division of Lancashire),

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped to satisfy the Committee that three, at all events out of the four, Members should be given to the county constituencies and two of these to the West Riding of Yorkshire. It seemed to be agreed that South Lancashire should have one, and, therefore, the addition to the West Riding must be at the expense of Birkenhead or Chelsea. He had his own opinion upon the subject, but he would not enter upon the question whether the Reform Bill of 1832 did or did not do justice to the counties as compared with the boroughs. The settlement then made had been accepted for the last thirty years, and it seemed very difficult to disturb it. He pledged himself to show that his proposals were in accordance with the spirit of that settlement, and that they founded on justice. To understand this matter thoroughly they must go back to the time of the Reform Bill, and they must look at the character of the constituencies of Sudbury and St. Albans, which had been disfranchised. The noble Lord introduced at that stormy period to which he had referred three larger measures of Reform. In many particulars they were the same. They had all a Schedule A, of boroughs wholly disfranchised; a Schedule B, of places partially disfranchised; a Schedule C, of places to return two Members; and a Schedule D, of towns to return one Member and of counties to return three and four Members. Disregarding prescriptive right, which was stronger than law and reason, the noble Lord attempted to diminish the number of Members in the House. His first Bill was lost on the Motion of General Gascoigne "that it was not expedient to diminish the number of Members for England and Wales;" and he could not help thinking that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had the Motion of General Gascoigne in his eye when he gave notice of a Motion hostile to the representation of the Universities of Scotland. The second Bill of the noble Lord, which was lost in "another place," contained 23 fewer Members than those who under the old and under the present system had the honour of seats in this House. In the third Reform Bill the noble Lord proposed to fill up 23 vacancies by adding one to the counties and 22 to the boroughs. The noble Lord said he would not disturb the balance between town and country, and, therefore, would add 11 of the 22 seats to the larger boroughs, and 11 to the smaller boroughs which partook of the nature of county constituencies. The noble Lord called from the grave 11 boroughs which had been scheduled in the second Bill to return only one Member, and the Members who sat for those places might thank God that in those days there was a House of Lords. Thrice within twice thrice years he had heard proposals to disfranchise the town which he had the honour to represent (Knaresborough); but he hoped that his eyes would have become dim, his hair gray, and his voice began to fail before he had the pain again to listen to such a proposal. Sudbury was not one of the 11 larger boroughs, and was called back as a counterpoise to Brighton and Macclesfield, which received a double representation. Therefore if they gave the seats of Sudbury to Birkenhead or Chelsea they would upset the settlement of 1832, and re-open a question which, for the sake of the boroughs, had better be left alone. It might be said that, although Sudbury partook of the character of a county representation, that was not the case with St. Albans. But if hon. Members looked back to the debates of those days they would find that St. Albans was among the next half-dozen on the list for semi-disfranchisement; and, therefore, if they were to consider St. Albans as neither belonging to town or county. They would be dealing liberally by the large boroughs, if one of the seats of St. Albans was allotted to them, he hoped he had satisfied the Committee that three of these seats ought to fall to small boroughs like Sudbury and St. Albans, or, failing such places, to the counties. He had listened with attention to the speech of Mr. Sidney Herbert in 1859, when he pointed out that Members for small boroughs represented much larger bodies than the constituencies of the particular boroughs for which they sat; and he had also heard with satisfaction the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion—that the distribution of seats was full one-half of a Reform Bill, and that they ought to look to the quality of the persons likely to be elected as well as to the quality of the electors. He was sure that no one could look at the front rows on both sides of the House without being convinced that these small boroughs formed a material element in a fair representation, and that complexity and diversity, not uniformity, should be the rule in any sound representative system, but he felt that it was hopeless to attempt to induce the House to allot these four seats to boroughs of an analogous character, but that being out of the question, it was manifest that if they took as the basis of legislation the Act of 1832, they must give them to the counties. The next question was what counties were best entitled to the seats. The bases of the Act of 1832 were taxation, population, number of electors, and geographical area, and taking those points as guides, the West Riding was clearly entitled in future to send four Knights of the Shire to Parliament. The number of counties to which four Members were assigned by the Act of 1832 was 26; and the choice was said to have been made according to taxation, population, voters, and geographical area. On the question of taxation, he drew a broad line of demarcation between the annual value in connection with counties and the annual value in connection with boroughs, because the county representation was essentially one of property, and the borough representation was essentially one of occupation. The county Member in a rough way represented the property of his county—not so the borough Member. If the rate-book were really made the register, and votes given in accordance with the amount of rates paid, then taxation and representation might justly be said to go together. But the real fact was that in too many boroughs the power to pay and the power to impose taxation bore no relation whatever the one to the other. The net annual value of rental in the West Riding was greater than in any of other 26 counties which by the Act of 1832 returned four Members, with the single exception of Lancashire. North and South Lancashire gave a return of £4,500,000, the West Riding £3,126,000, and Kent, the next on the list, only £2,310,000. On the ground of population the West Riding was also entitled to increased representation. Exclusive of the represented boroughs, Lancashire contained a population of 817,000, the West Riding 794,000, and Kent, which returned four Members, had a population of only 485,000. The West Riding contained more than twice the population of the other counties with four Members. In geographical area the West Riding as compared with the other counties stood second on the list. Lincolnshire contained 1,779,000 acres, the West Riding 1,750,000, and Devonshire 1,600,000. The West Riding contained double the number of acres of more than half the counties with four Members. While second, therefore, in respect of area population, and taxation, the West Riding stood first in respect of the number of electors, for although returning only two Members it contained more than any single county constituency with four Members. By the return of 1859, the West Riding had a constituency of 36,645 electors, and the number had since risen to about 40,000. In Lancashire which returned four Members the number of electors was only 31,000. Out of the 26 counties he had mentioned, 16 had not a half, and most of them had not a quarter, of the number of electors in the West Riding. On what ground, then, could the West Riding be refused an equal representation with those 26 counties? It might be said that the West Riding ought to be content because there were so many represented boroughs within its borders. The fact was, that with a total population by the census of 1851 of 1,300,000, the West Riding returned only 18 county and borough Members altogether. That was a body of population which was more inadequately represented than that of any other part of England, or even of Scotland or Ireland. The reason why the West Riding did not receive a larger share in the representation in 1832 might perhaps have been that the claims of the district were not sufficiently brought before Parliament. In the vernacular of Yorkshire, the Bill was brought in by a south countryman a “foreigner.” Sheffield, Leeds, Halifax, Wakefield, and other towns were then for the first time enfranchised; and Knaresborough, Ripon, and Pontefract were under the control of family influence, and the Members for those places no more represented the people of the West Riding than they did the palace at Chatsworth. The borough he had now the honour to represent was then the appanage of the ducal house of Devonshire, to whose credit, however, it ought to be mentioned that they did not put it up to auction or reserve it for members of their own family. The last three Members returned for that borough while it was in the hands of that House were Sir James Mackintosh, Mr. Tierney, and Lord Brougham; and, while he had a high appreciation of the wisdom with which that constituency had of late years chosen a representative, he doubted whether they would be able for many years to come to find three such eminent men to represent them. Still in no peculiar sense could such men be said to represent the West Riding. There was not a more industrious, thriving, intelligent, or loyal population than that of the West Riding, and on every ground they were entitled to the increase of members which he claimed for them. The fact that it was in name only a division of a county ought not to interfere with its claims, for, to all intents and purposes, it was a separate unity. The West Riding was not like the divisions of counties, such as Cork in Ireland, a geographical expression. Yorkshire had its three Lord Lieutenants, estimable Whig noblemen—with three benches of magistrates and three commissions of deputy lieutenants. In the matter of taxation, the North, East, and West Ridings, had each their three separate county rates, and, except for the accident of having one sheriff, the West Riding was as distinct from the North or East Ridings as from Lancashire or Durham, and being a separate unity ought to have been so treated in the Act of 1832. Having made this point that the West Riding of Yorkshire ought to return four Knights of the Shire, there remains the question whether it should return four as a unity, or should be divided like all other counties into two divisions, each divisions returning two Members; and whether the unity of the West Riding should be preserved was a question which should be decided on Imperial rather than local considerations. It was true that there existed among the town freeholders of the West Riding a wish that the unity of the riding should be preserved; but there were 800,000 unrepresented persons living outside the towns who were equally anxious that it should be divided. This rural population, numbering 800,000, even giving them the benefit of Knaresborough and Ripon, returned only six

Mr. Collins

Members to Parliament, while the populations of the boroughs—Leeds, Sheffield, Huddersfield, Halifax, Wakefield, Bradford, and Pontefract—amounting to only about half a million, returned 12. Among the rural population there were 40,000 electors, while in the towns there were only 21,000; thus, while the borough population had a Member for every 1,800 electors, the rural population had only one for every 6,000 or 7,000 electors. Under these circumstances it was hardly fair that the town populations should not only insist upon retaining the preponderance of representation which they at present enjoyed, but should also demand to be allowed to manage the affairs of the rural population. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London in his first Reform Bill had proposed to disfranchise the town freeholders in new boroughs on the ground that when he gave them specific representation of their own they ought not to interfere with the wishes of the rural population; their conduct, therefore, on this head could but meet with reprobation from the noble Lord. That this was the feeling outside the town populations did not admit of doubt. Last year the magistrates held a meeting which was convened by a circular issued by the deputy clerk of the peace, to consider whether it was desirable that the West Riding should be separated into two divisions, and a resolution was proposed that it was the opinion of the meeting that the riding should be separated into two divisions, to be called the north and south divisions, to which an amendment was proposed to the effect that it was inexpedient for the magistrates as magistrates to express an opinion on the subject. This amendment was lost by 17 to 46; the dissentient magistrates then left the room, and the original resolution was thereupon carried by the magistrates who remained. He thought he had shown that, as to the local question, the majority were in favour of the riding being divided. The question which it was more important to consider, however, was the bearing of this matter upon the interests of the empire at large. The general desirability of dividing large counties was one of the few subjects upon which the late Sir Robert Peel and the noble Lord the Member for the City of London were agreed at the time of the Reform Bill. Why, then, should not the West Riding of Yorkshire be divided in accordance with the wish of the rural inhabitants? Mr. Mill, in his

Essay on Representative Government, said that it was important that minorities should be heard in that House. Now, but for the accident that they had found a representative in the hon Baronet who sat for the county (Sir John Ramsden), who was not elected by them, the Conservatives of the West Riding would be entirely unrepresented. There were, however, among the Conservatives 13,500 electors, or more than the whole number of Liberal electors, who in the boroughs returned 12 Members. It was not right that so large a number of persons should be without a Member to represent them. The legal expenses on each side of contesting the West Riding were not under £15,000, and there were other expenses, not defrayed in the ordinary course, which left the actual amount little short of £20,000. What might be done on the Liberal side he could not say, but the expenses of the Conservative candidate at the last election were defrayed by public subscription. But it was too much to suppose that even the patriotism or the love of fighting which prevailed among Yorkshiremen would induce them to subscribe as liberally every time it pleased the noble Lord at the head of the Government to dissolve Parliament; and, therefore, practically the representation of the West Riding would be left in the hands of a few wealthy men—an arrangement which did not seem to him desirable on public grounds. Having made out a strong case for the four Members and for the division of the country, he next came to the question as to how it should be divided. Two proposals had been made for dividing the West Riding, the one by Lord Derby's Government in 1852; the other by Lord Aberdeen in 1854, both of them fair enough, but he preferred not from any fear of the supposition of being influenced by party motives, but because it was more in accordance with old local boundaries, to adopt the line of demarcation marked out in the Bill proposed by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London in 1854. It was a painful thing that the change which he desired could not be made without damaging somebody else, and he wished there were more seats to be disposed of. It would be unjust totally to disfranchise boroughs like Wakefield and Gloucester, because the balance between counties and boroughs as settled in 1832 would thereby be destroyed; but if only one Member were left to each of those boroughs they would still be in as good a position as Birkenhead. Taking a lesson from the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer it might be desirable to embody in the same Bill proposals for the disfranchisement of one place and the enfranchisement of another. Coming then to Chelsea and Kensington they were not entitled either by population or wealth to the increased representation which it was proposed to confer on them. They had already no less than 1,500 votes in the county of Middlesex, which was as large a proportion as Yorkshire would have if divided as he proposed. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London objected to the disfranchisement of voters contemplated by the Bill of the Earl of Derby, and stated, and truly stated, how electors were in the habit of placing a higher value on a county than a borough vote; and, surely, if this was the case anywhere it was so in Middlesex. But if Chelsea and Kensington were created into a borough, 726 occupiers of mansions in Belgravia, with a £50 qualification, would be disfranchised in the county of Middlesex, while they would be swamped in the borough representation by the number of small houses. To support his Motion he had no party such as the Irish or Scotch Members; but "Thrice armed is he who hath his quarrel just," and he trusted entirely to the fairness and justice of the House, which in the end would never fail. He had no wish, in moving the postponement of the clause, to do anything hostile to the Government. He only asked them, having done the best they could for Chelsea and Kensington, and having failed, and fail they would, to fall back on their own proposition, made in 1854, which gave two Members to the West Riding. He had no personal antipathy to metropolitan Members, who were often spoken of in that House as if they were a distinct species, though, in point of fact, he saw before him several of them who had previously represented other constituencies. But he objected to the scheme for giving a separate representation to Chelsea and Kensington, because he believed he had made out a stronger case. He thanked the House for the hearing which they had granted him, and he thanked them the more because he was not always tolerant of other people's speeches; for, not being in the habit of making speeches in order that his constituents or his wife might read them the next morning in the newspapers, he had little sympathy with hon. Members who did so. He begged to move that the clause be postponed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS did not think the hon. Member for Knaresborough had shown grounds for his Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman wished to propose that a second Member should be given to the West Riding, he might have made a Motion to that effect, and if the House had decided on giving the West Riding two Members, the propositions contained in the Bill might have been modified in such a manner as would give effect to that decision. He did not think, therefore, that the hon. and learned Member had shown any reason for a departure from the ordinary course, which was to take this clause in its order. Coming to the question raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he must remind hon. Members that they had to deal with a limited number of seats. There was no proposal for a further disfranchisement. The one they had to consider was for the distribution of four seats, which, in consequence of former disfranchisement, were now at the disposal of the House. If the Government had not brought forward a proposal for disposing of those seats it was certain the question would have been raised by independent Members. Two had given notices on the subject—his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means with respect to the borough of Salford, and his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex with respect to Chelsea and Kensington. It, therefore, appeared to the Government that it was better for them to propose a scheme dealing with the four seats in one Bill. The seats which had been forfeited were four borough seats, and some hon. Members thought they ought to be redistributed to boroughs; but the Government considered the fairest arrangement to be that by which two of them should be given to counties and two to boroughs. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to disturb that proposal and to give three seats to counties and only one to a borough. The Government objected to such an alteration. He was aware that on a subject of this kind all professions of impartiality and absence from political feeling were received with great incredulity; but, notwithstanding that, he must assert with sincerity that in making this proposal Her Majesty's Government were not actuated by party feeling. He thought the House might be disposed to give more credit than was usually accorded to such assertions when he alluded to the four places seriatim. With respect to the West Riding it was a matter of notoriety that Members of different political opinions had represented it within a limited time, which showed that the political interests of the West Riding were not far from being evenly balanced. The same division of interests prevailed also in South Lancashire. As to Birkenhead, they could only judge of what would be the position of parties there from their position in Liverpool, of which it might be considered a suburb; and it was well known that in Liverpool the two great parties into which this country was divided had in recent times alternately triumphed, and in Liverpool political opinions were balanced. With respect to the proposed metropolitan borough, they knew that the metropolitan boroughs occasionally returned Members who were not very strong in their adhesion to political party; and, therefore, there was no ground for supposing that the Government made these proposals with any party feeling. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the claims of the West Riding would be disregarded, and a gross injustice done to it, if his proposal for giving it two additional Members were not agreed to it. He did not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled to hold that language. The Government had but a small balance in bank to draw on; and if one-fourth of all in their possession was given to the West Riding, he did not think that the constituency of that portion of the empire would have any cause of complaint. If two Members were given to the West Riding, South Lancashire might consider itself entitled to two additional Members; for, while according to the census of 1851 the total population of the West Riding was 1,315,000, that of South Lancashire was 1,570,000. He hoped, therefore, that the House would concur with him in thinking that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member was one to which they ought not to give their assent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the right hon. Gentleman had spent some little time in defending what certainly he (Lord John Manners) did not mean to impugn, and what he did not understand his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Knaresborough, in his singularly able statement, to impugn—namely, the impartiality of the motives of the Government in their proposed disposal of these four seats; but the right hon. Gentleman had not said one single word in regard to the principle on which the proposal to add to what was called "the Unicorn" representation was founded. In 1832 an arrangement was adopted by which a certain number of counties—seven in number—which were considered so small as to make such a plan desirable, were to have three Members. It was now proposed to give three Members to the West Riding and South Lancashire because they were so large. He could not think that a good reason for the extension of that anomalous system of representation. A temporary inconvenience in the case of the West Riding, or of any other part of the empire, was as nothing compared with the enormous mischief that would arise from the establishment of the system of giving three Members to a vast constituency. The great mischief now felt was the enormous expense and the frightful tear and wear which those were subjected to who wished to represent large masses of electors. The same evil was very strongly felt on the other side of the Atlantic, and the consequence was that the best men of America were driven into private life. The evil was year after year growing in this country, and he contended that it was the height of madness in any of their measures of Reform to take a course that would rather aggravate than diminish it. His hon. Friend had pointed out the enormous population of the West Riding, and the expense incurred in contesting it, which placed the representation beyond the reach of those possessed of ordinary means. The practical remedy would be to diminish the area by dividing the riding, and so bring the population within the reach of country gentlemen of ordinary means who wished to represent the two divisions. Was it a movement in a Liberal direction to place the West Riding in such a position that no one but a millionaire, or a person supplied by his friends with the wealth of a millionaire for the time being, could pretend to represent it? Was it for the interest of the Liberal party that none but men of immense wealth should represent certain constituencies? The right hon. Gentleman said that if the West Riding of Yorkshire were divided a similar claim would be put in for South Lancashire, but the fact was that the population of South Lancashire in 1851, excluding those who were represented in the boroughs, was only 500,000 while the population of the West Riding was then 794,000. At this moment the rural population of the West Riding was 894,000, so that in respect of population the West Riding had a decided claim of precedence over South Lancashire. But there ought, he admitted, to be no difference in dealing with the claims of the two counties. The Committee ought to deal at present with the constituency that was admitted to have the strongest claim—namely, the West Riding; and, if the prospects held out of a speedy reconstruction of our representative system were to be realized, South Lancashire would only have to wait a short time to be dealt with in the same intelligible and satisfactory manner. He, therefore, called on the Committee not to settle the question with a regard to mere temporary convenience, but to take a wider and more comprehensive view of the subject, and to give it an intelligent and principled decision.

MR. THOMPSON said, he would not dispute the statistics of the hon. Member for Knaresborough, but would observe that, admitting them to be correct, and assuming that there ought to be two additional Members given to the West Riding, it was not necessary to divide the riding into two. There was a strong feeling in the West Riding itself against such a division. The feeling was even against two additional seats if accompanied by a division. A very large portion of the population of the West Riding was contained in the villages and small towns, and it was that portion which distinguished the constituency so much from that of other places. To divide the West Riding would be to take away one of those leading features of the representation of the country which it was desirable to preserve. If the West Riding were divided it would no longer be a leading constituency; and one consequence of that would be that it would not have that weight with the country which the decisions of an enormous undivided constituency were known to possess. The decision of such a constituency at a general election gave an impetus to a cause that the decisions of half a dozen small boroughs could never exert. If they divided the West Riding they would lose altogether the massive character of that great constituency; and he could not help thinking it most desirable to have the opportunity of consulting large masses of the people when some great question of civil or religious liberty was at stake.

which would, as on previous occasions, go far to decide it at once and for ever. The hon. Member for Knaresborough stated that at a meeting of magistrates of the West Riding, called to consider this question, two-thirds of those present were in favour of dividing the constituency. He did not question that it was so. At the same time, it must be recollected that those who attended that meeting formed a very small minority of the magistrates of the West Riding. The great argument in favour of division was the expenses necessarily attending elections in all large constituencies. He was quite aware of that expense. At the last election for the West Riding the strictly legal expenses of both sides amounted to not less than £30,000. That was a great evil, undoubtedly, though perhaps, under the existing code of election law, it was unavoidable; but when an evil reached a certain magnitude it often found a cure. Many ways suggested themselves by which the two parties might come to some agreement, and whereby a portion of the legal expenses could be saved. The great advantages, however, arising from the declaration of public opinion on matters of wide political interest by a large constituency more than counterbalanced the evils; and especially as there was a strong feeling in the West Riding that the constituency should not be divided, he should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Knaresborough.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he did not rise to prolong the discussion further than to state that he believed that there was a very general opinion amongst all classes of electors in favour of the division of the West Riding, which had become almost unmanageable for election purposes. The hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Thompson), he believed, was Chairman of the Liberal Association of the West Riding. At the same time, he did not impute to him any political motive in opposing the division, for he did not think that would change the representation in any way. But, no doubt, he spoke as the organ of Leeds on this occasion. The hon. Member for Knaresborough had gone into the whole question so fully that he did not think it necessary to follow him; but he honestly believed that there was a feeling on the part of the West Riding that it should be divided into two parts. It was not for him to say what that division should be, but if the Committee thought it desirable to divide the constituency he was quite sure they would not be acting contrary to their wishes.

MR. BAINES said, he felt bound to confirm the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Thompson), and the fact which had been alluded to of his hon. Friend being Chairman of the Liberal Association of the West Riding gave great weight to that opinion. The Liberal party generally were in favour of the maintenance of the West Riding as a distinct unity. They did not wish for a division. It was not a Leeds question. It was felt to be as important in the remote parts of Saddleworth as in Leeds. He admitted that the Conservatives were much more in favour of division than the Liberal party; but, so far as he ever heard, a very large majority of the Liberal electors of the West Riding were in favour of maintaining that great constituency, of which they were proud, in its undivided state. The hon. Member for Knaresborough appeared to consider that the West Riding was entitled to have two Members added to its representation, and that the Metropolis should have none. If the question were to be argued upon the principle of equal electoral districts, a great deal, undoubtedly, might be said in favour of the proposition, but he apprehended that the hon. Member was about the last man in the House who would argue the question upon that principle, as it would have the effect of entirely and immediately annihilating the borough he represented. The hon. Member in arguing upon arithmetical grounds was distinctly condemned by his own figures. The population of the West Riding was 1,500,000, whilst that of the Metropolis was 2,800,000. But they had eighteen Members each, including county and borough representatives. And yet his hon. Friend came forward on the arithmetical principle and claimed two out of the four seats for the West Riding, alleging that the Metropolis should have none. He (Mr. Baines) had not the least objection to the West Riding having two additional Members in any comprehensive measure involving a general redistribution of seats, but if it claimed two out of the four seats now in question, South Lancashire certainly had an equal claim to the other two, and then the boroughs which the Government proposed to enfranchise would be entirely excluded, and the four borough seats would be apportioned to counties. When two boroughs were to be disfranchised, the hon. Member for Knaresborough claimed the representatives for the counties. Such a proposal he thought distinctly opposed to constitutional principles. The proposal of the Government was a very fair and equitable one. He should be inclined strictly and literally to claim the whole four Members for boroughs, but on the principle adopted generally by our leading statesmen of late he was disposed to consider that in cases of this sort something like an equal distribution should take place between the county and borough constituencies. It was said that the division of the West Riding would diminish the expense of elections. It must be remembered that the railways, telegraphs, and additional polling places had much increased the facilities of giving votes at county elections. So that whether they looked at the candidates or the voters, the labour and trouble were infinitely less than they used to be. The proposal of the hon. Member for Knaresborough seemed to him altogether unreasonable, and he should vote against it.

MR. W. E. DUNCOMBE said, he thought that his hon. Friend (Mr. Collins) had abundantly proved that alike in respect to property, area, and population, the West Riding was entitled to two additional Members; and neither the hon. Member for Whitby nor the hon. Member for Leeds would object to giving additional Members, but they objected to its division. From the representations made to him from various quarters he believed that a strong feeling existed in the West Riding on the subject. Although the polling places were numerous, the expense of bringing up voters and paying the large number of polling clerks, &c., was so great that it became almost impossible to find gentlemen who would face such an expenditure. After the various measures adopted by Parliament for diminishing the expenses of elections, it would be inconsistent if they did not avail themselves of the present opportunity of remedying so large an expenditure. The expenses of the elections for the county of York had been perfectly fabulous in past times before it was divided; the contested election for 1806 having cost the representatives and candidates £100,000 a piece. A much more moderate expenditure now prevailed, but, considering the number of boroughs represented in the West Riding and the number of freholders resident in the boroughs who had votes for the West Riding, it was no exaggeration to say that the rural population were not at present adequately represented. This was not a matter of party, but of justice, and he would appeal to hon. Members on the Ministerial benches whether they wished that the agricultural interest should not have a fair representation? He should give his cordial assent to the motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. DENT said, there could be no question that it was the desire of the town population that the West Riding should be united in the representation. On the other hand, the feeling in the rural districts of the West Riding was that the influence of the town population unduly predominated. As every interest ought to be represented in that House, and as it was desirable to diminish the expense of elections, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Knaresborough.

MR. BEECROFT said, that after the long and able speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Knaresborough, he would not attempt to enter at any length into the question, but there was one point the hon. and learned Member had accidentally omitted. He had not stated where was to be the place for holding the election, either for the northern or southern division. He (Mr. Beecroft), therefore, begged to give notice that in the event of the Motion being adopted he would move to insert in the schedule that Leeds be the place for holding the election for the northern division, and he did this the more readily as he should not like to steal a march upon Wakefield, in her present widowed condition, but Wakefield could still be left the place for holding the election for the southern division. He was surprised that his hon. Friend, who was so so well and so prominently known at Leeds should have neglected to put this in the schedule, and so have thrown upon him (Mr. Beecroft) the necessity of making up his deficiency. There was no town which could set up a claim equal to that of Leeds to be the place for holding the election. The claim of Leeds could on this occasion have no rival. The West Riding ought to return four Members and be divided as proposed. On behalf of his constituents, the people of Leeds, he begged to tender his thanks to the hon. Member for Knaresborough for the Motion he had made. He believed it would give them great satisfaction, as well as the electors in the northern division so proposed by him to be constituted. He had no hesitation in saying that in his opinion there was a general feeling that the West Riding ought to be divided into two divisions, and his opinion was supported not only on the ground of the lessening of the expense and inconvenience in elections, but on the still higher ground that the West Riding was entitled to this distinction by reason of its occupying the first rank among the English counties for territorial extent, wealth, and population.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that so many great West Riding authorities were divided in their opinions that the question seemed to be one of some doubt and difficulty. The Government last Session in their Reform Bill proposed to give four Members to the West Riding without dividing it. The consequence was that many representations, some by deputation and others by memorial, were addressed to the Government on the subject of the division of the West Riding. He had, therefore, had an opportunity of hearing the subject fully discussed last year by those who were interested in it. The impression made upon his mind was that there was a great division of opinion on the subject, and that that division was not conterminous with party feeling. Persons belonging to both political parties were in favour, some of maintaining the West Riding in its integrity, and others of dividing it. His right hon Friend the Secretary of State for India, who was intimately connected with Yorkshire, did not urge the Government not to divide the West Riding. So far, indeed, as political objects were concerned, it might be thought that the Government would be inclined to a division of the county; but they decided in favour of what seemed to them to be the predominant feeling of the riding itself, without looking to political interests. If, therefore, any hon. Gentleman shall give his vote under the impression that the division of the riding would be acceptable to a majority of the people he certainly would give it under a mistake.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was well known that he had paid considerable attention to the question of county representation, and in what he was about to say he was not, of course, in any way influenced by the peculiarities of the case of the West Riding. The object ought to be to secure the return to the House of as large a number of independent Members as possible. Now, he had the honour of representing a very large county constituency, ramified among a population of about 400,000, and he must, therefore, be well aware of some of the inconveniences which must attend the representation of districts comprising such an exaggerated amount of population as the West Riding. An hon. Member had said that the people of that division prided themselves on being represented by two Members; but, according to that argument, the constituency ought to be offended at the offer of a third Member. What was the fact as to these large constituencies? Why, that they were really governed by very small bodies of organized politicians. It was impossible for these leviathan constituencies to act without organization, and, it was impossible for a candidate to start without very large funds. On that ground he objected to very large constituencies. What he said did not apply solely to the West Riding, but to all similar constituencies. The Committee ought not to lose sight of the fact that the county Members for England and Wales numbered only 159, though they represented the majority of the people, and by far the larger number of householders, as well as the freeholders in boroughs; besides which they represented the greater part of the real property of the country. Bearing in mind these facts he should be wanting to the convictions he entertained if he did not cordially support the Amendment of the Member for Knaresborough.

MR. HADFIELD said, that Yorkshire already returned six county Members, while Lancashire only returned four, and to give two additional Members to Yorkshire would increase the inequality.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 1 be postponed."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 118: Majority 37.

MR. COLLINS said, he would then move to leave out the words "first of November," and to insert "from and after the passing of this Act." The object of his Amendment was this—the new register of votes would not come into operation till the 1st of December for the counties, and for the proposed boroughs no register would practically exist until that time. If it was desirable that the seats in question should be conferred on Yorkshire and Lancashire, he could see no good reason why the issue of the writs to fill up these seats should be suspended until November.

Mr. Beecroft

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that if the Bill were not passed until the close of the Session, as would probably be the case, the consequence of acceding to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman would be that the new county elections in Yorkshire and Lancashire would take place during harvest time—a period which experience proved to be inconvenient for such purposes.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that he proposed to leave out in Clause 1 the words "South Division of Lancashire," for the purpose of substituting other words which would have the effect of transferring one of the seats to a constituency in Ireland. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that, whether the element of numbers or valuation were taken into consideration, the counties in England were inadequately represented as compared with the boroughs, there being only one Member for every 64,000 of the population in counties, while there was one for every 22,088 in boroughs. Every county Member, he might add, represented an average valuation of £380,906, as contrasted with £127,274, which was the sum represented by each Member for a borough. Again, in counties, there was but one Member to every 3,187 electors, while in boroughs there was one Member to every 127,274 electors. As these seats had been lost by corruption, he should propose the transference of one to a county in Ireland where there was less danger of corruption, and in which the manifest disproportion between the representation of counties and boroughs would be a little diminished, for the interests of Ireland were essentially agreed to. But it had been admitted both by the present Government and the preceding Government that Ireland was entitled to four additional seats. Since the Union, Ireland had obtained an increase of only five Members, though her population had increased by upwards of 2,000,000, while the increase of population in Scotland for the same time was only 1,000,000. Including the two divisions of Lancashire there were fifteen constituencies, and if they looked at these constituencies of those boroughs and of the county, they would find that Lancashire was represented in a way that no Irish county was represented, not even the enormous county of Cork, which was not much inferior in extent to Yorkshire. Lancashire had four Members to 31,000 electors, that was one Member to something like 8,000 electors—not to speak of the representatives of the fifteen boroughs, in which there was on an average about one Member to every 2,542 electors. In England, taking counties and boroughs, there was one Member to every 36,612 persons; but, in all Ireland the proportion was one Member to 65,034 inhabitants, and in Cork county it was only one to 275,926. As to valuation, no doubt Ireland could not be compared to England; but, admitting valuation to be a fair element in the consideration of the equalization of seats in the same country where the standard of wealth was the same, it was by no means a fair one between two countries such as Ireland and England, where the one was rich and the other poor. But the fact was that much as these elements were talked of in debate, even within England, they received very little practical attention. If they did, how was it to be explained that Wales had twenty-seven Members, while the population of that country was but 1,005,721, the electors 48,908, and the valuation but £3,988,378? Could any one argue that Cork was equally represented with Lancashire, and that it ought not obtain one of those seats? It might be said that those seats were English seats; but that argument, if good for anything, was good for repeal of the Union. Under existing circumstances, whenever the Irish Members directed their energies to advance the interests of their country they were accused of jobbing and corruption; and every aspersion was thrown upon them, although they only acted as they were bound to do, for the advantage of the country they represented. But he asked whether Irish Members had done anything which other Members would not do under similar circumstances, and whether some hon. Members opposite, if they had not got their subsidy in the shape of the paper duty, would not have been found to oppose the Government? In like manner the Irish Members were justified in opposing every measure of the Government until they got what they considered was due to their country. For these reasons he was anxious that the case of Ireland should be fairly considered. The Irish people had a right to a larger representation. They paid taxes far beyond what they got value for;

and at the present moment £11,000,000 were collected in Ireland, and not above £4,000,000 of that sum was spent there. Money had been voted for fortifications, but not one shilling was to be expended on fortifications in Ireland. The defence as well as the other interests of that country seemed totally neglected by the present Ministry, but he hoped Irish Members would insist on them. All that he proposed at present was that the words "the Southern Division of Lancashire" should be omitted from the clause, in order that subsequently some place in Ireland or in Scotland should be inserted in the Bill instead; for, after Ireland, he thought Scotland was the worst represented part of the kingdom.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, line 4, to leave out the words "and the Southern Division of Lancashire."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that as the Motion before the Committee was to expunge the southern division of Lancashire from the Bill, and to substitute for it an additional Member for the county of Cork. The duty he had to perform in reference to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was a disagreeable one, because comparisons were proverbially odious; but it was necessary that he should compare the claims of Ireland and Scotland with those of England. As these four seats were derived from English boroughs the Government, in considering the subject, were of opinion that in their redistribution they ought to be given to English counties and boroughs; but in coming to this conclusion they were not at all acted on by any narrow national feelings or prejudices. If they had been proposing to Parliament any extensive redistribution of seats they might have considered the claims of Scotland and Ireland to an increase in the number of their representatives, but as they were merely dealing with these four English seats they did not think it right to disturb the relative proportion of the representation of the three kingdoms as settled at the time of the Reform Bill. On reflection the Committee, he thought, would come to the conclusion that that was a fair and equitable view to take, and it would, therefore, be his duty to oppose the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member. With regard to the particular county for which the hon. Gentleman wished to substitute the county of Cork, it appeared from the last census that its population was now 2,428,000, and South Lancashire was known to be the most populous division, having an increase of 397,000 since the last census. The Metropolitan County, including the Metropolis, was only 2,200,000.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that after having heard so often that an Irish county was just as much a part of the United Kingdom as an English county he certainly was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should see any more objection to transferring a seat from a Suffolk or Hertfordshire borough to an Irish county than to an English county. He thought that the Government had adopted a wise and equitable course in endeavouring to effect Parliamentary Reform piecemeal, because the experience of last Session had shown that the feeling in the country upon the subject was not such as would enable the Government to carry a comprehensive measure. The inhabitants of the Metropolis and of South Lancashire would have very little difficulty in making their wants and their grievances known at headquarters even without any increase in their representatives, but the outlying and distant portions of the kingdom did not possess the same qualities, and in a Bill professing to remove the anomalies in our present system that ought to be remedied. It was admitted by impartial judges that Ireland had a claim to an increase in the number of her representatives, on the ground of her population, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, in a speech to his former constituents at Kidderminster, urged against a sweeping Reform Bill that Ireland, on the argument of numbers, would be entitled to 150 Members or more. The representatives of Ireland were charged with acting generally rather as provincial delegates than as Imperial Members. If that were true, the arguments used that evening by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary would certainly justify such a course. The Committee should recollect that the religion of the great majority of the people of Ireland was Roman Catholic, and there was no chance of that religion being represented in that House except through Ireland. Moreover, when it was remembered that Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Ricardo, Sir Henry Parnell, and Mr. Joseph Hume, had had seats in that House for Ireland, it was not fair that any taunts of provincialism should be cast in their teeth when they asked for a fair representation of the country. He had been very much struck by seeing the same argument repeated in an article in The Times. It was said that the moment an Irish Member entered the House he ought to consider himself an Imperial Member, and in pursuance of that principle, he asked the Government to do justice to Ireland by treating the representatives of Ireland as part and parcel of the United Kingdom.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN would not enter into the very large question of the merits of Ireland as contrasted with the merits of England, as he only wished to deal with the Amendment. His hon. and gallant Friend had attempted to support the Amendment by most extraordinary arguments. His principal reason for taking away the additional Member from South Lancashire and giving it to an Irish constituency was that five seats only had been given to the sister kingdom since the Union. But the Committee should remember that the population of England had increased threefold in proportion to the increase of population in Ireland, and that the five seats given to Ireland had been taken from English constituencies. The hon. and gallant Member was too prudent to risk his Amendment by accompanying it with a specific proposition; but he said, suppose another Member were given to the county of Cork, there were 15,000 voters in that county, and they had only two representatives. The south division of Lancashire had 20,000 voters, and whether they took population, rating, property, or any other test, the claim of Lancashire was undeniable. He did not know that he was quite representing the feelings of his constituents in not asking for more seats for the county. The claim of Burnley had been admitted in every Reform Bill, and Salford had also a very strong claim for an additional Member. He hoped, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government would not yield to the Amendment and disappoint the just expectations of the county of Lancaster.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he could not undertake to controvert the proposition of his hon. and gallant Friend that Cork was the least represented of all the counties in Ireland. He wished it to be understood that if it were decided to retain the word Lancashire, Ireland would not be precluded from claiming the other seats. They had already decided in favour of the West Riding of Yorkshire—a county which he had before complimented by calling it the Corkshire of England. If they decided in favour of South Lancashire they would be giving additional Members to the two largest English counties, and there would be two precedents for giving an additional Member to the largest Irish county. He concurred in thinking it extremely impolitic in the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to draw such a strong line of demarcation between England and Ireland. They were constantly told that they were one and the same nation and one and the same kingdom. They had the same interests and the same taxation. Ireland was now subject to the income tax, and he voted for that measure mainly with the object of recognizing their unity. But this Bill was framed upon the principle of there being three separate kingdoms, and the proposed distribution of seats was only defended upon that ground. He had never attacked the Act of Union. Whether right or wrong, he had treated it as an accomplished fact. But still they could not forget how the bargain was made—how the owners of seats were bribed by £5,000, £10,000, or £15,000 to sell their country, and how some of them had said they were very glad that they had a country to sell. In his opinion an additional colleague was only an additional source of trouble and annoyance. It was difficult to take care of one's own seat, but it was infinitely more so to look after a colleague and see that he behaved properly. He was, therefore, disinterested in demanding another Member for Cork. To show the way in which the question was treated out of doors, he quoted the following passage from an article in the leading organ of the Government and of public opinion—The Times—

“When Mr. Vincent Scully reserves his protestation on behalf of Ireland it is only to prevent a bad precedent of allowing an opportunity for asking to escape. As to decreasing the representation of England for the purpose of adding to that of Ireland or Scotland the proposition is an impertinence. The matter was solemnly settled by the Acts of Union with both countries, and were it not for those Acts of Union it would have been long since agitated in England that the representation of both those parts of the kingdom is excessive.”

Of course the English Members were in the majority, and could decide, if they pleased, that Ireland was to be treated in the same way as England as regarded taxation, and in a different way in regard to representation. He protested against the Irish being made the hewers of wood and drawers of water, and being then denied all share in the good things which Government had to dispense. None of his countrymen were admitted to the Cabinet who would not consent to be by turns an occasional Englishman and an occasional Irishman, as it suited his purpose. He hoped that the present opportunity would not be lost of doing what had been acknowledged to be an act of justice both by the present and late Government in their respective Reform Bills.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he certainly objected to the line of defence adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in the present discussion. If his language were to stand, it appeared to him that neither Ireland nor Scotland could ever establish a claim to any additional representatives, however many might be the seats to be distributed. To such language he should enter his protest. If he thought such a principle influenced the Government he would certainly oppose this Bill at every stage. No doubt, Lancashire had very strong claims; but Lanarkshire, whether as regarded numbers, property, or rating, stood higher than any other part of the country. The population of Lanarkshire, including Glasgow, was 630,000, and it had only three Members and part of a fourth.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was astonished at the extreme jealousy of discussion manifested by the other side of the House, considered that the measure before them was, after all, the great Reform Bill of the great Reform party. He had always thought it most unfortunate that such a measure should have been introduced to bring out all those differences of opinion between the various quarters of the United Kingdom which had been displayed that evening. He was not disposed to vote in favour of giving a Member to Ireland, to Scotland, or any other particular part of the kingdom; but he should act upon the consideration that he had referred to in an early part of the evening. He did not think it would be any boon to the people of Lancashire to give them an additional Member; for his part he thought that they did not desire it. He should not, did he belong to that constituency; and for that reason, and that alone, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Queen's County, which was simply to strike out Lancashire. In voting for that he did not desire to express himself in favour of any place, but simply to save Lancashire from what he thought was an insult.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 67: Majority 161.

COLONEL KNOX said, he wished to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that the division bell had not been rung as usual, and that, in consequence, some hon. Gentlemen in other parts of the House were unaware that any division was about to take place.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he was not aware that the usual practice had been departed from, but he would cause inquiry to be made on the subject.

MR. BAZLEY said, that as the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey) occupied the chair it devolved upon him to move that an additional Member be granted to that borough. Salford now contained 105,000 inhabitants, and within its boundaries there was, perhaps, a greater variety of industry than even in Manchester. Six hundred years ago the town had received a charter from Henry III., and it, therefore, had the claim of antiquity as well as of modern progress. If there were an equitable representation of Lancashire, that county, instead of having twenty-six Members, would have fifty-four, and, therefore, in asking for only one additional representative, he thought he was showing great moderation. He moved at the end of Clause 1 to add "and the borough of Salford, in the County Palatine of Lancaster, shall be entitled to return two Members instead of one Member to serve in Parliament."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped to be able to satisfy the Committee in a few words that the Motion of his hon. Friend ought not to be preferred to the proposal of the Government. He would admit that Salford was in population larger than any other borough which returned only one Member. But then Salford was virtually a part of Manchester, being continuous with that city, and forming really more a part of Manchester than Southwark did of London. Manchester, therefore, might be said to return three Members, and if the proposal were adopted it would return four, while Liverpool, a more populous town, returned but two. The Bill proposed to give a Member to South Lancashire, and the hon. Gentleman desired to give another to a borough in that division, in which case two out of the four seats would fall to the share of South Lancashire alone. Birkenhead might be said to stand in the same relation to Liverpool as Salford to Manchester, and if one of the vacant seats were conferred on Birkenhead, the slight inequality which now existed between Liverpool and Manchester would then be redressed. He could not accede to the Motion.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would not press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Provision for Election of additional Member),

MR. COLLINS said, that after the decision upon the first clause he would not divide the House upon a proposal to omit the second; but it was his intention to move, at the proper opportunity, that the West Riding be divided into two electoral districts.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Chelsea and Kensington to form a Borough to return One Member),

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, the proposed clause would practically disfranchise 1,200 persons who were voters for the county of Middlesex. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London, when the Earl of Derby's Reform Bill was under discussion, held that it was most unjustifiable to deprive freeholders of the right of voting in the counties where their property was situate, and that outcry rang far and wide upon the hustings. If it were unjust to disfranchise one class, it must be equally so to deprive another of its present rights, which the measure not only did, but introduced an invidious distinction between the owners of freehold, leasehold, and copyhold property, disfranchising one and not the other. On the general question of giving a Member to Chelsea and Kensington, he did not see why persons living in the purlieus of a great town should enjoy peculiar facilities beyond others scattered over the country. Dealing, as they were, not with vested rights, but with new constituencies, they were bound to proceed on some more equitable principle than was laid down in the Bill. There was no reason that he could see why a licensed victualler residing at Kensington, in a house worth £12 a year, should have two votes, while his next door neighbour at Hammersmith had only one. He, therefore, proposed to omit the words "Chelsea and Kensington," leaving the question of the appropriation of seats to be afterwards determined.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, line 29, to leave out the words "parishes of Chelsea and Kensington, in the,"

SIR GEORGE LEWIS:—The hon. Gentleman has adopted rather an unusual course with regard to this Amendment. He has not made any counter proposal, so as to enable the Committee to decide between it and that emanating from the Government. He has simply moved the omission of the words; and, therefore, anybody who, for any reason whatever, has any preference locally, or from some other cause, for any other borough than that of Chelsea or Kensington, would be disposed to vote for his Motion. That is hardly a fair way of putting the question to the Committee. If he said either that he was in favour of giving a Member to the Scotch Universities, to South Lancashire, to Salford, or to any of the other places which have been mentioned, the Committee would have a distinct issue before them; but now all that they are called on to say is whether, for any reason whatever, they prefer any seat whatever to the proposal of the Government? I do not mean to say there is anything irregular in such a course, but that is not the usual way of raising an issue. If, however, the Motion in that shape be persevered in, all that remains for me to do is to state affirmatively the reasons which induce the Government to think it a fair proposal that one of these vacant seats shall be given to the metropolis. This proposal was contained in the last two Reform Bills which were suggested to the House. [MR. DISRAELI: Not in the last two.] Well, the proposal to create a new metropolitan seat was certainly included in the Bill proposed last Session. However, I do not appeal to that as any conclusive precedent. [Ironical cheering.] Will hon. Gentlemen hear the rest of the sentence? I do not think that any conclusive precedent, because I can readily conceive that there might be persons who would be inclined to support the proposal for giving a Member to Chelsea and Kensington, in combination with other portions of a large scheme, who would not support that as an isolated measure. On account of the great increase of the Metropolis, the Government have certainly considered that it is entitled to an additional Member. The population of the Metropolis within the limits of the Local Government Act in 1851 was 2,362,000. According to the census just taken it is 2,803,000, showing an increase within the last ten years of no less than 440,000. The Committee cannot overlook the importance of this great increase. The entire population of Liverpool is only 269,000; of Manchester, 243,000; and of Birmingham, 112,000. So enormous, therefore, has been the increase of the Metropolis during the last ten years that that increase actually exceeds the populations of Manchester and Birmingham added together.

MR. DISRAELI: There must be some mistake about the populations of Manchester and Liverpool. They are clearly wrong. That of Birmingham is 212,000.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The population of Manchester is 243,000, and of Birmingham 212,300. These added together would not be less, but would rather exceed the increase made by London during the last ten years. That increase is nearly equal to the population of some foreign cities, the capitals of Powers of first-rate magnitude. The population of Vienna, according to the Census of 1857, was 476,000; that of Berlin was 438,000, and of Madrid 475,000. [An hon. MEMBER: We have nothing to do with Madrid.] An hon. Gentleman says we have nothing to do with Madrid, or any foreign capital. In the strict sense I am quite aware that is so; but I think it a striking fact that the increase in the population of London in the period to which I have referred is actually greater than the entire population of some foreign capitals. With regard to the proposed new borough, the parish of Chelsea, according to the Census of 1851, had a population of 56,000, and according to the last census of 63,000, showing an increase of 7,000. The inhabitants of the parish of Kensington increased in the same period from 44,000 to 71,000, thus making in the combined parishes an increase of the population from 100,000 to 134,000. That property has increased in an even greater degree than population is a fact which must be patent to any one who observes the new streets which have been built. I do not think it would be possible to show any borough in the kingdom which has increased in so great a ratio, or which can show so large a population, as the proposed metropolitan borough. Looking at its connection with the Metropolis, and the great increase which that metropolis has undergone of late years, I certainly must say that I think the proposed borough has a strong claim.

MR. BENTINCK said, the right hon. Baronet had charged his hon. Friend with not making any counter proposal, but if he read the clause and the Amendments he would see that he had made such a proposal. His hon. Friend hit the right nail on the head when he asked on what ground congregated masses were to be entitled to the franchise, because that was the only point in the case. In defending the clause as it now stood, the right hon. Baronet brought forward no argument except the large increase in the population of Chelsea and Kensington. Therefore, they had a right to assume that he considered the question entirely as one of numbers. But the real difficulty of all Governments in dealing with the question of Reform was the injustice shown in the distribution of the representative power of the country, and until they grappled fairly and honestly with that difficulty they might in vain attempt to obtain any solution of the question. The rural districts were entitled to a larger share in the representation, and if they gave additional Members to the urban districts, they would only increase the glaring injustice which now existed. The metropolitan Members possessed at present, from their being generally in London, and from other circumstances, treble the amount of influence and weight of Members representing other constituencies, and they had, therefore, to be watched very closely. Openly or covertly they frequently sought to avail themselves of the imperial purse for the benefit of their own constituents, and it was difficult to resist those attempts. What would be the position of the House if the present dangerous number of these Members was increased? If the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was prepared to adhere to the principle of numbers the rural districts of the country were entitled to any seats which might have to be distributed. He hoped the Committee would reject, by a large majority, the principle in the Bill.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that he claimed the seat for Chelsea and Kensington on the ground of wealth and property as well as population. The estimated rental of the two parishes of Chelsea and Kensington was £657,820. The county assessment of the two localities amounted to £554,172. For property and income tax the two localities were assessed under Schedule A at £693,860, under Schedule B at £3,501, and under Schedule D at £342,413, making a total assessment for property and income tax of £1,039,774. He believed there were only fifteen of the represented boroughs that were rated at a higher value for the property and income tax on professions and trades, while there were 240 less, and there was not one of the unenfranchised boroughs that amounted to more than one half of what Chelsea and Kensington represented.

MR. DISRAELI: Before the Committee come to a division they ought to be satisfied as to the data on which the Government have founded their computations, and that they have given this subject all the consideration it so eminently deserves. Now, the ground on which this proposition is recommended to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman is twofold. In the first place, he assured us that the principle has already received the assent of both sides of the House, since, he says, it was contained not only in the late Parliamentary Reform Bill, but in the Reform Bill introduced by the Government of the Earl of Derby. I took the liberty of correcting the right hon. Gentleman on the latter point; but still the fact remains that having been recommended as part of one measure of Reform is made a reason for the renewal of the proposition. But I now come to a much more important ground, on which the more mature opinion of the Cabinet appears to be founded; this is the great increase in the population of Kensington and Chelsea, compared with the increase of the population of the principal towns and cities of the kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman gave, not from memory—and, therefore, he cannot claim any indulgence on the score of the failure of a memory that, we know, very seldom errs—but, bringing down the papers on which the mature judgment of the Government is founded, he admitted us to a part of its confidence and stated the important facts on which the Government has arrived at its conclusion. He gave the numbers of the population of Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham, communities whose opinions have exercised great influence on modern legislation and on the fate of Ministries, and I was perfectly astonished while I listened to his statements on a subject on which I should think no Minister, and least of all Ministers the Secretary for the Home Department, could be in error. I endeavour to picture to my mind what will be the result of the last census should the returns of the population be similar to those cited by the right hon. Gentleman. He stated the population of Birmingham to be 112,000. I corrected him, and said it was more than 212,000. I was not trusting to memory, for, after the example of the right hon. Gentleman, I would not presume to speak from my own memory. I have referred to the official Return, and I find the population of Birmingham is little less than 300,000. The right hon. Gentleman stated the population of Liverpool to be 270,000. I was rather astonished to hear that. There must have been a great change in Liverpool if that be the case; and if that change should continue the results would be startling. Referring to the authentic record of the Returns made to Parliament, I find that the Parliamentary population of Liverpool is what I imagined—443,000.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I beg to explain. I find that there are two series of Returns. I only examined one to-day. There are the Parliamentary Boroughs Returns and the Returns of the Superintendent Registrars of Districts. I have copied the latter.

MR. DISRAELI: I have no doubt that the figures which the right hon. Gentleman has read to us are very accurately copied from the Returns which he consulted, but then the Returns have nothing to do with the subject. The names he has stated are certainly the same as those in the Parliamentary Returns, but the numbers are not the same numbers. I cannot understand from the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman that he has thrown much light on the point before us. The point before us is this:—We have an important proposition regarding the representation of the people, and we are told that it is founded on a calculation as to the relative proportion of the population in different parts of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman, in support of that calculation, refers us to a totally inaccurate statement; and it is really no excuse or explanation that the right hon. Gentleman, misled by names which [are the same as those in some other document, which document, however, does not refer to the point in question, should have offered to the House a totally inaccurate statement, and announced at the same time that the opinion of the Government upon the question was founded upon that statement. I must conclude this part by reminding the Committee that we are told, to the astonishment, I am sure, of both sides of the Committee, that the population of Manchester was 220,000 only, when I find it authentically recorded to be that which all of us must have recollected it to be, 357,000—i. e., taking Parliamentary population. It appears to me, therefore, that so far as the right hon. Gentleman has answered the Amendment of my hon. Friend, the Member for Northamptonshire, his answer is of a highly unsatisfactory character. The right hon. Gentleman has answered the Amendment in what he has described as an affirmative manner—that is to say, no counter proposition, as he complains, having been made to that of the Government, he has laid before the Committee the grounds on which the Government arrived at the conclusion which they recommend us to ratify. Then, Sir, I assert that both those grounds are futile and unsatisfactory. It is not a fact that the late Government proposed that the population of Chelsea and Kensington should be formed into a Parliamentary borough. And the inference which the right hon. Gentleman draws from that is quite erroneous, and ought not in any way to be sanctioned by the Committee, and especially by hon. Gentlemen on this side. The conclusion which the right hon. Gentleman has drawn from the positive increase in the population of Chelsea and Kensington, as compared with the relative increase in Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester, I have shown to the House to be utterly erroneous. Then on what ground does the Government recommend this proposition? The right hon. Gentleman has chosen his own ground; he has made an affirmative statement; he has founded that statement on two points, both of which, as I have shown to the House, possess no foundation. At present, therefore, the Committee is in this position—we have a proposition of considerable importance and of novel character brought forward by the Government, and they have not up to this moment adduced a single argument or reason in favour of its adoption by the Committee.

MR. LOCKE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had misrepresented the arguments of the right hon.

Mr. Disraeli

Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. Baronet's (Sir George Lewis) argument was that the population of the Metropolis, and of these two localities in particular, had increased so much that they had a pre-eminent claim to increased representation. It was said that the Metropolis was too much represented. That the Members for the Metropolis were all-powerful. Why so? Because they attended in their places. But that was a strange argument that a particular class of men was not to be increased simply because they did their duty. He was at a loss to know why the seat should not be given to Chelsea and Kensington. Was it because the metropolitan Members represented thousands where other Members represented twenties? Having population, having wealth, and having immense interests to represent, on all these grounds the Metropolis was entitled to additional Members. He would not say that a conspiracy had been formed, but there was no doubt that by moving the Amendment in the way in which it had been moved, an opportunity was afforded to every section in the House that wanted a Member to combine together to deprive the Metropolis of its just rights. The fair way would be to pit the rival places one against another instead of taking the vote against the advocates of all the rival places combined, and thus giving the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle an opportunity of slipping in between them with his proposition in favour of the London University, without the merits of that constituency being tried fairly with those of Chelsea and Kensington.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: As some allusions have been made to me in the course of this discussion, I think I should be wanting in candour if I did not state the course which I intend to take. I by no means intend to run the London University against Chelsea and Kensington. On the contrary, I told those Gentlemen who asked me to bring forward the claims of the London University that it was my intention to support the proposition of the Government to give representation to Kensington and Chelsea, and that only in the event of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire carrying his Motion I would submit the claims of the London University, as contrasted with those of other places. I am not blindly partial to the metropolitan representation, nor do I by any means approve of resting the right of representation upon population only. I have heard my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield) state that the population of Kensington and Chelsea is 130,000, and that that population contributed to the imperial and local taxation no less an amount than £1,000,000 annually. That is a combination of population, of wealth, and of respectability which, I think, cannot be rivalled in any other part of England, and, upon the whole, I am of opinion that the Government has judged rightly in submitting this proposition to the Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) is constantly calling to our recollection the different proportions of rural and urban populations in respect of representation. The returns which have just been made under the recent census mark distinctly the great increase of the urban population, as contrasted with the rural population. I cannot say that I regard that circumstance with anything like satisfaction—there may be contingent danger in it—but it is still a fact that cannot be lost sight of, and I am opinion that the Government and the Legislature act prudently in not entering upon any extensive scheme of enlarged representation, upon the basis of population, only whether rural or urban. But still, bearing in mind from time to time the increase in these concentrated masses of population, I do not think that any favourable opportunity should be lost of somewhat enlarging the representation in accordance with the increase of population. I think that this is a favourable opportunity for taking this wise precaution in time. I hope I shall never live to see the day when, from dissatisfaction at lost opportunities with regard to these masses of population, larger changes shall be pressed upon the Legislature based on population alone, without reference to wealth, education, or other circumstances. This is a case combining population, wealth, and respectability; and I shall not hesitate to give my support to the proposition of the Government to give one Member to Kensington and Chelsea, even in preference to the London University, though by so doing I may damage the claims of the latter body.

MR. WALPOLE: I think the observations of my right hon. Friend afford a complete justification for the course taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire, and which has been impugned by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke). My right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle is going to vote for the Government, because he prefers to transfer one of the seats to Kensington and Chelsea, although if the Government should fail to carry their proposition he then intends to propose the transfer of one seat to the London University. Now, I am not aware of any other mode in which my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire could have brought this question before the Committee, in order to enable us to consider whether the constituency selected by the Government is that which is most entitled to receive it. That is a vindication of my hon. Friend, nor do I think any other vindication necessary. I will now pass for a moment to the merits of the question. Supposing that the opinions of a majority of the Committee should be in favour of transferring a seat to Kensington and Chelsea, can a fairer issue be raised than by submitting this Motion to the Committee in the first instance? Her Majesty's Ministers, through the right hon. Baronet, have recommended this transfer solely upon the ground of increased population. The erroneous and inaccurate data upon which they have proceeded have been pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bucks, but if the only ground for the recommendation is the increase of population, then, I think, when the inaccuracy is pointed out, the recommendation does not come to us with the same force which it would otherwise have possessed. I must say that, for once, I think there is a fallacy in the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. He represents to the Committee the great increase of population in the Metropolis, whereas the point he had to show was that as contrasted with other places there had been such an increase in the population of Kensington and Chelsea as to entitle those places to be represented in Parliament. Then my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, adverting to the forcible statement of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield), says that those places have a population of 130,000, and an enormous assessment, imperial and local; and, therefore, they are entitled to the right of returning a Member to Parliament. I am not going to say that Chelsea and Kensington may not legitimately be brought into a new constituency, but there is much force in what was said by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, that if you transfer that population to a new borough you take away the votes they now have for the county, which they might prefer to retain. My opinion is that if we are to give representation to Kensington and Chelsea the best mode of doing it would be to divide the metropolitan county into two parts, and have a metropolitan and a rural constituency. That proposition is not now before us, and I only mention the subject that it might not be supposed I have any objection to see Chelsea and Kensington more represented than they are at present. The question before us is whether, in the appropriation of four seats, Chelsea and Kensington are the places to which we ought to give one? My right hon. Friend says we must have regard to the increase of urban population. Very true. But what are we doing now? Birkenhead has an urban population. The West Riding contains a vast urban population, and so also does South Lancashire. It is to these populations that we are giving three seats, and it becomes a grave question whether you cannot give the fourth seat to a better place than Kensington and Chelsea. I give no opinion as to what place should be chosen, but as to the three propositions which have been made every one of them deserves most anxious consideration. We have to consider the propriety of giving a Member to the London University, or to the Scottish Universities, or whether the West Riding should not have four Members instead of three, which I think is an objectionable mode of extending the representation. I have pointed out the questions before the Committee, and I must say I think the reasons preponderate against giving the seat as is now proposed, and I shall support the Motion of my hon. Friend.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I cannot remain silent after the remarks which have been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He says that I ought to have satisfied the Committee of the increased population of the particular district to which we propose to give the seat. I did say that the entire borough of Kensington and Chelsea has increased since 1851 from 100,000 to 134,000. Compare that with the population of the largest unrepresented boroughs. Birkenhead at the last census contained 24,000; Staleybridge, 20,000; Burnley, 20,800; and Gravesend, 16,600. Therefore, as far as the statistical ground of population is concerned, the Committee will see that I made a sufficient statement. As to the error which the right hon. Gentleman says invalidates my argument, because I quoted from the Superintendent Registrar's districts instead of the Parliamentary boroughs, I say that makes no difference as to the argument I used, which was simply a comparison with the great increase of population in the Metropolis within the last ten years. That increase was 440,000. The Parliamentary borough of Liverpool contains 443,000 persons, so that the addition which London has received within the last ten years, is as nearly as possible equal to the population of the great town of Liverpool. The Parliamentary borough population of Manchester is 338,000, considerably less than the increment to London in the last ten years.

MR. BARROW said, the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Carlisle, had stated that while the population of the towns had very greatly increased, that of the country districts had not increased by any means in the same ratio. Might that not have arisen from the great preponderance of borough Members, and the consequently better manner in which the House had taken care of the interests of towns? The proposed borough of Chelsea and Kensington had no character but an urban one, as was shown by the fact that its contribution to the income-tax under Schedule B was almost a nonentity. It resulted, therefore, that the House was taking away the Members from four rural towns, and giving them to mere urban constituencies.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 172; Noes 275: Majority 103.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would beg to move that the Chairman now report Progress.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that if hon. Gentlemen opposite were resolved to go on they would do so in that spirit of fairness which ought to characterize all the proceedings of that House. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire had made a distinct proposition, not only that Chelsea and Kensington should not receive an additional Member, but that a third Member should be given to the county of Middlesex; and it was due to the House, if the discussion was to be continued, that the hon. Gentleman should now submit the rest of his Amendment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the next proposition to be made was not that for giving an extra Member to Middlesex, but that for giving a Member to the University of London. There was also a proposal to assign one of the vacant seats to the Scotch Universities. It would be inconvenient to discuss the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle at that late hour, and it would be better that the Committee should now report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I must say that I think the proposition of the Government a reasonable one. This is a Bill of great importance, and one of the main propositions of the Government has been rejected by the House, and I think the Government may require time to consider what course they will adopt with regard to the measure. It appears to me very natural that they should require delay, and I do not think the Committee, on reflection, can refuse the course proposed. I should, however, like to know from the Government what day they intend to proceed with the Bill?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: On Monday.

MR. DISRAELI: I think that is a very reasonable proposition.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY appealed to the Government to select some other day, as he had a Motion which stood for Monday.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses up to Clause 12 were agreed to.

Clause 13 (Limitation of Stay at School),

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he hoped a discretionary power would be given as to the discharge of female children at the age of fifteen. He, therefore, proposed that the word "male" should be inserted before the word "child."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that he could not agree to the proposal of the noble Lord on account of the expense it would entail on the Treasury.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 14 (Discharge of Child from School),

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he objected to the provision in the clause that allowed the Secretary of State to empower any person, whether a relation or not, to take a child out of the schools merely on undertaking to provide for it. It was bad enough that the Secretary of State should have power to remove a child from a school where the child was educated in the religion of its parents; but that was going still further.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he saw no objection to the clause, or any chance of its being abused.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that it was very likely to be abused in Ireland.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Yes, but the Act only applies to England.

MR. HENLEY said, he would propose to strike out the words which allowed "any other person" to remove the child. The provision would lead to proselytism.

MR. ADDERLEY said, these words were in a former Bill, and urged that it was not likely the Secretary of State would abuse his power.

MR. HENLEY asked if there was any instance under the old law of the power having been beneficially exercised? Let the Committee observe that there was no power to get the child back again under any circumstances.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he also objected to the clause as it stood.

MR. CAVE considered that near relations were frequently the worst of guardians for children of this class.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would agree to limit the power to near relations.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary should take time and consider the whole bearing of these words before he consented to omit them.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Maintenance of Child at School),

MR. AYRTON said, that by the clause whatever loss might be sustained by these schools was to be paid out of the Treasury. Considering how the Miscellaneous Estimates were growing up every year, it behoved the Committee to watch carefully any proposal to increase them. It was no use to object to items of this kind on the Estimates, because if hon. Members rose to do so they were told they were too late, and that they ought to have opposed the outlay when the Bill was before the House. He should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he had looked at the Bill.

in a financial point of view. There was no limit to the expenditure under the Bill, except the discretion of the Government. The working of the Bill depended on the activity and benevolence of private individuals, and they ought not to be induced to look to the public treasury to make up any loss that might be sustained by these schools. He thought it was the duty of the Committee to reject the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Member was mistaken if he supposed that any new principle was established by this Bill. Assistance on the same principle was given to the reformatory schools, to which these industrial schools were to be subsidiary. If they were successful in their operation they would cut off the supply of inmates to the reformatory school. Up to the present year grants had been made by the Privy Council in aid of industrial schools. By a recent Act, however, these schools had been transferred to the Home Office; and, unless it was the wish of the Committee to cut off the supply which industrial schools had hitherto received, it would be necessary to insert some such clause as that now under consideration.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked if there was any exception made in respect to children sent to the schools at the request of their parents?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS stated that at a future stage he would insert words exempting from the payments made by the Government children who might be sent to industrial schools at the desire of their parents.

MR. HENLEY said, he must complain that after the Bill had been passed through Committee pro forma great alterations had had been made involving expenditure. He wished to know whether any estimate of the probable expenses had been made? An allowance of 5s. a head would be a great temptation to parents to neglect their children in order to bring them into the category of those who were sent to these schools. If the money were once paid by the Government they would have great difficulty in getting it back. He was anxious that destitute children should be properly cared for, but parents should not be tempted to neglect their children.

MR. WHALLEY said, the measure was important, because it affected all the labouring poor of the country. He protested against the whole Bill as wholly uncalled for.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. ADDERLEY said, he presumed that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets did not propose to negative the clause, which would be tantamount to rejecting the Bill altogether. If the Committee were of opinion that the Treasury should be allowed to contribute something to industrial schools, the proper time for discussing the amount of the grants would be when the expenditure came before them in the annual Estimates. The power of contributing to reformatory or industrial schools was not limited by any existing Act.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH complained that the measure was an enactment for a new system of reformatory schools.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, the Bill gave power to two justices to charge upon the Treasury the maintenance of any children who were suspected by the police to be the associates of thieves, but that was a power far too wide to be placed in such hands.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD contended that it was clear from the clause that the expense of the measure would fall on the public Treasury. He should like to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in his opinion, it was a measure to which he could conscientiously give his sanction?

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the House ought to have some security as to the amount of expense to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this Bill.

MR. HARDY said, he would be glad to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was prepared to open up a new branch of public expenditure, of which they had no estimate?

MR. AYRTON remarked, that if the clause were struck out, it would not interfere with the means that might be adopted by the Educational Committee for the reformation of uninstructed children.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the clause involved, in fact, the principle of the Bill, and as he believed the principle of the Bill was good, he should support the clause.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought the Committee had been led away by the idea that the clause would involve it in new expense; but the truth was that since 1857 a charge had been made for these children upon the public purse, but last year it had been transferred from the Education Department to the Home Office.

MR. BARROW said, that this Bill held out a temptation to crime. He wished the children should be properly treated, but did not think the parents should be encouraged to throw them on the public. He thought its operation would be to place the Chancellor of the Exchequer in direct competition with the guardians of unions.

MR. CAVE pointed out that a portion of the expense would be defrayed by the parents, from whom the agent of the Home Office was enabled by the Bill to enforce payment of certain sums. This would in some measure diminish the expense and would obviate the objection that parents might be tempted to neglect their children. A considerable sum was recovered annually from parents under the Reformatory Schools Act; and it was found practically that dissolute parents dreaded their children being sent to reformatories for this very reason.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, all the arguments which had been urged against the measure might, with equal plausibility, have been urged against the Bills for carrying out reformatories. The real objection to the clause was not the payment from the Treasury, but the probability of that being a growing and unknown amount. As, however, the schools were transferred from the superintendence of the Education Committee of the Privy Council to that of the Home Office, it became necessary to have a different mode of obtaining the requisite funds, but as an estimate of the expense would be laid annually before the Committee of Supply, it would be easy to limit the expenditure if it was found to be reaching a dangerous amount. He looked upon the measure as an experiment, and the disposition of the Home Office would be to watch its operation with jealousy, in order to prevent any unduly extensive admission of children into these schools. When reformatories were established at first he had grave doubts as to their results, but experience had shown their value. He might mention that the Parkhurst prison for juvenile criminals was only half filled through the effects of reformatories.

MR. HENLEY inquired whether the grant was in future to be administered on the principle which governed the grants of the Privy Council—of giving money to those who gave money in aid; or whether the public was to defray the whole expense? If the latter was the case a new principle was at once introduced.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would suggest that, in order to allay the apprehension which appeared to be entertained, the words in the 15th Clause, empowering the Treasury “to defray the whole cost of the maintenance of any children sent to school under the Bill,” should be struck out, and other words should be inserted, enabling the Treasury “to contribute” towards the maintenance of such children.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he feared that the whole expense would fall on the public at large without the establishment of any efficient control.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and Question proposed “That Clause 15, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. AYRTON objected that the clause provided for the cost of maintenance as well as education.

MR. LOWE said, that since the Act of last Session these schools were entirely under the Home Office; the Council of Education had no control over them. No alteration, however, was intended to be made in the law. The clause simply gave to the Home Office the powers now possessed by the Board of Education.

CHIEF JUSTICE MONAHAN.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I must earnestly beg your Lordships' attention while I bring to your notice what has taken place in reference to an attack which was made by a noble Earl (the Earl of Leitrim), whom I am glad to see in his place, upon Lord Chief Justice Monahan. Yesterday, in presenting a petition to your Lordships, the noble Earl made most severe animadversions upon the conduct of the Lord Chief Justice and imputed to him gross misbehaviour in his office of Judge. On that occasion I asked whether any notice had been given to the Chief Justice of this attack, and the noble Earl replied that no notice had been given; upon which I certainly expressed some surprise, and perhaps some indignation, at the mode of proceeding which the noble Earl had adopted. Then the noble Earl said he would give notice that on Thursday week he would bring forward this charge against the Lord Chief Justice Monahan. Now, I find on the Notices to day this Notice, and nothing beyond it, that he will, "on Thursday, move for Copies of two Presentments to the Grand Jury of the County of Donegal at the last Summer Assizes." That is the Notice, and no more—not intimating in the slightest degree the name of the Lord Chief Justice Monahan, or what the charge is to be brought against him, or what preparation he should make for his defence. Upon this I sent for the Petition on which the noble Earl had founded the charge he brought forward without notice, and to my surprise, in this petition there is not the slightest notice taken of Chief Justice Monahan. It is simply a Petition from certain inhabitants of the county of Donegal, who say that there is Ribbonism there, and that there are disturbances in the county, without imputing any blame whatsoever to the learned Judge who was the subject of this attack. Now, my Lords, I do object very seriously to this mode of making an attack on a Judge. No doubt he is responsible to Parliament, and it is the duty of Parliament to censure or punish him for any misconduct of which he may be guilty; but it is equally the duty of your Lordships and of the other House of Parliament, when a charge is made against a Judge to give him an opportunity of defending himself. The only instance within my recollection of a charge being brought against a Judge was in the case of Mr. Justice Fox, an Irish Judge. That occurred, I believe, in the year 1804. I have referred to that case; and there I find that there was a petition charging particularly the learned Judge with misconduct in what he had said and what he had done, and giving him the most ample opportunity of preparing for his defence, and showing whether the charges were false or substantially true. Now here the noble Earl proposes, without anything more than a notice that he will move for two presentments laid before the Grand Jury of Donegal at the summer assizes of 1860, to renew the charges against Lord Chief Justice Monahan, which are loose, multifarious, and of a very serious nature. I did not catch them very distinctly, but I understood the noble Earl to complain that the learned Judge misconducted himself in addressing the grand jury and making himself a political partisan. I must implore your Lordships' protection for Lord Chief Justice Monahan as I would for any other of Her Majesty's Justices. I say that if the noble Earl intends to renew these charges he should state distinctly what they are, so that the learned Judge may have the opportunity of meeting them. No doubt, if the noble Earl on reviewing the circumstances, thinks that the learned Chief Justice has been guilty of misconduct, he can move an Address to the Crown praying that Chief Justice Monahan may be removed from his high office; but I hope your Lordships will take care that no Member of your House shall bring forward a charge of this nature without giving such an opportunity of defence as would be accorded to the meanest and most obscure among the servants of the Crown.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: The noble and learned Lord certainly expressed his indignation last night in stronger terms than are usual in your Lordships' House; and not satisfied with that, the noble and learned Lord has this evening repeated his indignation, as appears to me, most unnecessarily. In presenting a petition to your Lordships' notice last evening, I thought myself called upon to animadvert on certain irregularities—which seemed to my mind very gross irregularities—which had been committed by the Lord Chief Justice Monahan, and from this I am not in the slightest degree prepared to depart. But I complain of something more; I complain that it is the practice of the Irish Judges to make partisan speeches of this character to the grand juries in opening the assizes; and it is upon this general ground that I wish to bring this question before your Lordships. Now, however, by throwing down the gauntlet, the noble and learned Lord has challenged me to bring specific charges. I can only say that I shall be very happy to meet the noble and learned Lord, and to settle my Motion in any terms which may be suggested as convenient for taking the opinion of the House thereupon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that since he had remarked upon the propriety of giving Chief Justice Monahan notice of the charges to be made against him, the noble Earl had himself put upon the Minutes a notice, which, however, conveyed no idea of what those charges were to be. Now, surely, the Chief Justice ought to know of what he was accused so that he might be able to defend himself. It was the height of injustice to make such loose and multifarious charges against any functionary under the Crown; and to make them upon presenting a petition which did not at all inculcate the Chief Justice, or even mention his name, was extremely irregular, and was a course very much to be deprecated.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he was really quite at a loss to know what the noble and learned Lord wanted. He would beg their Lordships to allow his notice to be put off till Friday.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, what he wanted was that the noble Earl should state specifically what the charges were, so that the Chief Justice might be informed of the accusations against him, and might be prepared to meet them.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS. PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM begged the attention of their Lordships to a petition which had been put into his hands by a very large body of their fellow-subjects, the inhabitants of Plymouth, on a most important subject, the evils of intemperance, and the necessity of discouraging and, if possible, preventing these excesses, which all Judges and all inferior magistrates had so often declared to be the cause of crimes as well as of pauperism. In most instances habits of intoxication had this dreadful tendency, and in many cases intoxication was the direct cause of offences. Their Lordships were appealed to as the highest Court of criminal judicature by that meeting, over which the mayor presided, and the prayer of this petition was that considering the evils of the present system of licensing, there should in any measure which received the sanction of the House respecting the sale of intoxicating liquors be inserted a provision conferring upon two-thirds of the inhabitants of any district the power of preventing the granting or renewing the licences within the district. There had been a canvas carefully made of all the inhabitants of the great town whence the petition proceeded, and nineteen in twenty had declared in favour of the Permissive Law—four in five of the Parliamentary voters. It was remarkable that these proportions were not the same in the highest and lowest classes, but in the class of working men the vast majority was much the largest. The petition to the other House was signed by nearly 12,000, the largest number that ever signed a Plymouth petition. In other great towns the result of a similar canvas had been the same. Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, and Sheffield might be mentioned as entirely agreeing with Plymouth.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving the second reading of the Greenwich Hospital Bill, said he would very briefly state its objects. Their Lordships would remember that three years ago a Commission was appointed to inquire into the revenues and management of the Hospital with a view to render the funds of the Hospital more available for the objects of the institution. The Report made was of some length, and generally it showed that some amendment in the system of management of the Hospital was desirable. The Commissioners in their Report made a comparison of the relative cost of the maintenance of pensioners in France and England. It appeared that the annual cost of the maintenance of a pensioner in France was £31; in Greenwich Hospital it was £60. But the cost of the administration of the system in France was only £5 per head, while the expense of the administration of Greenwich Hospital was £28 18s. per head. This proved that some better system of administration was required. The Hospital was founded in 1694, under a charter from William and Mary, and its objects were stated to be the relief of disabled seamen, and widows of seamen, the maintenance and education of their children, and generally for the encouragement of seamen. Some of these objects were provided for by the out-pension system for which Parliament annually voted a liberal sum. Last year the amount was £230,000; and it was clear that Parliament considered that the Hospital was intended for the reception of seamen who were incapacitated by wounds or otherwise. The present Bill dissolved the existing Commission, and placed the institution under the management of a new Board of Commissioners, composed partly of ex officio Members; but the executive Commissioners were a "Civil Commissioner," who was to be permanent and resident, an "Admiral Superintendent," also resident, a "Medical Commissioner," not necessarily resident. The two last named to be appointed for five years. The accounts relating to the Hospital and the income and expenditure of the large estate belonging to the institution were to be annually passed through the Audit Office and brought under the direct control of Parliament. In moving the second reading he wished to state there were some amendments which he wished to introduce into the Bill, and, therefore, he should ask the House to allow it to pass through Committee pro forma, in order that it might be reprinted, and he hoped that all discussion would be deferred for the present.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NAVY BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that before this Bill was read the third time, he wished to say a few words upon a subject that was somewhat akin to the measure, and of which he had given the noble Duke notice. A few days since a right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) made a statement in the House of Commons which attracted considerable notice both within and without the walls of Parliament. That right hon. Gentleman called attention to the great disproportion that existed between the English and the French navies in respect of iron-cased ships. The pith of the right hon. Gentleman's statement was this--that while we might have by the close of the year six or seven of those vessels, the French Government would have a number little if anything short of twenty-six. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) ventured to think that so far from his right hon. Friend's statement having been overdrawn, he had rather underrated the strength of the French navy in iron-cased ships—he might have added that within the last two months the French Government had issued orders for the construction of a large number of steel or iron boats, which were capable of being taken to pieces and put together again with great rapidity, and afforded remarkable facilities for disembarking troops upon an enemy's coast. Now, it was true that France might be engaged in war with many continental nations, but it was obvious that in a war with these nations steel launches of this description would be totally useless. Most of the warlike operations of France would be land operations, and, as experience of the Italian war had shown, there would probably be facilities for a disembarkation in a friendly country. However that might be, and ingenious as this scheme might be, it was hardly applicable to a state of war between France and any other continental State. That, however, was not the point to which he wished to call the attention of the Government. He understood that the French dockyards, both public and private, were at this moment occupied not solely in constructing French ships of war. He understood that both the Italian and the Spanish Governments were having iron-cased ships built in France, and he was further informed that there were at this moment building near Toulon two sister ships to La Gloire, which had been ordered by the Italian Government, and which were rapidly approaching completion. It was stated, moreover, that two other ships of the same character had been ordered, and the lines were already laid down. By the side of the naval preparations in France it must not be forgotten that in the Italian dockyards, measures had been taken to accelerate the construction of vessels of war as much as possible, and the workmen employed on them were working extra hours with a view to their speedy completion. The Spanish Government also was understood to be taking similar measures, and four ships had been already commenced, while negotiations were pending for the construction of others. It had been calculated, as he conceived upon very reasonable grounds, that before the close of the year there would be a great accession of strength to the naval forces of Spain and Italy in the shape of iron-cased vessels. No one could feel any jealousy at this accession of strength on the part of those countries regarded by themselves; but if the supposition of a combination of those Powers with France were admitted, the question was at once changed, and such a state of things must be regarded as pregnant with danger, at least to our naval position in the Mediterranean. But while, on the one hand, foreign Governments had been proceeding cautiously, silently, and steadily, in the work of augmenting their naval strength, we, on the other, had been making no proportionate progress, partly owing to our precipitation and partly to our vacillation in our plans and policy in constructing our ships. He himself recollected that within the last seven or eight years there had been four distinct changes of policy on the part of the Admiralty. Before the Crimean war large ships of war were held up as the great safeguards of the country. But at the commencement of the Crimean war a cry arose for gunboats, and gunboats were built in large numbers, only, in many instances, to rot in the dockyards of Portsmouth. The gunboat fever then died out, and large ships were again resorted to, until within the last two years, when the policy of the Admiralty was changed in favour of building ships encased in iron. He understood, however, that within the last few days some invention had been discovered by Sir William Armstrong by which his guns could be brought to bear with such force and accuracy that the strongest iron plate would be pierced or pulverized by it. He knew that every system of naval architecture must be subject to changes of circumstances, and that new rules of construction must be devised conformable to them. It, would, therefore, be idle to suppose that what was suitable in one state of circumstances must be the best adapted to every other. In saying, therefore, that the Admiralty had frequently varied the forms and principles of naval architecture. He did not intend to condemn necessarily all change or thereby to impute misconduct to the Admiralty. But what he did complain of was a wasteful expenditure which sometimes occurred under the administration of that Board, which seemed to be governed by none of those rules of common prudence which any man in private life would be deemed little less than a madman if he did not observe. He would not weary the House by quoting cases, but as an instance within his own knowledge he would mention the circumstances connected with a dock at Malta. About thirteen or fourteen years ago the Admiralty ordered the construction of a dock in that island, at a cost of about £60,000 or £70,000; but it was built on the worst possible place, at the extremity of a creek, and exposed to the wash of the sea, in some of the most tremendous storms of the Mediterranean. Then, again, it was constructed, not on Crown land, but upon private property, and was surrounded by houses, so that in the event of war or disaffection it would be in the power of an enemy to destroy it. The work itself was bad, the stones after a short time opened, the whole dock settled, and it became evident that its ruin was only a question of time. It might naturally be asked, did not the Admiralty inquire into these facts? They did inquire, and were told that the mischief was attributable to an earthquake that had occurred at Malta. Now it was true that there had been an earthquake, but the collapse of the work took place two or three years before the earthquake happened. At this moment the dock was in such a state of decay that the first heavy gale might bring down the whole of the masonry. But this was the least part of his complaint. About two years since the Admiralty, seeing that this dock had been built for ships of a smaller size than we now used, determined to construct a second dock. For that purpose £60,000 was taken in the Estimates, and another Vote was proposed to be taken this year, which would bring the entire amount to £83,000; but, although they had been warned by the experience of the past—although they had seen the mistakes into which they had fallen in regard to the first dock—incredible as it might appear, they actually constructed the second dock precisely in the same place, and open to precisely the same objections as the first. It was not merely surrounded by private property, but was built through and behind the dock originally erected. There was consequently no access to the larger dock except through the outer and smaller one, and, therefore, a ship could not be admitted to or released from the inner dock until the one in the outer dock had been removed. Thus, a large part of the additional space thus obtained was literally useless. No ship could enter the inner dock if it was too wide for the outer, and if in a severe tempest the work fell in, the whole of these two docks would be completely closed for five or six months; and that, perhaps, at a period of war or of extreme emergency. The steps of the new inner dock had been projected to such a width that when the work was done no large-bottomed vessel could rest there.

Last winter the workmen were engaged in undoing the work that had been done at a sacrifice of the public money. It was proposed at first to separate these two docks by a sliding caisson; but representations having been made to them against that plan, the Admiralty gave way, and substituted an order to erect the usual dock-gates. Suddenly, however, without rhyme or reason, while the workmen were employed in constructing the gates a counter-order was issued one fine morning, and the plan for a sliding caisson was restored. In the event of a war with France—which God forbid!—and still more if France were supported by Italy and Spain, it was morally certain that there must be a great naval engagement in the Mediterranean. In that case, unless our arms were crowned with one of those overwhelming victories of which there were some instances in our history, both fleets must obviously put back to their respective ports for repairs. The French fleet could go to Toulon, and would, perhaps, be again afloat in three weeks. The Italian could refit at Genoa, La Spezzia, or some other harbour on their own coast; while the Spaniards could conveniently do the same at Carthagenia or elsewhere. But what would be the case with our own fleet? With the works at Malta in the ill-arranged, and, perhaps, ruinous state which he had described, we might not have a dock in the Mediterranean ready to receive a single ship of war, and we should have to send our fleet across the Bay of Biscay to be repaired at home. Observe the danger that must thus ensue to ships disabled, and, perhaps, in a half sinking condition, the risk of their being intercepted on the way, and the certainty of the enemy obtaining the command of the Mediterranean in our absence. These were matters which must suggest themselves to every reasonable mind that reflected at all on this subject. He trusted he had said quite enough to draw the attention of the Government to the dangers of our position; if these had been secret facts he should have been the last to publish them, but they were known and patent to all Europe. He did not wish to impute any special blame to Her Majesty's Government or to the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty, but he ascribed the evils to which he had called attention rather to the vicious system of incessant change and weak vacillation which characterized so much of the naval administration of this country.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, the noble Earl first called your Lordships' attention to the question of iron-cased ships, and referred to a speech lately made in the other House, founded on information furnished to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich by Admiral Elliot. Admiral Elliot went to France, and applied, through the English Minister at Paris, for leave to visit the dockyards of that country, in the same way as French officers have often applied for leave to visit our dockyards. His request was acceded to with the courtesy and civility which the French authorities always desire to show in such a case. They said that they should always be anxious to afford every facility for the inspection of their establishments to any officer accredited by the British Minister. Admiral Elliot went and saw all that was going on in those establishments; but I must repeat that, under the circumstances, I sincerely regret the course which he took on his return to England. If I myself had given a French officer permission to view our dockyards, and I afterwards found that he took the first opportunity of publishing in the French Chambers a minute statement of the proceedings in our dockyards, such as had been made in the House of Commons on the authority of Admiral Elliot, I certainly should not think he had done a very friendly act. At the same time all the information brought by Admiral Elliot was only what we knew before. We were well aware of the progress that had been made in regard to the building of iron-cased ships in France; and we had taken some measures, since our accession to office, for the construction of iron ships ourselves. The House is aware that the French had a considerable start of us in this respect. The late Government was in power in 1858, when it was perfectly well known what France was doing in the way of building iron-cased vessels; but they took no step in the same direction till May, 1859. Certainly some time was lost in these operations, which was all the more important because the opportunity of making actual trial of this class of ships was delayed. We have not yet been able to make trial of the first iron-cased frigate, although in a few weeks one will be in commission, and we shall then have more practical results than any we have yet obtained. When the present Government came into office we found only one of those vessels laid down, and a sum taken in the Estimates for another.

We ordered this second vessel to be built; and, not satisfied with that, although Parliament was not then sitting, I brought before the Treasury the necessity of at once ordering two more. I did not wish to go on building these ships until their effect had been tested; but, seeing the progress made by other countries, I thought we ought not to be unprovided with this class of vessels. Although we were necessarily ignorant on many points of detail, I subsequently proposed to build three more, which, accordingly, have been commenced. We have, therefore, now seven of these ships in the course of construction. We are now preparing some of our wooden ships for plating with iron. I do not think they will be very efficient; but these ships will be at least as good as the French. My opinion is that we ought to construct our ships of iron to be afterwards iron-plated; but the whole subject is one of very great difficulty. Every day brings out new points and new difficulties. When I came into office two things came upon us at once—novelty in shipbuilding and novelty in the construction of our guns. When I came into office in 1859, the late Government had ordered the Warrior to be built, but had calculated that she would carry the old style of arms. She was not calculated for the new style of rifled guns, but for the old style of arms. When I came into office my attention was naturally called to these subjects. With regard to iron ships, I saw various persons; naval men having a knowledge of engagements at sea and men of great experience in shipbuilding—with the view of acquiring all the knowledge that could be had on the subject. They said their opinion was that we should build ships of iron and plate them with such iron plates as would keep out shell though they might not resist solid shot, before doing this we wished to have some experiments tried. We had some experiments at Portsmouth, and one of the first was upon an iron target of less than an inch thick. The result was that round shot in striking the iron broke into pieces, but passed on into the vessel, and no less than 700 pieces of iron were picked up inside the ship. That showed that round shot produced as bad an effect as any shell. It seemed, therefore, that merely to case ships with thin iron would be to expose men-of-war to as great destruction as possible, while such ineffective would load the ship with unnecessary weight. We had no end of suggestions and recommendations. Some people recommended India-rubber, others a thick matting of hemp, others chain armour. The answer I sent to these gentlemen was that, if they would send their inventions to Portsmouth, we would try them. I myself saw chain armour which had been tried, and the very first shot destroyed it. India-rubber and hemp were equally ineffective. Last year it was said we should slope the sides of vessels, and shot striking at an angle would glide off; but when we came to try flat-headed bolts, the slope made no difference at all. That was the last answer I received from Sir William Armstrong. Then it was said that the iron should be 4½ inches thick. I was rather doubtful whether that would be sufficient, and I ordered the vessel to be laid down at Chatham to have such flotation that she might carry at least six inches of iron. I thought six inches tolerably safe. I now find that Sir William Armstrong's guns have fired through 8-inch iron with the greatest facility. In building these iron vessels it is a great problem where we are to stop. Thin iron will not do; thick iron is very little better. It is, therefore, very difficult to say how we are to make our vessels safe. One fact, however, is clear, and to that we have chiefly addressed ourselves—namely, if we cannot make our vessels so secure as we could wish, at least we should arm them with as good weapons of offence as possible, and by ordering that our ships should be armed with Armstrong guns we felt that we were taking a course which would produce the greatest effect, while, at least, it would be a safe mode of proceeding. With regard to these different experiments, the noble Earl says the Admiralty have always been changing their policy. Why, my Lords, the reason is obvious. The world is changing; alterations are going on everywhere. So far from the Admiralty vacillating, from the time we came into office we have gone on in the course which I believe your Lordships will say was the right and proper course for us to adopt under the circumstances. My noble Friend the other day said we were going on building three-deckers and laying down wooden ships of war; but what is the fact? The last three-decker ordered to be built was in January, 1855. It is quite true that two three-deckers were launched in the course of 1859, but these three-deckers had been nearly finished for a long time; their engines and everything had been ordered; it was, therefore, thought better that they should be launched, and thus whilst we obtained two wooden ships of great power we also made room for other work to be gone on with. Well, then, it was said why do you go on with two-deckers? Now, we have not been going on with two-deckers. The last two-decker ordered was by the late Government in 1859. The present Board have ordered none. But it is said the Admiralty is going on ordering new large wooden ships. Nothing of the kind. It is quite true that we have converted sailing ships of the line into steam-ships, and we have ordered small vessels—corvettes, sloops, and some frigates and gun vessels; but if you mean to keep up the maritime power of this country we have not yet arrived at that forward state in which we can leave off building. We have been building the vessels what we thought would be most useful, and we have ordered them all to be armed with the new guns, and, instead of carrying the large number of guns they formerly used to do, our vessels will carry few guns, but guns of great power. The noble Earl referred to our gunboats, which he said were rotting in harbour; but if these were armed with an Armstrong 100-pounder they would be most formidable vessels, and would serve most materially to defend our coasts in case of hostile aggression; while being themselves small they would present a very slight object of attack for the enemy. With regard to what we ought to do in the way of preparation, there are two or three courses that might be adopted. If there was any immediate necessity or alarm, we could readily cut down some of the three-deckers and case them in iron. I have had calculations made as long ago as in 1859, and I find if you were to cut down, say the Royal Albert, and case the vessel in iron, it might bear 4½ inch iron; but it would not then be a very effective ship—the ports would be too near the water, and it would not be so good a sea-going ship as I should wish the Admiralty to build, unless there was any pressure. Next year we ought to have better ships than three-deckers cut down would give us. Another course might to some extent be adopted. We have frames cut out for certain line-of-battle ships. We can easily add to the length of vessels and make effective wooden ships, which we can use hereafter as wooden frigates or as iron-cased ships.

Another course would be to order frames of iron ships to be prepared with a view to case them with thick iron. Then comes the question of what iron they ought to be constructed, and the best mode of fastening the iron plates. Every day new questions arise. I am unwilling to advance too fast, because I feel that we can advance much more efficiently by waiting a little longer. It is only a few days since the last of these experiments took place with 8-inch plates. I had previously considered that 6-inch plates would afford sufficient resistance, and I ordered 6-inch plates. I have great doubt whether the mode of fastening the plates is satisfactory. On that account, therefore, we thought a trial should be made before we laid down new iron ships on a large scale; and that done, we felt we might rely on the power we have in building iron vessels if the country once takes it in hand. We know what the private yards in this country can do. We could soon produce a fleet of iron ships far greater than all the other Powers of Europe besides. It is true, as the noble Earl has stated, that France is not the only country which is building wooden ships to be covered with iron. There are some being built for Russia. I do not know where the contracts were taken, but contracts are in course of execution for Russia and also for Spain. One wooden ship covered with iron has, likewise, been built for Sardinia. Austria is adopting a similar system. The French ships are for the most part wooden ships covered with iron. I believe the best ships will be found to be those which are built of, as well as covered with, iron. Ours are iron ships with two coverings over a large portion of the ship—one of teak twenty-six inches thick, and one of iron four and a half inches thick. That is how the Warrior is built, and I have no doubt it will offer great resistance to shot and shell. Complaints have been made that the Admiralty are going on buying large quantities of timber. We must do so, and especially we must continue to purchase considerable quantities of teak, if we persist in building our ships with teak coverings. Teak, I need hardly say, is the best timber for that purpose, because it is of all woods the least liable to decay. I hope I have made a satisfactory statement in answer to the remarks of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: The noble Duke has said nothing of the two ships built at Toulon for Italy, or of the two more which are ordered.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I cannot say what is doing in the French dockyards. I know there was an iron-cased ship built for the Sardinian Government in France, but I believe it was built, not in any Government dockyard, but by a private builder at Marseilles. I know nothing of the second ship, but the noble Earl may be correct in his statement. All I can say is, that in the fact that iron-cased ships have been, and are being, built for Italy and Spain, I see no great cause for alarm. It is very natural that other Powers should desire to advance as well as France and England, and we have no reason for believing that either the Italian or the Spanish ships are meant to attack us. At the same time, it is our duty—and especially the duty of the Admiralty—to watch the progress that is making, to follow our own course, and to apply to Parliament if Parliament be sitting, and if not then to take measures on the responsibility of the Government—to make such preparations for maintaining the maritime position of this country as may seem to be necessary. For that I am quite prepared. The noble Earl, in referring to the works going on at Malta thought it expedient to go back six or seven years. What has been brought to my notice since I have been at the Admiralty with respect to Malta is that we want more harbour accommodation there, not merely dock accommodation, but accommodation in the harbour for our vessels, for our ships-of-war being now built so much larger than they formerly were cannot ride where they used formerly to be moored. On that subject I communicated with my noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office, and through him with the local Government at Malta. The conclusion we came to was that the Imperial Government and the local Government should each pay half the expense of deepening the upper part of the Great Harbour at Malta, that the merchant vessels should be put in that portion of the harbour, and that the lower part should be given to us as the place most convenient for our fleet. We have sent out vessels to dredge the upper part of the harbour accordingly, and operations are now in progress for providing increased accommodation for our large ships. The noble Earl says that in the event of war the French fleet after a battle would go back to Toulon, while we could not repair our ships at Malta. That certainly is so. The French have great advantages over us in the Mediterranean, because Toulon affords much more ample accommodation than we have at Malta, even taking into account the two harbours there. Beyond those two harbours, as every one acquainted with the ground knows, it would be impossible to extend the accommodation, and they will hardly suffice for the fleets of England, if we must have great fleets in the Mediterranean. There must be difficulties in that respect, but this country has met difficulties before, and I have no fear that we shall be able to meet and overcome them again. At the same time, we have taken care to enlarge the harbour accommodation, and the local Government has met us in a generous spirit, having agreed to pay half the expense. We are cutting out stones for making wharfs and piers connected with the new works, and we have given directions that those stones shall be taken from a place which will eventually form a canal between the two harbours, thus separating the town from the rest of the island by a new channel of water. I have no doubt that the improvements when completed will prove a great advantage, not only to our vessels of war, but also to the local Government and the inhabitants of Malta generally. He hoped he had succeeded in showing to their Lordships that the Government had taken all necessary measures for the naval security of the country, and he trusted their Lordships would not hesitate to pass the Bill.

EARL GREY: I am sure your Lordships must have heard the statement of the noble Duke with great satisfaction. For my own part, instead of finding fault with the Admiralty for being too fond of change, I am rather disposed to blame them for being too slow in adopting improvements. What I complained of two years ago was not that we were adopting new inventions, but that when new inventions had been tried, and found to a great extent successful, we still went on building ships of the line which it was morally certain would never be used. I objected to that in 1859, and I think I was right in doing so. I did not mean to censure the present Board of Admiralty, because I was ignorant as to what they were about. We have now heard from the noble Duke what is the course he is really pursuing. I believe that course is the proper one—not to hurry on too rapidly with new inventions until they have been fairly tried; but, on the other hand, when there are new inventions which hold out every prospect of being successful, not to continue spending large sums of money in building vessels which in all probability will be useless; to make arrangements for the rapid creation, in case of necessity, of a large force of that description of vessels which will be most wanted and most serviceable, but not, under the influence of panic, to proceed too fast in the construction of ships which will not be likely to answer. Let me add that I was extremely glad to hear what the noble Duke stated with respect to gunboats and the smaller class of vessels. It is obviously not wise, in the face of the extraordinary improvements which are constantly being made in modern artillery, to build enormous ships in which a very large number of men would be exposed to certain destruction. I think the smaller kind of vessels, armed with Armstrong guns, will prove the most useful we could have; and in a recent visit to Portsmouth nothing gave me so much satisfaction as to see our fine fleet of gunboats in such a state of preparation. In the event of any sudden attack there is no force on which we could so safely rely as upon these gunboats, armed with rifled guns.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that before this Bill was read the third time, he wished to recall their Lordships' attention to the difficulty which was the cause of the Paper Duty Bill having been rejected last year, namely, the hardships which the British papermaker would labour under as long as difficulties were thrown in the way of the importation of foreign rags. He found from the reports in the public press that it had been stated by the gentleman who had been mainly instrumental in carrying out the Commercial Treaty with France, that when he urged upon the French Government the expediency of allowing the free exportation of rags, the answer returned was that they were then engaged in negotiating a commercial treaty with Belgium, and that until that treaty had been concluded they could take no decided step in the matter. The objection then made upon the part of the French Government had, however, now no ground upon which to rest, inasmuch as he found that the treaty between France and Belgium had been concluded. He hoped, therefore, Her Majesty's Ministers would be able to inform the House that further steps had been taken with a view of obviating an injustice to which the papermakers of this country were still subjected, owing to the difficulty which lay in the way of their procuring the raw material of their manufacture.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that urgent representations had been made to the Governments of the various countries from which rags were exported with respect to removing the very high duty on their exportation which at present existed. The treaty to which the noble Earl alluded as having been concluded between Belgium and France gave, he believed, considerably increased facilities in that respect, but he hoped the Government would be in a position before long to give some more satisfactory assurance on the subject. A point, perhaps, of even a greater importance than the exportation of French rags was that there should be a systematic collection of rags in this country. He was surprised to learn from an eminent papermaker that in scarcely any other part of England except the Metropolis was there any organized system for the collection of rags.

RAGGED SCHOOLS.

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY rose pursuant to Notice to move

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Names of all the Witnesses who, either orally or by Document, gave Evidence in respect of Ragged Schools in the Metropolis to the Central and Assistant Commissioners; and the Names also of the Schools therein visited by any of them.

"The same also for the Towns of Manchester and Liverpool."

The noble Earl said: My Lords, if the Commissioners had contented themselves with simply saying, that after a due examination of the ragged school system they could not recommend Government to lend their assistance, neither I nor those with whom I act would have said a single word on the subject. They, however, instead of pursuing that course, brought such heavy charges against the system, and condemned it in terms so strong, that if their statements be true, we ought, I do not hesitate to say, to break up the system altogether, as unworthy even of that benevolent aid which it has hitherto received. But then the question arises, are those allegations well founded? and in order to furnish an answer to that question it is necessary that we should have the names of the witnesses who gave the evidence upon which these allegations are based. In the first volume of their Report (vol. i. page 394) the Commissioners say—

“The bulk of these scholars appear to be children either of out-door paupers or of persons who can send their children to paying schools, and who would do so if there were no ragged schools.”

Now, here we have at once a statement that we are carrying out this system in a manner the most injudicious, and, if the Report be correct in this respect, we are, no doubt, open to animadversion. Again, in the following page I find this passage—

“It is indispensable that they (i.e., any class of schools claiming Government aid) should be shown to be likely to produce permanent valuable results, but this is not the case with the ragged schools.”

The Commissioners, adopting the language of one of the Assistant Commissioners, Mr. Cumin, and thus making it their own, further say—

“There may be one or two cases in which, under such unpromising circumstances, a boy or girl has derived benefit from a ragged school, though I admit that I have been unable to discover any.”

Now, I have searched through the Report to see whether the Commissioners, in making this statement, have referred to any evidence with a view to support it; but I cannot find that such is the case. I have, I may add, been informed that a good deal of evidence was given by word of mouth, both to the Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners, which does not appear in the Report; there being no reference even to the names of the persons by whom it was given. It is then, your Lordships will at once perceive, a matter of great importance that we should have those names, in order that we may be able to form a judgment as to whether the witnesses were persons conversant with the ragged school system, and whether their testimony is of a character on which reliance can be placed. There is one very important point, with a view to the elucidation of which I am anxious to have those names. In page 388 of the Report the following statement is made:—

“There are in England and Wales 14 evening ragged schools, containing 707 scholars.”

But I find that, according to the Returns for the same year which were given in to the Commissioners by the Secretary of the London Ragged Schools Union, that the number of those schools in London alone was 187, while the number of scholars was 9,465. It was, however, stated some time ago that when the Commissioners had looked into these returns they found that a large proportion of those who attended these schools were adults, whom they did not take into account in making their calculations. It is nevertheless the fact, that although there may be in the evening schools in London a very few pupils who are sixteen years of age, the vast majority were only thirteen years and under. I should, under these circumstances, very much like to know the evidence on which the statement in the Report of the Commissioners is founded. It is further stated, in page 608 of the Appendix to the Report, that the number of ragged schools in the whole of Lancashire was in 1858 only six, and the number of scholars 927; whereas, the fact is, that in Liverpool alone there were in last year 46 schools, the average attendance at which amounted to 5,822. I may add that Mr. Gillespie, of the Ragged School Union of Liverpool, with whom I communicated upon the subject, wrote to me to say that he had himself sent to the Commissioners a copy of a Report containing a statement to that effect. There is no notice, however, in the Report of Mr. Gillespie's figures. They are altogether omitted, his name is not even mentioned, and the number of schools throughout Lancashire is stated to be six, and the number of scholars 927. Now, I shall be very glad to have the evidence upon which these figures rest. The Ragged School Union, I may say, is in no way responsible for the provincial returns, and is responsible only for its own. The returns which I have mentioned were their returns in 1858, and they are utterly contradicted by those for the same year given by the Commissioners. Again, the Report of the Commissioners is not sustained by the reports of their assistants. In some parts it may be, but in others it is not so sustained. In the reports of the Assistant Commissioners I find what never would have been gathered from any part of the general report or from the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle). I mean a great many passages strongly laudatory of ragged schools and of the ragged school system. Mr. Hedley says—

“In provincial towns (his observations are confined to Newark and Doncaster) there does not seem to be any necessity at all parallel to that which suggested ragged schools in London and other large towns.”

Mr. Winder says—

“In Bradford the permanent pauper children are fairly cared for by the guardians. There is abundant room for the children of the criminal and degraded classes in the ragged schools.”

Mr. Foster mentions ragged schools in Durham and Penrith, but gives no opinion on them. These two gentlemen speak disparagingly of ragged schools as a permanent system, while they admit that good is done. The Commissioners, having quoted so largely from Mr. Cumin in disparagement of ragged schools, ought in fairness to have quoted from him passages which are in a great measure laudatory of those schools. So far as you can gather from the Commissioners' Report you would suppose that Mr. Cumin condemned ragged schools from beginning to end. Now, let me quote this passage—

“But, making every allowance, I cannot doubt that a very considerable influence for good is exerted by these Ragged Evening Schools, conducted by voluntary teachers.”

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I read the passage.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: I certainly did not hear it, nor do I find any reference made to this question, which was put to Mr. Jago, master of the Free School, Plymouth—

“Q. What is your opinion of ragged schools?”

A. The establishment of ragged schools has, no doubt, conferred a very important benefit on the ordinary day schools, by separating the vicious and incorrigible from the mass of the more respectable and working men's children.”

Mr. Hare speaks with disapproval of the ragged schools in Ipswich; he adds, however,

“The three ragged schools in my district are, most undoubtedly, confined to their declared purpose.”

Miss Elizabeth Twining speaks highly in favour of Evening Ragged Schools—

“They (the ragged scholars) often gain good characters in their first place, for diligence and willingness to work.”

The Earl of Shaftesbury

Why was no allusion made to the strong evidence given by Mr. Tuffnell? He says—

“There are a great number of children about London who do not go into either the National Schools or pauper schools; and I believe that ragged schools are of great utility in getting hold of these children.”

Then this important question was put to him—

“Is your experience strong with regard to the number of children who have been permanently improved from their attendance on a ragged school?”

His answer is emphatically, “Yes.” There was no reference to this in the general Report, and you must take the trouble of wading through several portentous volumes in order to arrive at it. Again, it was said to me—

“You ask why we did not apply for the evidence of the police. But we did apply, and the testimony of a policeman was given,”

Now, what is that evidence? Here are the words of Policeman Handcock, as quoted by the noble Duke—

“I do not know any facts which should induce me to say that ragged schools have diminished juvenile crime,” and there the quotation ended. When I heard it I was a good deal surprised, but I was not at the time prepared to make any reply. On referring to the original, however, I find that the quotation ended, not at a full stop, but at a comma or semi-colon; and Mr. Handcock went on to say—

I ask, why a passage was suppressed which completely reverses the whole effect of the sentence as quoted? Again, the noble Duke quoted this passage from Mr. Handcock's evidence—

“From my experience in London I have no doubt that the parents, if they chose, could afford to pay one penny per week for each child capable of going to school.”

That was quoted to show that the parents were in a position to pay for the education of their children. My argument is, that many can pay, but are so profligate that they will not pay; and it is remarkable that this opinion expressed by Mr. Handcock was also omitted—

“I think that those children who now pay nothing to the ragged school would not go if they had to pay a penny.”

Why was this suppressed? Then we come to Dr. Hodgson, to whom was assigned a part of the metropolitan district. The noble Duke quoted Dr. Hodgson as speaking doubtfully of the quality of children admitted. He certainly does. But why was no reference made to his high praise of the schools? Dr. Hodgson says—

“For those really unable from destitution, culpable or not, to pay even the present rates, special provision must be made in the ragged schools or otherwise.”

Again he says—

“That these schools provide a useful, kind, and a respectable amount of teaching for many children who would otherwise be utterly neglected is beyond doubt.”

[The Duke of NEWCASTLE: “Hear, hear!”] No doubt there was a laudatory passage in the Report of the Commissioners. At the end of the Report there is a compliment to all those who have laboured at this work; but it is a compliment to their benevolence at the expense of their judgment, and that compliment excited more pain than anything else on the part of those to whom it was addressed. Moreover, if the compliment be true the Report must be false, and if the Report be true the compliment must be false. I say again that the assistant-commissioners by no means bear out the general Report. Dr. Hodgson says in another part of the volume—

“The value of such schools is not to be judged of by the amount of knowledge imparted, or even of power given to write and cipher, but by their effect in taming, and softening, and cleansing, through sympathy and kindness, those young victims of others’ wrongdoing, and making them feel that they are cared for . . . and that even for them an honest and creditable, if laborious, future may be in store.”

Here is a strong objection taken by Mr. Wilkinson, to whom another part of London was assigned. He says—and this passage was quoted by the noble Duke—

“The short result of my inquiry upon this branch of my instructions is that in my district ragged schools do not sufficiently retain the distinctive features with which they were originally instituted; and that thus, while they give instruction to those who desire to receive, and often use it for a bad purpose, they do not supply a moral and mental education to those who most want it.”

Now nothing could be more condemnatory than this statement:—but only one page before the same Commissioner says, while hoping for the substitution of industrial for ragged schools—

“I freely admit, upon a balance of good and evil, the good effected by these schools largely predominates.”

Yet this was never mentioned in the general Report or in the debate in this House. I merely require the names of those who have given testimony, that it may be known from what evidence the facts and figures are derived; and, if the names are refused, it will appear as if the Commission has been pretty nearly a secret one. The noble Earl concluded by moving the Address for the Returns.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE:—My Lords, I cannot help thinking that, if the noble Earl desires to ascertain the truth in this matter, he has taken a very inconvenient mode of obtaining it. He has not only not contented himself with impugning the justice and accuracy of the Report, but at least half the speech he has made this evening has been a reply to the speech I made on a former occasion, and he has attempted to prove that I then read garbled extracts from the Report, with the view of establishing my case against his. If the noble Earl intended to take this mode of elucidating the truth, it would have been more conducive to his object as well as more courteous had he given me some intimation of his intention, instead of putting a plausible notice on the paper for a mere return of names. I so completely anticipated that the noble Earl would have moved for these returns in a speech of a single sentence, or without making a speech at all, that I did not think it necessary to bring down with me my own copy of the Report with the passages marked that I read in the last discussion. But, seeing a few minutes ago the noble Earl armed with a mass of papers, I sent to the library for a copy of the Report, that I might be able to answer any statement of the noble Earl. Now, first, as to the charge of garbling extracts—that is no light charge to bring against any man; and, therefore, I must call your Lordships’ attention to the circumstances from which the last debate arose. The noble Earl brought an accusation against the Commissioners that they had founded “foul charges” against the system of ragged schools solely on the evidence of Mr. Cumin on the only two towns he had visited. The noble Earl having been before that debate engaged in a newspaper controversy with Mr. Cumin, I knew what to expect. Now the Report, as far as it refers to the ragged schools, is not based on the evidence of Mr. Cumin alone, but on the testimony of forty or fifty other witnesses, whose statements fully justified the conclusions of the Report; and I read extracts from that testimony to show that there was much evidence adverse to the views of the noble Earl, and that there was none of that malignity which the noble Earl charges against the Assistant Commissioners. I read the whole evidence of policeman Handcock, who, I understood, was in the confidence of one of the most zealous promoters of ragged schools—Miss Carpenter. I remember distinctly saying, “I will draw out of the mouth of one witness most likely to be favourable to ragged schools a statement that, from his experience in London, he could not say that any facts he had observed justified the opinion that ragged schools have diminished juvenile crime.” I did not profess to quote all the evidence I could find on both sides of the question. The Commissioners impartially examined the question; they gave credit to the promoters of ragged schools for having done much good; but they adhered to the opinion that the ragged schools were not such establishments as ought to receive grants of money from the Committee of the Privy Council. That is the whole gist of the Report, and of the Reports of the Assistant Commissioners. The noble Earl says that nothing can be so unfair—that these passages from the evidence are not given in the body of the Report. But, my Lords, why do we print evidence separately from Reports? I am sure we all feel that, if the Report had a special fault, it was that it contained too many passages from the evidence. Had we encumbered it with more, we should have made it unreadable; and if we had quoted every passage for or against a particular system, we should have reprinted in the Report nearly all the evidence in the five volumes. The noble Earl has made one charge of an extraordinary nature, and has repeated a marvellous error. He says we paid great attention to the evidence of Mr. Cumin, but that he could not find any quotation from any witness favourable to ragged schools. Accustomed, as I have been, to strange inaccuracies on the part of the noble Earl, I confess I was amazed for the moment, and could hardly conceive that he had made such a statement—because I perfectly recollected that we had quoted the great supporter of ragged schools, Miss Carpenter. I turned immediately to the Report, and I find that, so far from it being true that we quoted nobody but Mr. Cumin, the evidence of Miss Carpenter is quoted more fully. There are nearly three pages of Miss Carpenter's evidence given. Perhaps the noble Earl has done it more politely than he did on a former occasion, but, indirectly, he has made as strong, as unfair, and as unjustifiable charges against the Commissioners as he did more directly, and most violently, in the former debate. I little anticipated the noble Earl would go over the same ground this evening; but, with the advantage of having had time to examine it, he has attempted to answer the speech I made in the first discussion. He says, as before, that we have used language with regard to the ragged schools that is unjust and unfair. He says he should have been perfectly satisfied had we merely stated we did not consider them such institutions as ought to be patronized by the State; but that we had gone a great deal further, and condemn them as useless. I read various passages to show this is not the case; all we did was—what has been done over and over again by the Privy Council—to state our opinion that, without an entire change in the system of grants of the £800,000 given to the support of schools, ragged schools cannot be included in the number. I will not read any of the passages I read on the former evening, but there is one passage I did not read then. The noble Earl says it is an insulting Report, as it compliments the benevolence of the promoters of ragged schools at the expense of their judgment, and that if the compliment is true the Report must be false; while, if the Report is true, the compliment must be false. But, whether that be so or not, I feel bound to read one extract from our Report which will enable the House to ascertain whether we have laid ourselves open to the imputation of the noble Earl—

“In order to avoid the appearance of ingratitude for service of the most valuable, disinterested, and self-denying character, we conclude our observations on this head by recording our strong opinion that no class of persons interested in popular education have conferred greater services upon the public, or services involving greater sacrifices of personal convenience and inclination than the managers of ragged and industrial schools, and similar establishments. We think that the time may come when these generous and charitable efforts may advantageously be replaced by a general system; but the fact that they first directed public attention to the subject, and that their labours showed the extent and urgency of the evil to be met, and the proper means of meeting it, ought never to be forgotten.”

I will ask your Lordships whether that is a mere compliment to an individual? If the noble Earl thinks so, his mind must be so perverted upon this subject that it would be impossible to convince him. There is, no doubt, a compliment conveyed to individuals, but we go further, and say, "that they have conferred greater services upon the public," and "that they recognized the evil and the means to meet it." That, I submit, is a distinct recognition of the good which ragged schools have done. It goes on to say that a time may soon come when the system of ragged schools may be dispensed with, and the public money should not be granted to those schools—at least, not to a greater extent than at present. I do not know whether the noble Earl really cares about the returns for which he has asked, or whether he merely uses them as a means of renewing his attack upon the Commissioners and myself. As to the return of the names of the witnesses and schools, it will be impossible for us to give any considerable portion. How far the Assistant Commissioners may be able or willing to give the information I cannot say, but certainly they would be justified in refusing to give it. We appointed the Assistant Commissioners, and we told them how to make a complete inquiry and report to us. We have not seen their note books of evidence; our Report is founded upon their reports. As I said before, our inquiry was twofold—first, to obtain the statistics of education and schools; and next, to ascertain the progress of education. Upon the first branch the Assistant Commissioners obtained returns from every school in their district, and, no doubt, they have the names of those schools in their note books, if they have not destroyed them. I am not at all endeavouring to prevent the noble Earl from obtaining the information he seeks, and if he wishes it I will make a private representation to the Assistant Commissioners to ask if they are willing to furnish information; but I do not think it would be fair for us to call upon the Assistant Commissioners to give up their note books to be scrutinized not only by Parliament, but by persons who had been unfavourably, and perhaps invidiously affected by their inquiries. The noble Earl will perceive from our instructions to the Assistant Commissioners that our object was not to reflect discredit or blame on any school, that we did not wish that the names of parties or schools should be sent to us, and that if they were sent to us, we should not publish them in our Report. Therefore, I am not certain that, as regards the first part of the noble Earl's Motion, it will be possible to give it; but I repeat, that if he wishes it, I will appeal privately to the Assistant Commissioners to give such information as they can with propriety towards others and with justice to themselves, and allow it to be placed upon the Table. When the noble Earl goes on to ask for some returns from Liverpool and Manchester, I am equally as surprised as I was by his statement that we had omitted all reference to the evidence of the friends of ragged schools; because he must have seen from the Report, and gathered from my former statement, that Liverpool and Manchester were not included in the specimen districts to which the Assistant Commissioners were appointed. The reason for that was, that in respect of Liverpool we had a valuable report from a reverend gentleman named Howson as to the whole state of education in that town, and we thought it best to send the Assistant Commissioners to districts which had not been so carefully inquired into. I may here remark as a singular fact, that Mr. Howson, who was totally unconnected with us, and was acting solely with a view to ascertain facts in order to lay them before a body established for the promotion of Social Science, he, I believe, never mentions the ragged schools in the Report. Therefore, as far as Liverpool and Manchester are concerned, it will be impossible to give the returns. I may, however, take this opportunity of referring to a charge made by the noble Earl, that a Mr. Gillespie, who is connected with the ragged schools of Liverpool, had sent us certain documents and statistics, and that we had declined to insert them. I have had no opportunity of making further inquiries, but I am confident, from the information I have, that Mr. Gillespie did not make those returns, and that all that were received from Liverpool were inserted in the Report. I must leave it to Mr. Gillespie to explain the statement that the noble Lord has made. It is possible that there are some slight inaccuracies. I know, indeed, of one in the case of the independent schools; but an admission of the error, which arose from the accidental omission of a vote, has been given under the seal of the Commissioners. The greatest possible pains were taken to insure accuracy, and in the case of the independent schools, we corrected a numerical error in the returns which had been sent in to us. I really do not know that I need make any further observations upon the speech of the noble Earl. My answer has unavoidably been somewhat rambling, owing to my having had so little reason to anticipate this renewal of attack; but I may mention that, so anxious were the Commissioners to be just to the ragged schools, that on receiving Mr. Cumin's Report, which certainly in its general character was more unfavourable to the ragged schools than any other, we thought that before we came to a decision on that subject we would obtain as much evidence as we could on the other side. We, therefore, sent out a series of questions to no less than twenty-eight individuals of both sexes in different parts of the country who were most friendly to this class of schools, and from the largest portion of them we received answers. Mr. Cumin's Report was also submitted to Miss Carpenter, who had thus an opportunity of making any remark upon it. With respect to the Returns now moved for, I shall endeavour to get as much of the information asked for as I can, and to place it before the noble Earl and those who act with him; and if he should then desire it to be laid on the table it will be competent for him to make a proposal to that effect. But, with regard to ragged schools, we have no wish to conceal or keep back anything. I find that it has been stated in discussion in "another place" that this Commission has been extremely costly. I hope your Lordships will not think it improper if I attempt to disabuse the public mind on that point. I believe that this Commission, considering the extent of its task and the wide field over which its inquiry was conducted, was one of the cheapest as well as most laborious that ever sat. It was stated in the House of Commons that it must at least have cost the country £40,000. Now, I have ascertained that, so far from that being the case, including the salaries of secretary, assistant secretary, and clerks, the salaries of the ten Assistant Commissioners, and the cost of what was, in fact, an Educational Census, the whole charge to the public for the Commission—the printing Bill alone excepted—did not exceed £12,500. I can only say if the object is not to prejudice the case, or to bring unfair accusations against individuals who have performed a public duty, but to elucidate the truth, then I do hope, whenever this Report is again called in question, be it by the noble Earl or anybody else, that notice of an intelligible Motion shall be given beforehand, so that as Chairman of the Commission I may have an opportunity of coming prepared to answer any allegations that may be made against it.

LORD OVERSTONE expressed his regret that these discussions had been raised, because they originated in the most unaccountable delusions existing in the mind of the noble Earl who had brought forward the subject. At the same time he must say he thought the noble Duke had thoroughly exculpated the Commission, and refuted in a wholly satisfactory and honourable manner the imputations which had been cast upon it. Having looked carefully over the Report himself he was entirely unable to discover any ground for the charge of violent hostility to ragged schools which had been preferred against the Commissioners. The terms in which it referred to those schools were mild and reasonable. He had had some personal experience upon Royal Commissions, and knew something of the labours and anxieties connected with them, as well as of the misapprehensions and misrepresentations to which they must be exposed. He could, therefore, sympathize deeply with the Educational Commissioners in the attacks which had been made upon them for the manner in which they had contributed to the elucidation of a difficult subject, and rendered most valuable and important services to the public gratuitously. He had to thank them cordially for the satisfactory manner in which they had performed a laborious and invidious task, surrounded as they were by great and various difficulties, and liable to misconstruction through religious and other prejudices. When the aspersions which had been cast upon them were all forgotten, the service which they had rendered by the well digested collection of so vast a mass of evidence, and the useful suggestions accompanying it would, he believed, live in the grateful recollection of the country.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in reply, said he had never complained that the whole body of the evidence was not incorporated in the general Report. What he complained of was, that the condemnation of ragged schools rested, so far as that Report was concerned, upon the testimony of one Assistant Commissioner. He was most anxious to obtain the names of the parties who had given evidence. The noble Duke said the Motion was informal; if it were so he should certainly remodel it. If the Government felt they could consistently with propriety give him the information he wanted he should be exceedingly obliged.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR advised the noble Earl to withdraw the Motion. He did not say it was informal, but if complied with it would form a very bad precedent.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY was entirely in the hands of the noble Duke. If he could not consistently with his duty give the information desired, he would submit; if he could give it he would, perhaps, be kind enough to do so.

THE DUKE of NEWCASTLE said, he had just had the opportunity of speaking to a gentleman who had made up the statistical Returns, and tabulated them for the Commission, having bestowed on them much laborious and valuable attention. That gentleman confirmed every word he had uttered in his address to their Lordships and made this further statement with regard to Mr. Gillespie:—No fewer than thirty-six forms of returns had been sent down to him with a view to a return of the Lancashire schools, but not one of these forms had been sent back to the office. Mr. Gillespie, so far as the office was concerned, had taken no notice of these communications whatever. The Commissioners were anxious to make the best statement they could for everybody, even where the parties had neglected their own interests; having no returns from Lancashire, they were, therefore, obliged to avail themselves of any knowledge they could obtain, and all they did take was the Census of 1851. But these returns were, of course, incomplete. The blame entirely rested on the promoters of ragged schools themselves, who were the best parties to furnish the required information.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY begged to say that he had been informed by Mr. Gillespie that he had sent to the Commissioners a copy of their Report for 1858, relating to forty-six schools, with an average attendance of nearly 6,000 children, which ought to have been included in the Report of the Commissioners.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 11, 1861.

VOLUNTEER CORPS.—EXPLANATION.

MR. CAYLEY observed that, in the course of the debate on the Volunteer Corps Vote the other evening, he had made a statement on a matter of fact which he found was not quite exact, and wished to correct it. He had stated that at the time of the massacre at Manchester, in 1819, the price of corn was 42s. a quarter. What he intended to say was that at the beginning of that year the price of corn was much higher than at the time of the massacre; that in consequence of the change in the value of money caused by the Act, commonly known as "Peel's Bill," which passed in the spring of the year, prices began to decline, accompanied by great distress, agricultural and commercial—that this decline in prices generally continued, together with great distress, till in two or three years, the price of wheat had fallen as low as 40s. or 42s. a quarter. The distress, therefore, was not owing to the Corn Laws, as asserted by the Member for Manchester, but to the change in the value of money, for great prosperity had existed for two years prior to "Peel's Bill," and again arose for a limited period subsequently owing to an illegitimate action on the currency in 1822-3. At the end of which time, namely, 1825, another commercial crisis took place, producing a general distress and discontent which produced the agitation for the Reform Bill in 1830.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would move that the Offences against the Person Bill, the Larceny, &c., Bill, the Malicious Injuries to Property Bill, the Forgery Bill, the Coinage Offences Bill, the Accessories and Abettors Bill, and the Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill, all of which were on the paper for Committee, should be referred to the same Committee of the whole House.

Ordered,

"That the Offences against the Person Bill, the Larceny, &c. Bill, the Malicious Injuries to Property Bill, the Forgery Bill, the Coinage Offences Bill, the Accessories and Abettors Bill, and the Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill, be committed to the same Committee, and that they have leave to sit till Four of the clock, and report the same at Six of the clock."

On the Motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair,

MR. AYRTON said, it was true a Select Committee had carefully considered the details of these Bills, but then a Committee upstairs was by no means a satisfactory tribunal to deal with any great principles of criminal law. The Committee was composed of a large number of Members, but some of the important questions involved were decided by only five persons. Therefore, he hoped that any question of principle would be raised in the Committee of the whole House, in such a manner that it might be fairly discussed, and that the deliberate judgment of the House might be taken upon it. The first of those Bills contained a proposition of such magnitude, and one which the House considered so important, that on a former occasion it had the effect of changing the Government of the day; and surely it was impossible that the House, at a morning sitting, should review and reverse that decision. He wished, then, that those important questions should be reserved for the Report. There was only one technical difficulty, that no question could be raised upon the Report unless some Amendment was to be made in the Bill; but as he understood that some small Amendments would be proposed, he would not object to considering the Bills in the manner now proposed.

MR. W. EWART said, that he had given notice of a motion with respect to the punishment of death, but it was postponed in Committee because the question was considered of such great importance that it should be reserved for the consideration of the House. He entirely agreed with the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. HENLEY said, he had understood from the hon. and learned Solicitor General that the Bills were not likely to come on soon, and he was therefore surprised when the noble Lord at the head of the Government made a statement that they would be brought on at a morning sitting on Tuesday. He had himself in Committee divided the Committee upon the fourth Clause, which was carried only by the casting vote of the Solicitor General, and, therefore, he was resolved to take the sense of the House upon it. However, on the understanding that an opportunity for so doing would be afforded, as suggested by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, he would offer no opposition to the course proposed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that he must express his surprise at the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) as to the effect of a recent conversation which had taken place between them with reference to the time at which it was probable those Bills would be taken in Committee. He (the Solicitor General) had not the slightest recollection of any such conversation; and, therefore, either the memory of the right hon. Gentleman or his own must be entirely at fault. He certainly did state in answer to a question put to him by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) that it was the determination of the Government to bring forward these Bills as speedily as the public business would permit. He (the Solicitor General) had given notice of certain Amendments which he intended to propose in the two Bills earliest in order, namely, the Offences Against the Persons Bill and the Larceny Bill. He had, likewise, some verbal Amendments to propose in the Malicious Injury to Property Bill, the Forgery Bill, and the Coinage Offences Bill. Therefore, not as a matter of concession or arrangement, but as a matter of right, it would be open to any hon. Member upon the report to introduce any Amendment which he might think fit. He had every reason to suppose from what took place in the Select Committee that no hon. Member would feel himself called upon to propose any Amendment in the Accessory and Abettors Bill. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee, and proceed to consider the details.

MR. HENLEY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman might have totally forgotten the conversation, but he (Mr. Henley) could not have imagined that such a conversation had taken place.

MR. GEORGE expressed a hope that every possible effort would be made to carry these Bills for the Amendment of the criminal law, through the House with as little delay as possible.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL. COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Murder),

MR. DENMAN said, he would suggest that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr.

Ewart) who had a notice of Amendment on the paper for the substitution of a lesser punishment for the punishment of death, should consider whether another and better opportunity might not be taken of discussing so important a question than upon a Bill of so limited a scope as that before the Committee.

MR. W. EWART said, that he would consider whether or not he would propose his Amendment on the Report.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought that not to go into the matter, while the Bill was in Committee would be contrary to usage.

MR. M'MAHON said, that if the Bill were passed through Committee, and on the Report a Motion such as that of the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Ewart's) were carried, it would be necessary to alter the second clause and expunge the third altogether, and then to re-enact others. He, therefore, thought it would be better to bring the Motion forward on a distinct occasion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it would be quite competent for any hon. Member to move an Amendment when the Report was brought up.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT suggested that the most convenient course would be to bring the question of the abolition of the punishment of death forward in a specific Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he wished to point out that if the Amendment for the abolition of the punishment of death were carried in respect of the Bill, it would only refer to the crime of murder, and there would still be several offences for which the punishment of death was imposed.

MR. BUTT said, he also would suggest the bringing forward of the Motion on a subsequent occasion. He (Mr. Butt) entertained a strong feeling that they should not pass a law re-enacting the punishment of death.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 2 to 19 inclusive.

Clause 20 (Inflicting bodily Injury with or without weapon),

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had to propose an Amendment, substituting the alternative punishment of penal servitude for three years or imprisonment not exceeding two years. The same Amendment, he explained, would apply to several subsequent clauses.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Remaining clauses agreed to.

LARCENY, &c., BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Punishment for simple Larceny),

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had to propose the same Amendment as in the last Bill, to substitute the alternative punishment of penal servitude for three years or imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Remaining clauses agreed to.

MALICIOUS INJURIES TO PROPERTY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Clauses 1 to 12 agreed to.

Clause 13 (Tenants of Houses, &c., maliciously injuring them),

MR. M'MAHON said, he objected to the clause on the ground that it made the removal of fixtures by a tenant, punishable by the criminal law, instead of leaving such questions to be settled, as hitherto, in the civil courts. The clause had been taken from an Irish Act, but he objected to the introduction of such stringent provisions from Ireland, where they had been productive of no good, but of much evil.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the law had worked satisfactorily in Ireland, and he would remind the hon. and learned Member that one of the objects of these Bills was to assimilate the laws of England and Ireland in the matter to which they related.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining clauses.

COINAGE OFFENCES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Clauses 1 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 31 (Any Person may apprehend any Person committing any indictable Offence against this Act),

MR. M'MAHON said, he objected to the clause, as it gave power to any person who thought a coin bad to have the utterer committed to prison. That was a new power, and one that was altogether unnecessary. Nothing was more common than for a person to make a mistake in the genuineness of a coin; and he may instance the case of a young lady, who a few years ago was given into custody in Regent-street, for passing a bad half-crown, which was afterwards discovered to be a good one. He hoped the clause would be withdrawn.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the clause was meant to meet the case of persons who made a trade of passing bad coin, and who, if not apprehended at once, were generally sure to escape. The clause was only an application of the common law—that a person taken in flagrante delicto, might be apprehended without warrant, and the person who apprehended any one would do so at his own peril.

MR. CROSS said, he thought that if the common law was as stated by the Solicitor General, it ought to be extended to all offences, and not confined to that one only. The power which the clause gave was new, and a very dangerous one.

MR. DENMAN said, the clause had been very fully considered by the Select Committee, and it was considered necessary for the protection of traders against traffickers in bad coin. The same words were introduced into the Bills relating to offences against the person; and it should be borne in mind, that when a person was apprehended, it was at the peril of the person who caused the apprehension.

MR. HUNT said, the danger was that persons who innocently passed bad coin might be apprehended on the spot by any person who chose to do so.

MR. BARROW said, the clause would introduce a species of Lynch law into the country hitherto unknown, and would be dangerous to the liberty of the subject.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 7: Majority 58.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bills reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

CHURCH RATE ABOLITION BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT: I wish to ask the hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for Tavistock, Whether the perusal of the draft of the Bill I forwarded to him on Friday last has induced him to make an alteration in his intention to proceed with the Bill for the Abolition of

Mr. McMahon

Church Rates, and if he still intends to proceed with that Bill I should like to know whether he will proceed with it on the day named—the 19th instant?

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY: Sir, it is my intention to proceed with that Bill on the day named, unless the Government will give me a day on which I shall be more certain to bring it on.

DISTRICT REGISTRARS OF THE COURT OF PROBATE.—QUESTION.

EARL JERMYN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury on what basis the Salaries of District Registrars, appointed under the Probate Act of 1857, and hitherto paid by Fees, has been calculated, and whether he would have any objection to laying any Treasury Document which there may be, explanatory of such calculation, on the table of the House?

MR. PEEL said, the basis on which the Treasury had proceeded was, the number of grants in the different districts of the registrars for each of the last three years; also, the emoluments of the officers in those years, the relative importance of the places in which these registrars were situate, and the amount of probate duty paid into the Treasury. There were no documents connected with the matter except the Treasury Minute, which was already before the House.

THE BOTANIC GARDENS AT GLASNEVIN.—QUESTION.

MR. COGAN said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Council of Education, Whether the Department of Science and Art have received any information from the Royal Dublin Society that, at a special meeting of its members on Monday last, it was resolved to refuse compliance with the desire of the Department that the Botanic Gardens at Glasnevin should be open to the public after the hours of Divine Service on Sundays; and, if so, whether it is intended to take any further steps to secure the carrying out of this object?

MR. LOWE said, he had to express his regret that he had been prevented by unavoidable business from attending in his place on the preceding evening for the purpose of answering that question. The Department of Science and Art had received a communication of the description to which the hon. Gentleman referred from the Royal Dublin Society. That Department had given it as their opinion that the Glasnevin Gardens should be open on the Sundays in the same way as the gardens at Kew and at Hampton Court; but they had no power to coerce the Society to throw open those gardens, unless they were to recommend to Parliament to withdraw the sum voted for that purpose; and that course they were not prepared to take. The Society were to receive £8,000 from Parliament this year, against a sum of £1,300 subscribed by its members; and the proper time for the consideration of the question would be when the Estimate was brought before the House.

TROOPS FOR CANADA.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that three more Regiments of Infantry and a force of Artillery are under orders for North America, and that the Great Eastern Steam-ship has been engaged for their transport; and, if so, for what locality they are destined, and whether they are to be paid for from the Imperial or Colonial Treasury; and if from the former, whether such expenses has been provided for in the Estimates?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that two regiments, in addition to the regiment before under orders for Canada, had been directed to proceed to that country, as well as a field battery of artillery. He believed, although he had no positive information of the fact, that the troops were to proceed in the Great Eastern steam-ship. With respect to the payment of these troops, he had to state that it was already provided for in the Votes of that House, and no additional expenditure would be incurred on that account. There would be no extra allowance made to those troops, and the cost of their transport would be included in the Navy and not in the Army Estimates.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether, in accordance with the recommendation of the Officer superintending the Ordnance Survey, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to extend the cadastral Survey to the remaining three-fourths of England and Wales, so soon as the Survey of Northumberland and Cumberland shall have been completed?

MR. T. G. BARING said, during the last Session of Parliament his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War announced that no extension of the cadastral or large scale survey would take place without a further inquiry before a Committee of that House, and it was his (Mr. Baring's) intention to move in the course of the present Session to consider whether or not it was expedient that the cadastral survey should be extended.

SYRIA.—EXPLANATION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, with respect to negotiations which had been going on at Constantinople with regard to a settlement of the affairs of Syria, I said that I hoped to be able this week to state to the House what has been done upon the subject. I am now able to state that, although the details are not completed, there has been a meeting of the representatives, and they have agreed upon the main question—namely, that there shall be a Christian Governor of the Lebanon.

ARMY (COLONELS).—ADDRESS MOVED.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, that he rose to move the Resolution of which he had a notice on the paper to address Her Majesty to take into consideration the present position of officers promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished service in the field in 1855 and 1856; but as Her Majesty's Government had agreed to the address, and intended to appoint an official Committee, it was only necessary for him to show that he had brought forward a case deserving the attention of the House. He did not give notice to move for a Commission, because there had been two Royal Commissions in 1854 and 1858, and he thought the subject was so well understood that no further inquiry by those means was necessary. The officers whose claims he advocated were the most distinguished of their rank during the Crimean war. They obtained that rank in 1855 and 1856. On the 28th of November, 1854, a new system was introduced, by which it was settled that no officer should rise to the rank of colonel except by serving three years in command of a regiment. While the system was being carried out in the following two or three years, these officers were promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished service in the Crimea, and they fell into their places according to the dates at which they were promoted. But the effect of the rule of November, 1854, was that it applied to a great mass of distinguished lieutenant colonels who obtained their rank previously. It was at the time considered unjust, and during the next three years it became so intolerable that several Motions having been made in the House on the subject, Her Majesty's Government appointed a Royal Commission for the purpose of investigating the case of those officers and other matters. The Commissioners acknowledged the injustice done to the superseded lieutenant colonels, and advised that they should be replaced in their former rotation in the list. The injury done to the distinguished service officers was by the mode in which the superseded lieutenant colonels were reinstated. They were reinstated by antedating their commissions before November, 1854. There was no necessity for antedating them. It might have been done in another form, but it was done, and Lord Herbert informed him that during the consideration of the Report of the Commissioners of 1858 the claims of the distinguished service officers, who were a small body compared to the whole mass of officers, were overlooked. Having thus stated the means by which these distinguished service officers had been made to forfeit the position which they had enjoyed at the time they were promoted for those services, it would be sufficient to show to what extent they had been injured. They were affected in two ways—first, in the position which they held with regard to the chance of rising to the rank of general; and second in the position which they held with regard to the seniority and priority for command. The first case he would notice was that of Sir Thomas Troubridge, who was one of the aides-de-camp when Her Majesty distributed the first medals granted for the Crimean war. That gallant officer lost eighty-five steps—that was to say, he was eighty-five steps further removed from promotion to the rank of general. He would name three or four officers who obtained rank for their services in the Crimea, and had been serving in India, and who had since lost their position:—Colonel Percy Herbert, Colonel Edwards, the Earl of Longford, Lieutenant David Wood, and Lieutenant George Barker. At the close of the Indian mutiny, after serving in two wars, they found themselves not one whit better off than if there had been no war at all. Colonel Lake, who assisted Sir Fenwick Williams in the defence of Kars, was promoted in September, 1856, and he had lost fifty-six steps in proximity to the position of general. With regard to the second division of the inquiry, as to command, Colonels Gordon and Chapman had lost nine steps in their own service, and 104 steps in the collective service. If an army were in the field the Commander-in-Chief had detached commands to give, on which officers would serve; and, therefore, for such commands Colonels Gordon and Chapman found themselves 104 further off than they would have been had they remained in their former position. That was entirely separate from the principle of selection, because if the senior officer was killed and the second in command was at the top of the list he would naturally succeed to the command. He did not wish to criticise the conduct of any of the officials concerned. It was well known that the Government had simply carried out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners of 1858, and Lord Herbert said the case of these distinguished service officers was overlooked. If they were reinstated in their former position, the natural result would be to alter the position of other officers, and some who had gone above would have again to come below them. He regretted it, but their case would also come before the Committee which the Secretary of State intended to form, and their interests would receive fair consideration. He would not detain the House further; but, with the conviction that the case would receive that attention which Her Majesty's Government had promised to give it, he would move,—That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to take into consideration the present position of the Officers promoted to the rank of Colonel for distinguished service in the field during the War in the East in 1855 and 1856, who, when the List of Colonels was revised in 1858, were unfortunately overlooked in the recommendations of the Royal Commission of that year, by which their prospects in the Service have been seriously injured.

MR. T. G. BARING said, the hon. and gallant General was quite correct in stating that the Government had assented to the Address which he had moved, and that it was the intention of the noble Lord at the head of the War Department, in conjunction with His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, to appoint a Committee to consider the position of those officers who were promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished services in the field during the Crimean war. Under these circumstances it would be obviously inexpedient to discuss the question at that moment, or enter into any detail as to the circumstances which had placed them in their existing position. The hon. and gallant Member had also stated quite correctly that the present position of those officers depended upon the Reports of two Royal Commissions, and that no blame could be laid on the administration of the army in the matter. He was sure that no one would be more willing than His Royal Highness to recognize the merits of the officers in question; and it would be observed that seven or eight of them were either now employed or had been very recently employed in the Horse Guards. He trusted that, although the question had, through ante-dated and post-dated commissions, been encumbered by technical difficulties of too complicated a character to be readily explained, some mode might be found of meeting the case.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he could not but complain of the unfortunate position in which military men were placed by the vacillation of the War Office. An ex post facto order had deprived Indian officers, except under certain conditions, of the brevet rank of colonel to which they were entitled by a former arrangement. A Royal Commission had recommended that these officers should be replaced in the position from which they had unjustly been removed; but, owing to the irregular promotions of the War Office, the matter could not be set right except by doing injustice either to one set of officers or to another. Again it had been the rule that an officer should be entitled to half-pay after twenty-one years' service, but a recent order had fixed the necessary period of service at twenty-five years. The consequence was that many officers who had retired as entitled to half-pay were liable to be called upon to serve the additional period. In conclusion, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary when the account of the Reserve Fund which had been promised would be submitted to the House?

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) said, he was glad that his hon. Friend had acceded to the Motion, though he had never seen on the part of the noble Lord at the head of the War Office, or on the part of the Commander-in-Chief, any disposition to act otherwise than with the greatest liberality and fairness in the matter of promotion to all branches of the service. The Commission of 1854 recommended that no officer should be promoted to the rank of colonel until after he had seen three years of effective service; that recommendation was adopted by the military authorities. In carrying it into effect certain officers complained that they had been omitted, having a right to be included in the list of promotions, and in consequence of that complaint a second Commission was appointed in 1858. That Commission reported that these officers had reason to complain, and that justice ought to be done them by placing them in the position they would have been in if they had not been so unjustly treated. The position of the officers the hon. and gallant General had brought before the House was this:—They were promoted between the promotion of the lieutenant colonels originally promoted, and those whose complaints were referred to the Commission. Then the question arose whether the promotion of the latter officers was rather a matter of favour than a matter of right and justice, and in either case there was a difficulty. These alterations could not be made without causing some complaint, and he thought it right that when a complaint arose it should be dealt with in the way proposed by his hon. Friend. While he was speaking on the subject he would mention a case of another kind, which he thought ought to be brought before the House. Nearly thirty years ago a Committee of that House, on which the noble Member for the City (Lord John Russell), the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), and Sir Robert Peel sat, recommended that no staff appointments should be held by any officer for more than five years. About twenty-five years after the Committee made that recommendation it was adopted by his noble Friend at the head of the War Office, but Sir Edward Lugard had been taken from the category of officers on the staff and placed as permanent Under Secretary in the War Office. There could not be a better officer selected than Sir Edward Lugard, but he had the greatest objection to that appointment, because it was a deviation from the rule.

COLONEL NORTH said, he could not but express his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman should have brought forward such a complaint. He must have forgotten that Sir E. Lugard was taken from half-pay and not from the staff. If it was a regulation that a staff officer should only serve five years, why, he asked, was that regulation to be confined to the army and navy officers, why should it not be applied to civilians? The name of Sir E. Lugard must be known to every one from his gallant services; he was chief of the staff during the whole of the war under Lord Gough; he went out as chief of the staff to the Persian war; and greatly distinguished himself in the Indian mutiny; and if that did not entitle an officer to all the rewards which could be bestowed upon him he did not know what would.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ellis) had introduced a question quite foreign to the Motion before the House, namely, whether a rule that officers who had staff appointments should only hold them for five years had been violated, and he took occasion to illustrate it by referring to the appointment of a permanent secretary in the war department. He thought that was a very inconvenient mode of discussing the matter, and if the right hon. Gentleman wished to call the appointment in question, he should submit a separate Motion, or take some other opportunity of doing so. He (Sir George Lewis) would, therefore, only enter his protest against its being supposed that the Government acquiesced in the doctrine that the right hon. Gentleman laid down. He could not admit that the office of permanent secretary could be considered as an army staff appointment, or that there might not be good reasons why a General officer should be appointed to that office, and should hold it upon a tenure different from that of an ordinary staff appointment; nor must it be understood that the Government at all concurred in the views of his right hon. Friend.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR expressed a hope that not only the case of the officers complaining, but that of others who had been aggrieved in the same manner, would be brought before the notice of the Committee; and that, above all things, it would be fairly constituted, so as to enable it to lay down some general sound principle.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would thank the hon. and gallant Gentleman for submitting the matter to the House, for it was a question of justice to the whole of the ordnance corps. He knew two officers of that corps, who having, contrary to the rules of the service, obtained the command of brigades in India, and received the Knight Commandership of the Bath for their conduct in that capacity, had been superseded by officers promoted under the warrant of 1858.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to take into consideration the present position of the Officers promoted to the rank of Colonel, for distinguished service in the field during the War in the East in 1855 and 1856, who, when the List of Colonels was revised in 1858, were unfortunately overlooked in the recommendations of the Royal Commission of that year, by which their prospects in the Service have been seriously injured."

MR. BARBER'S CASE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BRADY said, he rose to move as a Resolution, That the strong claims of Mr. Barber upon the favourable consideration of the Crown, referred to in the report of the Select Committee on the petition of William Henry Barber, made upon the 7th day of July, 1858, have not been satisfied; and that the circumstances set forth in his petition to this House, presented upon the 2nd day of May instant, in reference to such claims, are entitled to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The case of Mr. Barber had been brought before the House by Lord Ebrington when Member for Marylebone. The noble Lord then went into its minutest details, and made the House fully acquainted with all the facts connected with it. In his petition Mr. Barber alleged that he had been convicted of forgery and transported to Norfolk Island, where he remained for two years and a half; that the only evidence by which he could have proved his innocence had been kept back; and that he had in addition to his sufferings sustained a considerable personal loss. In 1858 he (Mr. Brady) moved for a Committee of Inquiry, which was granted him, and which sat for four days. That Committee, which was presided over by the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding, and numbered amongst its members gentlemen connected with the Treasury, took all the evidence that could be laid before them. They unanimously decided that every allegation contained in Mr.

Barber's petition was proved, and that he had suffered cruelties and persecutions which could not be expressed. In consequence of their Report a sum of £5,000 was granted to that gentleman. That amount was totally insufficient to compensate him for the losses and sufferings which he had undergone. His personal expenses, in consequence of the treatment to which he had been subjected, amounted to £4,895: and in satisfying the courts of law of his innocence, and in regaining his position, which it took six years to accomplish, he was obliged to spend £3,700 additional. When the Vote of £5,000 passed the House, he (Mr. Brady) had felt unwilling to raise the question, as it was agreed to at a late hour on Wednesday afternoon. On the 2nd of May last the petition was presented to which his notice of Motion referred. That petition stated that, previous to his conviction, Mr. Barber was in receipt of a professional income of upwards of £1,000 a year. All he (Mr. Brady) now asked was the comparatively trifling sum of £3,700, which was the amount that had been expended in Mr. Barber's happily successful endeavours to reinstate himself in his profession.

SIR FITZROY KELLY seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could hardly think the House would be disposed to agree in the Motion made by the hon. Gentleman opposite. In these cases of pecuniary claims brought forward by hon. Members on behalf of those in whom they were in any way interested there ought to be something like a statutory limitation, as the practice was becoming rather common of repeating claims after they had been rejected over and over again. The present was even a stronger case, for it had been favourably considered, and a sum of money actually voted in full satisfaction by the House. On what grounds, then, could the hon. Gentleman ask the House to agree in his Motion? The case of Mr. Barber was peculiar in this respect, among others, that it was the only one in which, a failure of justice having taken place, and it being afterwards believed that the person was improperly convicted of crime, pecuniary compensation had been granted by the House in consequence of the losses which had been sustained. There were, no doubt, peculiar circumstances, connected with the treatment of Mr. Barber, taking this case out of the common class, and exempting it from the ordinary rule, and the Government of the Earl of Derby having fairly, and, he might say favourably, considered the Report of the Select Committee, to the appointment of which they themselves had consented, recommended that the sum which the hon. Member for Leitrim regarded as paltry, but which many Members of that House regarded as a generous and liberal compensation, should be included in the Estimates. A change of Government having taken place before the Vote was passed, it was retained by the next Government in deference to the opinion of their predecessors; and it was agreed to without any remonstrance on the part of the hon. Member for Leitrim.

MR. BRADY said, he was about to propose an Amendment, but the Chairman of the Committee told him that it could not be put. The Members were then dividing, and it was so near six o'clock that it was not thought possible to proceed any further after the division.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was glad to be reminded of the circumstances, for he now remembered that the decision was come to after discussion, and after a division had actually taken place. If an intimation had been made that the former grant was not to be considered a final settlement, he thought there would have been great objection to voting the £5,000. He did not now wish to imply any doubt of Mr. Barber's innocence, but at the time he had to deal with his case, after having the assistance of the present Lord Chancellor, he could not conceal from himself that there were great difficulties in it, and that there were circumstances of great suspicion in the conduct of Mr. Barber. Those circumstances were afterwards cleared up; but it was in consequence of their existence that the Court of Queen's Bench took so long a time to consider the case. He, therefore, thought it was unreasonable to ask the House for the amount of the expenses to which Mr. Barber had been put in reinstating himself in his profession when a sum of £5,000 had already been given to him. If the House granted this further sum of £3,700, Mr. Barber would have received nearly £9,000; but there would be nothing to prevent some hon. Member coming forward at a future time with a statement that that was a paltry sum, and a demand for a further payment, to cover some other expenses. He must say that he thought the House had acted in a liberal spirit, and voted a sum which ought to cover every reasonable demand which Mr. Barber could have against the public.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he could quite understand that if this were the first occasion on which this question was brought before the House, the observations of the right hon. Baronet would be, as indeed they always were, of great weight. It might be said that a claim was being made on the House and upon the resources of the country which he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) was bound to admit was altogether unprecedented. But the features of the case were so extraordinary, the claim of Mr. Barber was so strong, and the arguments adduced in its support were so irresistible, that for the first time in the history of the country the House of Commons felt bound to establish a precedent, and to come to the relief of Mr. Barber. The same question was now raised, and it was one of the deepest moment to Mr. Barber. He himself had argued the case before the Court of Queen's Bench; and after failure of two very eminent counsel he felt disinclined to attempt it. Upon Mr. Barber's earnest request he consented to dedicate an Easter vacation to a full and complete investigation of the matter. He and the other counsel employed had, of course, acted perfectly gratuitously for Mr. Barber. When the case was again brought forward, Mr. Justice Erle, who had been counsel for the prosecution against Mr. Barber, and all the other Judges on the bench, were unanimous in thinking that Mr. Barber had been unjustly accused, that he was the victim of an accidental but great injustice, and they restored him to the rank of an attorney. It was only just to add that he had actually lost in hard money a sum of money bordering on £5,000 in defending himself upon the erroneous conviction. That sum the liberality of the House granted to him. But in attempting to replace himself in his former position he had expended some £3,000 more. He had at last succeeded in asserting his innocence, and in being restored to his rank as attorney; and would have been in a state of utter destitution, and penniless, were it not for his profession. The debt of £3,700 was now pressing upon him, and he must pay it out of his hard earnings, unless the House would consent to do him that tardy act of justice. The sum asked for was a miserable one—a mere trifle, and if the principle laid down by the Vote of £5,000 was to be observed, the present application ought to be acceded to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that both the hon. Members who had spoken last had regarded the question as being of exceedingly contemptible importance as far as the public were concerned, but of importance to Mr. Barber. He fully admitted that a subject of this kind ought to be regarded without reference to the amount of the sum asked. That was not the question on which the decision of the House should be taken; but he could not agree with the hon. Members who had advocated the claim that the sum was so inconsiderable a one as they seemed to think it. Mr. Barber had already received £5,000, and the House was now told that that was a paltry pittance; but the amount now asked, with the £5,000 already granted, did not represent the claims of Mr. Barber, for the speeches made in his behalf told them so. If the £3,700 were now granted, the hon. Member for Leitrim might come forward again next year. [Dr. BRADY: No.] Well, when the £5,000 was given the hon. Gentleman did not reserve any right to come forward and make a new demand. Had he done so—had he allowed the House to see a glimpse of his intention—it was possible that that circumstance might have had a material, and, probably, an adverse influence on the Vote. He must express his regret that his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), who was Attorney General to the Government who recommended the Vote of £5,000, should now, in his independent capacity, be leading an assault on the Treasury for an addition to that sum. The argument of his hon. and learned Friend went to this—that whenever a person who was not guilty of the crime with which he was charged was found guilty in a court of justice, he was entitled to bring against the public a claim for pecuniary compensation. He challenged his hon. and learned Friend to make good that proposition.

DR. BRADY: This was a Government prosecution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If the Government prosecuted, they did so in the public interest, and no distinction or no additional argument could be drawn from that. The matter did not turn on the question whether the Government was the prosecutor, but on the question whether, when one of the tribunals which were bound to convict the guilty unfortunately convicted the innocent, the public were bound to make pecuniary compensation? Neither the Committee nor the Government had ever adopted a principle so extravagant as that claims of a pecuniary nature were to be advanced by individuals because they had the misfortune to be convicted in a court of justice when they were not guilty. The case of Mr. Barber presented peculiarities of a different character, and the manner in which the sentence was applied, and the sufferings Mr. Barber underwent in consequence, constituted the peculiarities of his case. But the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded on the principle that all persons who had suffered detriment in consequence of an erroneous conviction in a court of justice were entitled to bring a claim for compensation against the public Exchequer. That was a question of enormous importance, and it would be a portentous innovation if any such principle were to be laid down. Fifty other cases might be brought forward with as plausible arguments in their favour, if it were to be established that it was because of the erroneous conviction, and not simply from the suffering he had undergone, that Mr. Barber had received compensation. He felt bound to say that questions of the kind could not be entered upon without starting a great many separate inquiries. Apart from the question of guilty or not guilty, one might be raised with regard to the prudence of the conduct of the gentleman in question. All such matters, and they all more or less affected character, would have to be ripped up and examined if the extraordinary principle was to be established, that the House of Commons ought to compensate every man erroneously convicted for the pecuniary loss he had suffered in consequence. He trusted the House would refuse to entertain the Motion.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that in consequence of a gentleman, who had already received £5,000 of public money, making another demand for £4,000, he had felt it his duty to examine carefully the evidence relating to the case. It was painful, when a gentleman—a martyr in this case—would stir up things which had better be allowed to remain quiet. Mr. Barber, in the course of his professional duty as an attorney, was the innocent instrument by which no less than four forged documents were imposed on the Bank of England, and upon one of these documents he was tried and convicted. He had read the Report of the Select Committee in reference to the case, and if the Committee were satisfied with the evidence of Mr. Barber and three or four other gentlemen, the Committee were certainly most humane, but he could not compliment them on being discriminating, for any bench of country magistrates would have come to the verdict which a jury was said once to have brought in—"Not guilty, but we recommend him not to do it again." Mr. Barber, if he had not suffered indignities and annoyances from the Governor of Norfolk Island, would not probably have obtained the sympathy he received, together with £5,000 of public money. Parliament thought they had a measure of kindness to deal out to one who had suffered malicious and malignant indignities beyond the intention of the law, and for that reason, and not upon the principle that any persons wrongly convicted were entitled to compensation, voted a sum of money to him. Mr. Barber had had an ample measure of justice from the Government, and it was to be regretted that he had not been content with what he had got, and with his restoration to his profession and position.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he should be sorry if the House were to pronounce its decision influenced by the speech just delivered, which, from its want of generosity, contrasted strongly with the speech of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk. One might suppose that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Longfield) was arguing like a counsel for the prosecution with all the rancorous enmity—

MR. LONGFIELD rose to order. He submitted that the expressions which had just fallen from the hon. Member were not regular.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would say "professional prejudice."

MR. LONGFIELD said, he must really protest against such language being allowed.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he meant only to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman showed that kind of feeling which might be supposed to be entertained by a counsel who had been unsuccessful in his advocacy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Baronet on the Treasury bench had acknowledged Mr. Barber's innocence; he had been pronounced innocent by a court of law, by the late Government, and by the House of Commons, and, therefore, in God's name, let no one rise in the House to damage the character of that unfortunate gentleman. When a man was alleged to have committed a crime he was prosecuted by the public, and if that prosecution did him injury, he being innocent, he had a right to appeal to the nation, and through no other tribunal could he so properly appeal as through the high court of Parliament. He should offer no observation upon the merits of the case, but he merely asked the House to take the decision already given in regard to Mr. Barber's innocence, and not to decide upon the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. BRADY, in reply, denied that Mr. Barber had the proper appliances at his command for his defence; his books were taken away, and the Crown actually kept away his partner on the pretence of bringing him forward as a witness, and not calling him.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, the question was one of principle—whether all persons who had been convicted in courts of justice “without probable cause” had a right to come to that House for compensation. Such a doctrine could not be admitted. The case now presented was an appeal ad misericordiam, and if the House were to go into all the cases of individual hardship which might be brought before it from the criminal law courts no Session would be long enough, and no Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to promise a surplus.

MR. MALINS said, he felt that there was great force in what had been said on both sides. It was a hardship that a man who had been erroneously found guilty of a crime and had suffered the penalties of the law should not be entitled to compensation for the expense he was put to in recovering his status in society; but at the same time there was great force in the observation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that these were perils to which every one was exposed. He supported Mr. Barber's claim when it was last under discussion, but when the £5,000 was granted he considered the question settled, and he was surprised to find that three years after that grant a further claim was made; but while upon that ground he could not support the Motion, he thought Mr. Barber fully entitled, after the investigation the case had received to be considered as a perfectly innocent man, and he was sorry that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Longfield) had thought proper again to raise doubts upon that of which the country no longer entertained any doubt.

MR. BRADY said, that as he saw that the feeling of the House was against him, he would beg leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion made, and Question,

“That the strong claims of Mr. Barber upon the favourable consideration of the Crown, referred to in the Report of the Select Committee on the Petition of William Henry Barber, made upon the 7th day of July, 1858, have not been satisfied; and that the circumstances set forth in his Petition to this House, presented upon the 2nd day of May, instant, in reference to such claims, are entitled to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.”

Put, and negatived.

AFFAIRS OF NEW ZEALAND.

RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose pursuant to notice, to move—

“That this House has heard with surprise and concern that the Governor of New Zealand has used Forces, entrusted to him by Her Majesty for the protection of the inhabitants and the impartial administration of affairs within that Colony, in depriving several of Her subjects of certain property in land situate on the River Waitara, such property having been tendered for purchase by Teira, a member of the Ngatiawa Tribe, who had no power to sell without the consent of his chieftain, Wiremu Kingi.”

This was a subject that affected the honour of the House of Commons, and if it endorsed the conduct of the Governor of New Zealand it became a particeps criminis in the course which had been pursued by the Government towards the natives of that country. The subject was also one which affected the power of England and the honour of the Crown. His attention had been drawn to that country by the grant of £500,000; and he considered that especial care should be taken as to how the natives were treated. It had been suggested that the natives should send Members to the House; and he could assure the House that they had recently made extraordinary progress in many ways. They had schools and clergymen, whom they paid; and many of them were educated and able men. He did complain of the manner in which they had been treated, especially in regard to their rights to their land. As far as the rebellion was concerned, he wished it to be distinctly understood that he was in favour of putting down rebellion and re-establishing Her Majesty's authority. But he wished the House of Commons to reflect that in endorsing the conduct of Governor Brown, they were taking upon themselves great responsibility, and rendering themselves liable for all that had been done.

AFFIRMATIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [13th March,]

“That the Bill be now read a second time; and which Amendment was, to leave out the word ‘now’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day six months.’”

Debate resumed.

MR. DILLWYN said, he should support this Bill, which he considered much superior to the cognate Bill which stood lower down on the list of Orders for that Day—the Criminal Proceedings Oaths Relief Bill. In many respects the objects of the two Bills were the same, as they both proposed to give relief to persons who, from conscientious motives, refused to be sworn as witnesses; the Bill to which he had referred only proposed to give this relief in criminal cases, whereas the Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) would apply to all cases, whether criminal or civil. He could not see why the relief should be confined to criminal cases, for if it was right that the oath should be dispensed with where the life or liberty of the accused was at stake, it must be equally where the character or property of individuals was at stake. But the great difference was that the Criminal Proceedings Oath Relief Bill did not give relief to persons who entertained doubts upon certain matters of religion, or were thought by the judge to be infidels. This Bill, however, would give relief to all persons who might desire to avail themselves of it if the Judge thought they gave good reasons, and he trusted they would hear of no objections to it of the kind called religious objections, for the Scripture said, “Swear not at all.” No one, he supposed, would contend, or at all events no large section of the House or of the country would contend—that it was right that any person should be excluded from the protection of the law, in case of any outrage against their person or property being committed, merely because (to use the language of the hon. Mover of the Bill) he entertained doubts as to certain speculative propositions—yet that was the logical effect of the present state of the law. The only question then was whether the proposed change would be injurious to the administration of justice. It was alleged that it would have this effect, that oaths would cease to be taken at all, and that affirmations would become universal. He did not think that result would follow. He could not perceive why persons of any peculiar religious views, or even of no religious views whatever, should be excluded from giving their testimony. Why should they not be examined and their evidence taken for what it was worth? The jury would not be obliged to believe such witnesses—nor, indeed, were they now obliged to believe those who were sworn. The belief of the jury greatly depended on the character of the witness, and the consistency of his statement in itself, and with other testimony, and circumstantial evidence. Many Gentlemen, even in that

[Second Night.]

House, and on both sides of the House, whatever might be their belief now, had probably in the course of their lives, and especially in youth, known what it was to have disbelief, and would at such times have been very unwilling to be subjected to a cross-examination on that point. Belief was not a matter of choice. - Whatever a man believed or doubted, he could not help it. He (Mr. Dillwyn) would be very glad if he could believe that another man could give him absolution; and that he could buy that absolution for money; but he could not believe it, and he had no choice in the matter. The matters which a man was expected to believe were not matters of recorded fact, but matters of future expectation—such, for instance, as the belief in a future state of rewards and punishments. But if any man asserted, not even that he disbelieved, but that he had not a dogmatic belief on that point, the Judge would regard him as an infidel, and refuse to let him be sworn. If a man was willing, from his regard for truth, to submit to the obloquy of avowing his doubts and being rejected as a witness, he thought that such a man was likely to give truthful evidence; and so far from injuring the administration of justice it would advance it to admit the evidence of such persons, and to reduce the number of unnecessary oaths. It was said that the Government ought to have taken up the subject. If so, it was for them to explain why they had not done so. It was not his business to be the apologist of the Government. Still, he could very well understand that, seeing the disposition of the Opposition to use every means of defeating the Government, not always with reference to the principle of the question before the House, and not always with strict fairness, it might be unadvisable for Government to attempt to deal with so delicate and difficult a question. What he sought to establish was not new. It was the existing law of India, which was now a portion of Her Majesty's dominions. The object of the oath was not any privilege given to the witness—it was a duty which he owed to society. All we ask is that his evidence should not be refused on account of his religious, or if you liked, his non-religious opinions. Suppose that in a case like the Road murder, which he chose as the most startling case that had lately occurred, it should be known that a man professing strong speculative doubts, as they had been called, was to be able to give evidence which would throw light on the matter—if such a witness were asked by counsel—perhaps counsel for the guilty person—whether he believed in a future state of existence, and if he were to reply that he trusted in a future state, and rested his hopes on it, but could not say that he had a dogmatic belief in it, that person would be declared by the Judge or presiding magistrate to be disqualified from taking an oath, and, therefore, of giving evidence; and by the law as now interpreted this great crime would remain undiscovered and the ends of justice be frustrated. In India the law was that persons who, by their age, or by defect of religious belief, were disqualified from taking an oath might be examined on affirmation. That law was expressly intended to apply, not to persons who had doubts the result of long and serious reflection, but to those who, from absolute ignorance and barbarism, were utterly without religion. He trusted that the relief accorded to the whole population of India would not be refused to intelligent Englishmen. If the present Bill became law it would be for the jury to consider whether a witness's belief affected his credibility, he would be subject to the usual cross-examination as to the facts deposed to, and he maintained that such an alteration as was proposed, so far from impeding or interfering with the administration of justice would materially promote it.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) had expressed his hope that no opposition would be made to this Bill on religious grounds. But, those were the very grounds on which the opposition to it would be made; because the grounds on which the author of the measure founded it were the very opposite of religious. If the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) had merely wished to enable courts of justice to take evidence which they could not now receive he might have proposed that witnesses should be sworn and examined, and that questions as to their belief in the existence of God and in future rewards and punishments should not be put to them till after they had given their testimony. If that were done the counsel on the other side might then ask the witness such questions with a view to shake the value of his evidence; and the Judge and the jury could then take it at what it was worth. But what the hon. Baronet proposed was that those who thought that no Nemesis attended falsehood and perjury, and who looked upon an oath as an empty and unmeaning form, might dispense with that ceremony, and that their evidence should have the same weight as the testimony of those who believed that a Divine sanction attended the oath they had taken. They were to be released not because they had any conscientious objection to an oath, but because it did not affect their conscience at all. Those who had a sincere religious belief, when put upon their oath, felt an earnest anxiety lest by any incautious word or expression they should unintentionally convey a wrong impression, or give a false colouring to the transaction which they are describing; if, therefore, those who regarded an oath as an idle form were to be exempted, surely those who viewed it as a solemn act and a cause for anxiety ought à fortiori to be relieved. So that if they passed this Bill they would next year have another Bill brought in to abolish oaths altogether. The House ought then to consider to what point the hon. Baronet's theory, that the State had nothing to do with religion, had brought them? It would do away with the testimony to the actual presence of an all-seeing God in our courts of justice. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) also had repeatedly said that a belief in God and in future rewards and punishments was a belief in "speculative propositions." It was on that notion that this measure appeared to be based. The Bill professed to meet the objection of certain persons to taking an oath; but the fact was that those were the very persons who did not scruple to take an oath. The objection came from the other side, and was directed against the reception of their testimony, which the courts could not admit because of the witnesses' want of religious belief. The hon. Baronet had adduced, as an argument from analogy, the fact that Quakers were allowed to make affirmations in lieu of oaths; but the reason why Quakers were allowed to do so was because they had a very definite religious belief, and strong conscientious objections against taking an oath. This was, therefore, a guarantee for their truthfulness, and their case could not at all be compared with that of persons who had no belief whatever, and who had no conscientious objection to an oath, which they looked upon as an empty ceremony. That was not an analogy; it was a paralogy. The practice in India had also been adduced as any analogy. There, no doubt, the Natives were permitted to affirm instead of being sworn; but the affirmation of a black man was taken at what it was worth, and would not be weighed against a white man's oath. The Act applicable to the colonies assigned, as a reason for allowing the Natives to affirm, that there "existed barbarous and uncivilized persons who had little or no belief or knowledge of God." This, therefore, is also a false analogy. It was one thing to allow these persons, who clung most tenaciously to the scraps and shreds of belief handed down to them by their forefathers, to make affirmations in courts of justice, and quite another to allow those persons who had been taught the Christian religion and knew all its doctrines, and had learnt from childhood about God, but who had deliberately discarded and rejected them and professed to disbelieve in God, to do the same. Slaves and helots in ancient times were not permitted to take an oath; but why? Because it was thought that the influence of their masters might induce them to say what was not true, and that they might thus become perjured. If we look at the great speeches which had come down to us in Greek and Latin we found this argument constantly recurring, that "such and such testimony had no weight, and must not be received, because, was it the evidence of one who had not been sworn." That was what Pagans of old did: yet we were asked to admit testimony that was not given upon oath. But what is the practice in this country? It was well known that persons would go before magistrates to take out summonses and make strong asseverations which, when they afterwards came to be sworn, they shrunk from repeating. That showed the guarantee afforded by an oath for the truth of evidence, and if this security for truth be done away, if this warning against perjury and falsification be forbidden, then not a ghost of a fear of lying or hatred of untruth would remain to haunt the land. The hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) appeared not exactly to know the nature of an oath. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed, probably because they took the same view as the hon. Baronet, who stated that an oath was a calling down of vengeance from God upon yourself if you told an untruth. [Sir JOHN TRELAWNY: I quoted the law.] But the hon. Baronet expressed an opinion [Cheers] and the cheers from some hon. Members opposite show that they share that opinion. But in the oath taken by witnesses

there was not a word about calling down vengeance. [Sir JOHN TRELAWNY: You alluded yourself to a Nemesis.] Yes, and he believed that a man could not do a single evil act without being followed by a Nemesis. It is not necessary to call down vengeance, for there is a moral Government of the world, and God takes very good care of His own world, and will never let evil succeed or go unpunished, whether you "call upon Him" or not. What you have to call upon Him for, is help and assistance. In taking the oath the witness promised to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and asked the Divine help to enable him to do so. ["No!"] Were not the words used for a thousand years, at the end of the oath, "So help me God?" It was said that honour and honesty would prevent men from making false statements. What is honour? what is honesty without belief in God? I challenge any hon. Member to define these terms. He cannot do so without assuming the presence of a God who orders all the events and arranges all the details of circumstances in the world. Honour and honesty, apart from religion, were nothing but pride and self-interest. If a man did not believe in a God he could refuse to tell a lie only because he was too proud to do so; and he could be honest only because he thought honesty the best policy. These are the mean motives which must influence those who do not believe in God. If he himself did not believe in a God who ruled the world and arranged the course of all its events, he should plot and intrigue, and not allow any punctious visitings of conscience to stay his hand or divert him from his purpose; [Laughter] he repeated it because he was sure it was true; he would allow no qualms of conscience, no cowardly misgivings to interfere with his action; because without that belief it was mere maudlin, simpering sentimentality, to say anything but "Evil, be thou my good." A consistent Atheist must be a bad citizen and capable of every Machiavelian scheme and falsehood.

MR. BAINES said, that in dealing with this matter there were two evils to be avoided—namely, first, the calling upon acknowledged unbelievers to make an open declaration of unbelief in the existence of God and in a future state, which would be highly offensive to religious persons; and secondly, the holding out of what might seem to be a premium to the profession of infidelity for the sake of giving false evidence. The Bill appeared to be very judiciously drawn, so as to obviate both of those evils. It provided that the witness should declare that the taking of an oath was according to his religious belief unlawful. [Mr. G. HARDY: The hon. Member is in error. He is speaking of a different Bill from that now under discussion.] He begged pardon for his mistake, but he had obtained a copy of the wrong Bill. (Mr. Locke's.) He would not further intrude upon the attention of the House, except to say that he thought it would be a profanation of the sanctity of an oath to allow unbelievers to be sworn and examined first, and then to be questioned as to their religious opinions. There were cases in which, owing to the present state of the law, the evidence essential to the conviction of a murderer had been rejected. To dispense with the oath in exceptional circumstances contemplated by that measure was far from denying the value of religious sanctions.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I am aware that, having spoken on this Question before the debate was adjourned, some weeks ago, any remarks which I may now make must be made with the indulgence of the House. I am, however, now desirous of stating in a few words the reasons why I feel compelled to vote against the second reading of this Bill. We have to start from this point—that the general law of this country lays it down that no witness shall be examined in any civil or criminal proceeding in a court of justice without the previous administration of an oath to him. The definition of an oath, on which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) made some remarks, is very simple. It seems to be a declaration of a fact in which there is a direct appeal to the Supreme Being. An affirmation may be equally founded on a religious feeling, but there is no direct appeal to the Deity; and that is the distinction between it and an oath. I do not concur in the construction which the noble Lord put upon the adjuration at the end of the oath. There are certain classes of religionists who object—but who object on religious grounds, mind—to the taking of an oath; and the law coming to their aid has said that, in the case of members of the Society of Friends, of Moravians, and some other limited religious denominations, they may, on declaring that they belong to those persuasions, be relieved from the obligation of being sworn, and may make an affirmation. That is a distinct statutory exception made in favour of these defined classes of persons, and it is not founded on any notion that the sanction of an oath is inoperative as regards those persons, but upon their religious objection to the form of adjuration. Our law also provides that pagans, heathens—a Hindoo or a Chinese, for example—may be sworn in an English court of justice according to the form most binding on his conscience, such form being assumed to have a religious sanction. It is, therefore, not based on any narrow or intolerant rule of exclusion, but it always supposes that there is to be a religious sanction for the declaration. When a child is called as a witness the question arises whether he is not of too tender an age to be examined, and he is asked whether he believes in a God, and knows what is the meaning of a future state of rewards and punishments. If he answers in the affirmative he is allowed to be examined. That is an exact exemplification of the doctrine of our law, by which an oath is required in all cases. Now, this Bill is intended to relieve an entirely different class of persons. It is designed to meet the case of a defect of religious belief, where the obligation of an oath is not held by the individual who appears as a witness to be binding on his conscience, but he has no conscientious objection to take an oath, regarding it as a mere idle form of words. ["No!" and "Hear, hear!"] I assume that he is perfectly willing to take the oath. ["No!"] Well, but consider the facts. He does not make the objection; the objection is made to him, and he does not express a desire to make an affirmation. He presents himself as a witness. The counsel on the other side says, "I object to such a person being examined without questioning him as to his religious belief." Before the oath is tendered to him he is asked those questions which will bring out the fact whether he has that religious belief which the law holds to be necessary as the sanction for it. If he answers in the negative the Judge does not permit him to be sworn. In the case which the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) quoted as the foundation for his Bill, the objection was made by the attorney on the opposite side to the witness, and the witness having answered in the negative, she was told to stand down, and could not be examined. This measure seems to me to proceed in an entirely wrong direction. It assumes that the witness refuses or is unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn. That is not the fact. I am not aware of any class of witnesses ever coming forward and saying, "We are of no religious belief, and we object to be sworn." Being based on an entirely erroneous view of the circumstances for which a remedy is required, the words of this Bill are so general that it might include persons who have a religious belief, but who, nevertheless, think that an affirmation is less binding than an oath. That class of witnesses whom we hear of as kissing their thumbs, being so ignorant as to suppose that that evasion will prevent the effects of their being duly sworn, might take advantage of this enactment, and say they desire to make an affirmation in lieu of an oath. Well, what is the duty which this Bill imposes on a Judge? He is to be satisfied of the sincerity of the witness's desire to make an affirmation. What possible evidence can be furnished to a Judge to satisfy him on such a point? He can only take the witness's declaration itself as the proof of his sincerity in making it. Then we come to the affirmation, namely, "I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare that an oath would not, in my judgment, oblige me more closely to speak what is true than my deliberate undertaking so to do." If this Bill were passed I think an objection might still be taken to allowing a witness with no religious belief to affirm on the ground that an oath would not oblige him at all. It would be open to counsel to contend that notwithstanding what was intended by the framers of the Bill, it did not meet the case of a person who was deficient in religious belief, and that he could not take this affirmation. I greatly doubt whether this measure would not exclude the very class whom it is meant to relieve, and admit the very class whom it is not meant to relieve, and, therefore, I confess that I am unable to give it my support.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that was a very difficult and important question, but many feelings and ideas had been imported into it which were wholly foreign to the point at issue. Eschewing fierce language, let them calmly consider the real business before them. They had to ask themselves which of the sanctions now employed they could dispense with, and yet not invalidate the testimony of a witness. In most cases the sanction of the law and of public opinion was united with the sanction of religion. Where those sanctions acted separately, if he found that without the aid of public opinion the oath had no influence at all, then he said the sanction of religion alone did not give additional security for the veracity of the witness. In past times every member of a University took an oath that he would conduct himself according to certain laws in that University; and the next minute he broke the oath; yet he did not consider himself a perjurer because the opinion of the world did not consider it a perjury. That was a case in which public opinion did not go with the religious sanction, and in which the religious sanction was wholly useless. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) was clearly wrong about the meaning of the oath. It meant that the Almighty would visit with His punishment the man who swore falsely. The right hon. Gentleman was quite right as to the question put by the opposing counsel to ascertain the witness's religious faith. If the man who was asked whether he believed in a future state of rewards and punishments had a great regard for truth, and, in spite of public opinion, replied "No, I don't believe that," he was immediately set aside. But if he was a person who, following his own views of what was for his own benefit, was so careless of the truth as to tell a lie and say, "I do believe," then he was sworn. Which of these two men was the most likely to speak the truth? Was the oath any guarantee for the veracity of the witness? He wanted that argument to be answered—not himself to be abused, though to that he was very much accustomed. Your rule of law excludes a trustworthy man and accepts one who is not trustworthy. They might surround the witness with various sanctions, but the only one that had any real effect was that of law and public opinion. That sanction they obtained equally well by an affirmation. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who was not a man obfuscated by bigotry, to direct his mind to the question of what was to be done to insure the chances—for they were only chances, that they should receive truth from a witness in a court. The noble Lord talked of a man divesting himself of his religious belief as he would take off his coat. No man divested himself of his religious belief by an act of his own will, but he was divested of it by circumstances. All he could do was to obtain all the evidence he possibly could, and then it depended upon the Almighty whether he must believe or not. To say that the rule of law did no harm was to say what all experience contradicted. If a man was known to be an unbeliever anybody might knock him down or rob him, and then tell his counsel to ask him whether he believed in a state of future rewards and punishments. The man would answer "No;" and thus, from his very determination to tell the truth, having admitted that he did not believe a religious sanction attached to an oath, his evidence could not be taken, the rogue or the thief would escape with impunity. This was not an imaginary case, but one of frequent occurrence. His hon. Friend was not open to the imputation that he was an enemy of religion. The change which he proposed was likely to do good by enabling persons to give evidence who could not now do so, and it ought, therefore, to receive the sanction of the House.

MR. WALTER said, that this Bill proposed to relieve persons who acted from alleged conscientious motives; but then the question arose, what was the true definition of conscience? How could a man be said to act from conscientious motives—that was to have a conscience—who did not believe in the distinction between right and wrong? And how could a man be said to believe in the distinction between right and wrong who did not believe in the moral government of the world? and what was the use of his believing in a moral Governor of the world unless he believed that such Governor would reward or punish men in a future state? Therefore he objected to the Bill, on the ground that it would destroy the principle of conduct which was the main distinction between man and the beasts. If the evidence of a man who did not believe in the existence of an Almighty Being, who would reward and punish him according to his deserts, was put upon the same level as that of a man who possessed such a belief, a blow would be struck at man's natural instincts. If such a man were knocked down and robbed, and then went single handed and without corroborative testimony to give evidence as to the person who knocked him down, it might be a hard case that his evidence would not be received; but the same hardship would occur in the case of a lunatic. You might knock down a lunatic, and his evidence could not be taken. Now his opinion was that they ought to treat the unfortunate—he did not wish to use harsh epithets—but he would say the wretched persons whose minds were so constituted that they were unable to see what everyone else saw, and to believe in the existence of an Almighty Power, as not in their right minds; and he thought that it would be fatal to the interests of society to take a different view of such persons. He entirely opposed the Bill, on the ground that it was intended to relieve a class of persons who were in a state of mind which was very little higher than that of lunatics.

MR. DENMAN said, that it had been decided over and over again that lunatics could give evidence if they were of sufficient intelligence for the matter in hand. He thought those who opposed the second reading of the Bill had forgotten that the great principle in question was, whether it was necessary to exclude a great deal of truth, which, by means of an alteration of the law, might be obtained. As the law now stood, a criminal might escape because the witness against him was an infidel. In the case of a soldier of the German Legion, who was tried at Dover, in the winter of 1856, that objection was raised to one of the witnesses, and, had there not been other testimony, the prisoner would have escaped. The objections which had been taken to this Bill rested only upon sentimental grounds. The real question was, was it necessary to retain the existing sanction, as it was called, of an oath? It was sometimes urged that a witness was affected by a solemn appeal from counsel, "Will you swear that?" or, "Upon your oath is that so?" where he was meditating an untruth. But he would put it to any of his hon. and learned Friends, whether they ever made that appeal to a witness, with any real belief that they were relying on the religious sanction of the oath? He believed that if that appeal had any efficacy at all it was because witness was frightened into telling the truth, by being reminded that he would be liable to be prosecuted for perjury if he told a falsehood. The oath was not needed in the case of a conscientious man; and in that of a shuffler or a liar it was of no use, because they would obtain all the benefits of the sanction of an oath by attaching the penalties of perjury to falsehoods told after an affirmation.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, that the hon. Member for Berkshire was quite correct in his statement that lunatics could not be examined; and, indeed, the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton answered his own objection when he said that a lunatic could only be examined when he had returned to his senses.

MR. DENMAN had said, that it had been decided that the mere fact of a man's being a lunatic was no objection to his being a witness, if the Judge was satisfied that he understood the particular matter about which he was to be examined.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH: If he understood the matter no doubt he would be competent to give evidence as to it, and so, if he understood any matter of business, he would, in the intervals of lunacy, be competent to transact it. His objection to this Bill was, that it would induce persons who felt the obligation of an oath to shrink from the responsibility of taking it. Experience in the Courts had taught him that many persons who, from motives of interest or partizanship would tell a simple untruth, would not dare from religious or superstitious feelings to violate the oath they had invoked God to witness. He could not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton, that when counsel attacked witnesses with the words, "Upon your oath, will you say so and so"—a practice which, he was glad to say, was becoming daily more unfrequent—the religious sanction of the oath was not appealed to.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he had presented a petition from a person who refused to take an oath, not because he disbelieved in God, but because he thought it was contrary to the Scriptures. That gentleman's house was frequently robbed by wicked men, who took advantage of his scruples and were set at liberty. He had been allowed to sit in the town council without taking an oath, but party squabbles having arisen, a brother member insisted that as he had not taken the oath he had no right to his seat.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, that the arguments which had been used by the hon. and learned Members for Sheffield and Tiverton applied not so much to this Bill as to the more general and more important question which the House was not then called upon to consider—whether it was right that evidence should continue to be given under the religious sanction of an oath, or whether it would be better to trust to temporal penalties and the force of public opinion. That was a question which might admit of discussion, but he was convinced that, if we intended to adhere to the system of depending on oaths as a mode of securing the truth, the adoption of this measure would only multiply difficulties and inconsistencies, and if they were to admit the principle of the present measure they must, to avoid inconsistency, go a step further and abolish oaths in courts of justice altogether. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had maintained that oaths had little efficacy, and were, if ineffectual, a mockery of religion, and illustrated this position by a reference to the oath formerly imposed on members of the Universities, by which, as he understood it, they bound themselves to observe all the statutes indiscriminately, although many were practically obsolete, and the observation of them never enforced or even expected. But the hon. Member had forgotten a very important portion of that oath. The duty of observing statutes was not imposed absolutely but under an alternative, and the person taking the oath swore that he would either observe the statutes or submit to such penalties as should be imposed for their infraction. This illustration, therefore, which was rather one ad invidium, did not apply. At present the sanction of an oath was only dispensed with where a strong religious objection was alleged, the existence of the religious feeling being itself a guarantee for the truth of the evidence as given. This Bill, however, proposed to omit the oath in cases where there could be no such guarantee; because the very ground upon which it was to be omitted was, that the witness had no religious belief. It was true that many men would give their evidence as truly unsworn as if they had taken an oath; but it was equally true that the administration of an oath made most people more careful and accurate in their statements than they would be without it; and farther, that there were many who even believed that the obligation to tell truth in their evidence depended solely on the complete and formal administration of an oath, to escape from which they resorted to strange and childish expedients to avoid kissing the book tendered to them. But under this Bill such men would only have to allege, not a conscientious scruple, but a mere disinclination to take an oath, and they would then, according to their own code of morality, be at liberty to tell a lie. The House had not then to consider the expediency of abolishing oaths; but he might observe that Parliament had so recently as 1858 adopted a course which showed that it did not think it would be advisable to pass a measure for the accomplishment of that object. It had been thought within the last few years that the Committees of the Lords secured more accuracy from their witnesses than the Committees of the House of Commons, because the former were examined upon oath; while no oath was administered to the latter; and the result was that an Act was passed for the express purpose of enabling the Committees of that House also to take evidence under the most solemn of all sanctions. It would be a reversal of that policy to adopt this measure by which, although oaths would not be abolished in all cases, they would be abolished in those cases in which the safeguard which they afford is most required.

MR. LOCKE after alluding to the various Acts that had been passed from time to time for dispensing with oaths, said that the real question was how the ends of justice could be best furthered. Hon. Members opposite had confined their remarks to the results obtained by the administration of oaths, and had made no reference to the effect of affirmations. What was the state of the law previous to the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act in 1854? When a witness refused to be sworn the Judge put the question: "Are you a Quaker, Moravian, or Separatist?" "I am neither," was the reply, "but I have conscientious scruples against the taking of an oath." The Judge said, "I can't relieve you, and I must commit you for contempt of Court." Great hardship and inconvenience arose from this state of the law, and it still prevailed in the criminal courts. By the Common Law Procedure Act, if the Judge was satisfied that the witness entertained conscientious scruples, he could allow him to make an affirmation instead of taking an oath. A similar course was proposed in the present measure in regard to the criminal courts. This Bill went one step further than the Bill which he himself had introduced relating to criminal cases, and which stood amongst the orders of the day for committal. The present Bill provided that in civil cases a witness might be allowed to refuse from "conscientious motives" to be sworn, and to make an affirmation. There was this difference between the Common Law Procedure Act, the Bill he had introduced, and the present Bill, the form of the affirmation in the Common Law Procedure Act which he had transferred to his Bill contained these important words, "according to my religious belief," so that a witness who entertained no religious belief whatever, would not be relieved, inasmuch as he must make the affirmation in the form prescribed before he could be allowed to give his testimony. The great object of the alterations that had been from time to time made in the law were made not solely for the purpose of relieving witnesses as for the purpose of furthering the ends of justice by the ascertainment of the truth. For instance, formerly a convicted felon was incapable of giving evidence; but now not an assize passed without a convicted prisoner being brought from gaol and placed in the witness box to give evidence. Formerly the law was that interested parties should not be permitted to give evidence, because it was supposed they must necessarily perjure themselves: now, however, not only interested parties but the plaintiff and defendant themselves were competent witnesses. Nevertheless, by the law as it existed at present, persons who had conscientious objections to taking an oath were disqualified from doing that which was permitted to convicted felons and parties to the cause. The real principle was, and it was that which this Bill sought to establish that the testimony of a witness, whether he swore or affirmed, should be admitted and weighed according to its value as it bore upon the circumstances surrounding the case. Why did not the opponents of the Bill propose to go back to the old law on the subject? If the present Bill did not receive the sanction of the House he should persevere with his Bill, which was not open to the objections which applied to this, but provided that a person desirous of making an affirmation must entertain some religious belief.

MR. M'MAHON said, he admitted that there was a good deal of force in the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, derived from the analogy of cases in which an alteration of the law had been made. But they had never yet said that a person who expressed a disbelief in a future state of rewards and punishments should be allowed to give evidence without the necessity of taking an oath. No necessity had been proposed for the change. The preamble of the Bill did not declare, and no hon. Member had said, that there had been any failure of justice in consequence of the law as it now stood in this respect. The only case mentioned by the hon. Baronet who brought in the Bill was that of Maden v. Catanach, and in it there was no pretence for saying there was any failure of justice. There the witness was not allowed to do justice unless she would swear under the sanction of an oath. She declared she did not believe herself responsible to any Supreme Being for not speaking the truth. Now, he asked, would there be safety for society if an individual like this were allowed to evade the responsibility of an oath? No civilised State allowed any one to be deprived of life, liberty, or property, unless upon evidence given upon oath. There was no real cause for this Bill. He hoped, therefore, the House would reject it, and would not be misled by any supposed analogy of the Common Law Procedure Act. In that Act it was the duty of the Judge to see that the person had really those sincere objections; but in this Bill there was no such thing—all that was necessary was that the Judge should be satisfied of the "desire" not to take an oath. And further, the person was merely to declare negatively that he did not believe that the oath would bind him more closely; but surely that was not sufficient. As for Quakers and Moravians, by the whole tenor of their lives they showed that they disapproved of oaths. He hoped, therefore, without some real cause, the House would not depart from the established practice of the country.

MR. MELLOR said, that as a sort of challenge had been thrown out to hon. Members to mention a case in which a failure of justice had taken place in consequence of the existing law he would mention one. He remembered that at the the assizes of Leicester there was a prosecution for theft. A pawnbroker's assistant, who was a material witness, refused to be sworn, and Baron Alderson committed him to prison. It appeared that this man was on his probation, preparatory to his admission into his Society of Friends. He had not been sufficiently long on probation to be admitted, but he had imbibed their principles. His committal took place on Saturday, and on the Sunday following several gentlemen, members of the Society of Friends, came to him and stated the facts. He made them known to Baron Alderson, who ordered the man to be brought before him on the Monday, in order that he might be discharged; but in the meantime a failure of justice had taken place, the prisoner had been acquitted, and a man had been kept in gaol from Saturday to Monday in consequence of his conscientious scruples. He (Mr. Mellor) without committing himself to the opinion that oaths ought to be abolished, thought that persons who had a religious belief that the taking of oaths was unlawful ought to be allowed to give their evidence on making affirmation, and the jury should be left to say, judging from the circumstances and from the manner in which the witness gave his evidence, whether his testimony was worthy of belief. He should support the second reading, as he believed that the interests of public justice would be better served by the passing of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought it his duty to give his very decided opposition to the second reading of this Bill. There were two matters quite distinct, but both deserving of their serious consideration—one the rule that should determine the competency of witnesses to give evidence in courts of justice in any form whatever; the other, the form in which—their competency being admitted—they should be allowed to give evidence. The alterations in the common law which had hitherto been sanctioned by Parliament applied to the second and subordinate question—namely, the manner in which witnesses should be allowed to testify. Now he would, in the first place, observe that the Bill of the hon. Baronet differed, essentially and in principle, from any of the measures which had hitherto become part of the law, in reference to the form in which witnesses should be permitted to give their testimony. The first relaxation of the requirement of an oath on giving evidence was in favour of the Quakers. In the reign of William III. the necessity of an oath was dispensed with in favour of the Quakers, but in civil cases only; and it was not till the reign of George IV., in the year 1829, that members of that most respectable body were allowed to give evidence by affirmation in criminal cases. By an Act of 1833 the Separatists were admitted to the privilege which they now enjoy, of giving evidence on affirmation both in criminal and civil cases. In both these cases Parliament dealt with the manner of taking the oath, and not with the competency of the persons. The same was the case in the Common Law Procedure Act passed in 1844. In all these instances, Parliament dealt, not with the great fundamental question of competence, but with the manner of taking evidence; and in each of them they proceeded on the known religious belief, on the part of those to whom relaxation was to be applied, and their known religious scruples to taking an oath. Take the case of the Quakers. They were well known as a body believing in the existence of God and in a future state of rewards and punishments; and, therefore, when Parliament dealt with them, Parliament knew that they were a religious body. The same was the case with the Separatists; and when they came to the Common Law Procedure Act, it was obvious that the assumption was that the persons in whose favour it would operate would be persons who were influenced by religious conscience. This Bill differed fundamentally from these previous measures. The Acts themselves were based on the supposition, or the positive knowledge, of religious belief and of a religious conscience; but what was the case with the present Bill? Without making the design very apparent, the real purpose of the Bill was to get rid of an ancient, a still prevailing, and in his opinion most reasonable objection to the competency as a witness of a person who had no belief in the existence of God, or in a future state of rewards and punishments. The House were not to consider the ease or convenience of the witness; they were to consider the interests of society; and he believed those interests required that persons without religious conscience and belief should not be accepted as witnesses in courts of justice, whatever the form of affirmation which they might propose to adopt. If the Bill became law any person who “shall express a desire to make an affirmation instead of an oath,” was to be permitted to do so on the Judge being satisfied of his “sincerity.” Of his sincerity as to what? Not of his conscientious objection, but of his “desire to make an affirmation instead of an oath.” This provision would admit two classes of witnesses—first, those who had no religious belief at all; and next, those who, while having a religious belief, might not consider an affirmation as binding on their conscience as an oath. The operation of the principle now proposed to be established would logically extend much beyond the particular object to which the present Bill was confined; for if the religious sanction of an oath ought to be abolished in the case of witnesses in courts of justice why should it not also be done away with in respect to jurors and to the thousands of other persons employed in the discharge of public duties? It appeared to him that this measure, proposing a most important and fundamental change, was in principle most objectionable.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Solicitor General, had entered the House at the eleventh hour, and had only repeated what had been said over and over again in the course of the present debate. He intended to vote for the second reading of the Bill; but he hoped that it would not go forth that any one who supported the measure must be in favour of no religion. There had been instances showing that a conscientious objection to oaths was not inconsistent with a religious feeling; but, after all, the public interest was the matter to be considered, and that suffered in consequence of many persons being prevented from giving evidence by conscientious scruples on the subject of oaths.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY, in reply, referred to cases in which witnesses had refused to take the oath in consequence of conscientious objections, and contended that those cases established the existence of a practical evil requiring a remedy. Moreover, it was to be feared, if the existing law were not altered, that persons would affect conscientious scruples to taking an oath when they were not disposed to give the evidence which was required of them.

LOCOMOTIVES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 (Power to restrict the use of Locomotives within the City of London),

MR. BLACK suggested an addition to the clause, requiring that no locomotive propelled by steam shall be used within any town or borough without the consent of the mayor or principal magistrate.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, as far as his observation went, the use of these locomotives in large cities was attended with great inconvenience; and he thought that without the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works, they should not be permitted to be used. Understanding that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) did not intend to move the Amendment in his name on the paper, he would, therefore, take it up.

Amendment proposed,

"In line 10, to leave out from the word 'used,' to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words 'within the limits of the Metropolis, as defined by the Act of the Session holden in the eighteenth and nineteenth years of Her Majesty for the better local management of the Metropolis, without a licence for that purpose being first obtained from the Metropolitan Board of Works to be granted under their common seal; and it shall be lawful for the said Board to impose such conditions in such licence as they may deem necessary for the public safety and convenience; and any person using any Locomotive without such licence, or contrary to the conditions thereof, within the said Metropolis, shall, on conviction of such offence before a justice of the peace, forfeit any sum not exceeding five pounds for every day during which such Locomotive shall be so used.'"

MR. AYRTON explained that he had not proposed the Amendment of which he had given notice, because the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill (Mr. Garnett) had promised to introduce a clause on the subject. These were questions, however, which in his opinion ought to be taken up by the Government, and not by individual Members; and he was the more disposed to say this because last Session the Home Secretary, when a similar Bill was before the House, had taken upon himself a good part of the work of every municipality in the kingdom.

MR. GARNETT, said, he meant to propose a clause in lieu of this 11th Clause. It had been placed in his hands by the Lord Mayor of London, and he had informed the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, after he had given notice of his Amendment, that it was his intention to move it. This clause, he believed, would answer every good purpose proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and now adopted by the hon. Baronet (Sir John Shelley).

MR. HEADLAM thought that no serious objections had been raised against these locomotives. He was in favour of the measure, but he only expressed his own opinion, and wished to be understood as not speaking on the part of the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN suggested that it would be desirable there should be some uniformity of practice. An Act had been passed on the subject of tramways, in which municipalities had power given them to interdict their introduction; whereas tramways were much less formidable than these new locomotives. He thought that the authority to licence them should be local rather than placed in the hands of the Secretary of State.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, one great objection to leaving the matter in the hands of the local municipal authorities was that it would lead to great uncertainty as to the state of the law. It would reproduce the uncertainty that existed formerly with regard to dogcarts. He had taken the trouble to trace the progress of a man with a dogcart proceeding from the south to the north of England. In one town he would be allowed to pass free; in the next he would be imprisoned, and so on alternately throughout the whole journey.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, he was sorry to observe a feeling of jealousy arising in that House against the powers exercised by municipal bodies. For his own part, he thought the town councils were quite as capable of judging for themselves what was expedient within their own jurisdictions as the House of Commons of judging for them. From daily experience he could declare that the effect of the tramway laid down at Bayswater was to monopolise at least half of that populous Broadway; and he thought the locomotives would still more effectually extend all ordinary traffic.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT denied that there was any ground for the observation of the hon. Gentleman that there was a feeling of jealousy in any part of that House against the power exercised by corporations. In regard to the laying down of permanent ways, he thought that the local authorities were the best judges of their expediency or otherwise; but the case of locomotives was quite different. He thought the decision had best be left to some central authority, and was quite content to leave it in the hands of the Home Secretary.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS thought, on the whole, that the clause proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Garnett) ought to be adopted. He had no ambition, as Home Secretary, to interfere in these matters, and had done nothing last Session to attain any such power. If the House thought the local municipal authorities were the right persons to regulate such matters, he would have no objection; but if it was thought the Secretary of State ought to have the control, he could only say that he would endeavour to do his duty.

Question "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause." Put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the proposed words be there added."

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH then moved an Amendment to the effect that these locomotives should not run without a licence from the mayor or other authority of any borough through which they were to pass.

Amendment proposed to said proposed Amendment,

"After the words 'their common seal,' to insert the words 'nor within the limits of any Municipal or Parliamentary borough, without a licence for that purpose being first obtained from the mayor and town council, or other chief municipal authority of such borough, to be granted under their common seal.'"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the effect of this Amendment would be not to regulate, but to put an entire stop to this mode of conveyance.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, as this privilege was now given to London, he did not see why it should not be enjoyed by the towns in the country.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that if the Amendment was adopted the Bill might as well be abandoned.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted in the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 103: Majority 71.

Question put, "That the words originally proposed to be added to the Clause be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 87: Majority 48.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill." Put, and negatived.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

Clause 14 (Extent of Act),

COLONEL FRENCH moved that Ireland be excluded from the Bill.

MR. M'MAHON reminded the hon. and gallant Member that there was no law in Ireland against the use of locomotives; and the consequence of this Amendment would be that they would have all the inconveniences, without any of the advantages which this Bill would give them.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Friday, and to be printed. [Bill 174.]

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH RELIEF BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LOCKE moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. M'MAHON said, that this Bill did not substantially differ from the Bill they had already disposed of. It was said that its provisions were already applied to civil proceedings; but the cases were different. The person for whom this relief was proposed was to be called on to affirm that according to his religious belief it was unlawful to take an oath. How could it be unlawful? The only law this Bill was concerned with was the law of England, and a man was to be called on to say that his religious belief was that the law of England forbade the taking of an oath. This alone showed how little consideration had been given to the Bill. Criminal cases were different from civil cases; for witnesses were drawn indiscriminately from all classes of society, and every sanction ought to be taken that they should speak the truth. He moved that the House go into Committee that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. STEUART seconded the Motion.

MR. LOCKE said, that the Bill proposed to enact in this country what was already the law in Ireland. There was this difference between the present Bill and the Affirmations Bill, that the present measure required that the person making a declaration in lieu of an oath should have a religious belief; while the Affirmations Bill required no religious belief in the person making the declaration.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that his objection to the Bill was not one of principle, but rather of degree. Those who had had experience in our criminal courts must be convinced that there were thousands who were prepared to tell a lie who yet shrank from committing the offence of perjury. He believed that the Bill was uncalled for, and would be dangerous in its operation.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS held it to be a mistake and a fallacy to contend that rules in regard to oaths that might be adopted in civil suits were equally suitable for criminal proceedings. In civil cases the defendant might be examined on oath. Was the hon. and learned Member for Southwark prepared to examine the prisoner in criminal cases on oath likewise?

MR. CRAUFURD must remind the Solicitor General that this was, and had been for some time, the law in Ireland. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had such strong objections to the Bill, why did he not bring in a measure to repeal the Irish Act?

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, June 13, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—3<sup>d</sup> Wills of Personality by British-Subjects.

WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the Third Reading of this Bill,

VISCOUNT LIFFORD rose to call the attention of the House to the Acts 8 & 9 Vict. c. 178 and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 176. The noble Viscount said that in 1845 an Act of Parliament was passed by which a Commission was constituted to open a street leading from the Houses of Parliament to Buckingham Palace. This was to be done at a cost of £150,000, and the Commissioners subscribed £50,000 among themselves, re-payment of which was to be postponed until after every other debt and claim was satisfied. In 1847 another Act passed which authorized the raising of other sums, and also empowered the Commissioners to fly an unlimited number of "kites." In 1852 they bought 121 properties. The street, now known as Victoria Street, was then opened, and the ground they had to dispose of was valued at £400,000, while the mortgages were £128,000, and the bonds £130,000, leaving a large surplus. But between April, 1852, and December, 1854, the Commissioners had incurred liabilities to the extent of £1,043,246. It was right to state that the Chairman of the Commissioners had from the first opposed these proceedings, and had remonstrated by letter and in every possible way. The Commissioners got rid of their chairman and another member, and at the end of the two years they had contrived to borrow £700,000 more than the property was worth. This property was sufficient to pay off the debts, but not a farthing would be left to the bondholders. A new Commission was now appointed, and it was most important that their good name should not suffer from former transactions; he would, therefore, state that the new Commissioners were in no way responsible for the misdeeds of their predecessors. The street was now opened, and would, when completed, be one of the finest in London. But it was necessary to put an end to the present unfortunate position of the property; and the new Commissioners had, therefore, introduced the present Bill to enable them to sell the property and pay off the mortgagees; but there would be nothing left for the bondholders. This Westminster Commission had proved a great blow to enterprises of the same kind; but it was only right it should be known that up to the year 1852 the speculation did pay, and it was owing solely to the extravagant conduct pursued after that period, and for which the present Commissioners were in no way responsible, that the undertaking had been brought to its present miserable condition. The street was then open from end to end, and the Commission had nothing to do but let the land, and carry out the object for which the aid of the Government had been granted. It ought to go forth that undertakings of this kind would pay, except in cases like this, in which such extraordinary powers were given.

LORD REDESDALE thought what had been stated was very important; it had been a most extraordinary transaction from first to last. The present Bill was intended to remedy the difficulties in which the whole undertaking had been placed.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup>, and passed.

ADMIRAL ELLIOT AND THE FRENCH DOCKYARDS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he wished to refer to a matter that affected the character of a private individual. He had given notice by letter to the noble Duke the head of the Admiralty; he regretted that the noble Duke was not in his place, but he did not intend to say anything that required an answer. What he wished to refer to was a statement made by the noble Duke, on Tuesday evening, affecting the character of a gallant officer in the navy. In the course of a discussion which took place that evening on the Government of the Navy Bill, in adverting to certain statements that had been made by Sir John Pakington in "another place," the noble Duke said—

"The noble Earl first called your Lordships' attention to the question of iron-cased ships, and referred to a speech lately made in the other House, founded on information furnished to a right hon. Baronet by Admiral Elliot. Admiral Elliot went to France, and applied, through the English Minister there, for leave to visit the dockyards of that country, in the same way as French officers have often applied for leave to visit our dockyards. His request was acceded to with the civility which the French authorities would naturally desire to show in such a case. Admiral Elliot went, and saw all that was going on in those establishments; but I must confess that, under the circumstances, I sincerely regret the course which he took on his return to England. If I myself had given a French officer permission to view our dockyards, and I afterwards found that he took the first opportunity of publishing the results of his inspection in the manner adopted by the gallant Admiral, I certainly should not think he had done a very friendly act."

Their Lordships would agree with him that such a statement, made by the noble Duke, might lead one to suppose that Admiral Elliot had visited the French dockyards, perhaps under the direction of the Admiralty, probably of his own accord; but, at all events, that he did something contrary to good manners, or played something like the part of a spy; that he had come back and related what he ought not to have related; or done something he ought not to have done. He was sure the House would also admit that between the officers of the French and English Navies there ought to exist a mutual feeling of brotherly and professional respect and regard; so that if the day should ever unhappily come when political events and difficulties should plunge the two nations into war, they might engage in that war free from any feelings of personal animosity. This would not be the case if it was thought that on either side anything like a system of espionage had been carried on. He was sure that if political differences ever led to such a melancholy event as a war between the two countries, the chivalrous feeling of the English naval officers would only be surpassed by that of the French, and even in such a war, he hoped no personal animosities would exist between them. It was, therefore, necessary there should be no misunderstanding on a matter of this kind; that there should not be the slightest impression that any officer of high rank had acted in any manner inconsistent with honourable and correct feeling. Now, what was the history of Admiral Elliot's visit to the French dockyards? Admiral Elliot went to Cherbourg, with two friends, in the yacht of one of them, with the intention of paying a visit to the French dockyards. They saw the dockyard of Cherbourg and afterwards that of Brest, by the full permission of the Prefet and authorities. The manner in which they were received showed that there was no idea they came with any purpose the French authorities were not willing to assist them in carrying out. They were shown over the arsenal and works, the French officers affected no concealment; they were proud, and justly so, of the progress they were making in the construction of the iron-plated ships. He should mention that before he left for France Admiral Elliot called on the noble Duke and told him of his intention. He asked the noble Duke if he could be of any use to the Admiralty; if he wished to have anything reported to him. The noble Duke very prudently replied, "You know all that interests us in England, I shall be glad if you can tell us anything the French are doing in which we are interested." After leaving Cherbourg Admiral Elliot went to L'Orient and Rochefort; these establishments he found he could not see without the permission of the French Admiralty. He wrote to Lord Cowley's Secretary, requesting that the permission might be applied for. It was given, and under that official permission he visited those dockyards also. When Admiral Elliot returned to England he told his friends—among them the Duke of Somerset and Sir John Pakington—what he had seen, and, as far as Admiral Elliot was concerned, there the matter ended. When the noble Duke said he had "published" what he saw he was sure he did not mean all that the scope of the word implied—that he did not mean the statement to be in any way offensive. Now, supposing Admiral Elliot, when at L'Orient and Rochefort, did see a great deal that he was not shown; supposing he saw, by accident, something of great interest, and supposing he has never mentioned what he saw? Did not that prove the character of honesty, and the absence of anything like an intention to be a spy? He could not say that such was the case, but he was bound to say that all Admiral Elliot did see he saw openly and fairly, and under the eyes of the French officers themselves, nor had he revealed to his friends or to the noble Duke anything except what he had seen in such a manner. In the absence of the noble Duke he felt that he ought not to say more, but in saying what he had he thought he had only done his duty to a brother officer in vindicating, not his character, for that required no vindication, but his acts, from the imputation suggested by the large words used the other night by the noble Duke. Admiral Elliot was only travelling for amusement when he visited the dockyards of France, and not in any way as the agent of Government.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE regretted that the noble Earl had not felt it consistent with his duty to postpone his statement. The noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty was absent in the performance of his public duties, and, therefore, had either not received the letter which the noble Earl had addressed to him, or had been unable to take advantage of it. He (the Duke of Newcastle) would have felt it his duty to interrupt the noble Earl if he had not begun by stating that he rose to vindicate the character of an absent Friend; but he still thought it would have been better for all parties if the statement had been deferred until to-morrow. That opinion was confirmed by what had fallen from the noble Earl. The Report to which the noble Earl had referred was, no doubt, accurate; but there was no charge conveyed in the observations of the noble Duke affecting Admiral Elliot's honour, although the discretion of that gallant officer in this particular instance was challenged. The noble Duke never used the word "spy," but the noble Earl opposite said he rose to vindicate his friend from the imputation of being a spy. The statement of the noble Duke had been borne out, for it was within his knowledge that the conduct of Admiral Elliot had given offence to the parties concerned in France, who felt that his act had been far from friendly. They would have considered it was the duty of Admiral Elliot, as an Englishman, to report to the Admiralty what he had seen; but the gallant Admiral had gone far beyond that. The noble Earl said that Admiral Elliot had not "published" his information; and true it was that he had not published an essay upon the state of the French navy, but he had taken the best possible means of widely publishing his statements. If he had simply made a statement, as he did, to the noble Duke, he would have done his duty; but the gallant Admiral did far more—he not only communicated his statement in conversation to his friends, but he placed it in writing in the hands of a Gentleman who he must have expected and intended would have used the very best mode of publication in the world. A letter in the newspapers might have attracted comparatively little attention, but the debates in the House of Commons on such a subject were sure to be read. If the noble Earl would have condemned the gallant Admiral for publishing his statement, how could he approve his conduct in taking the very best means of making it public? Sir John Pakington had expressly stated in the other House that he made the statement he did upon the authority of Admiral Elliot. He (the Duke of Newcastle) had chiefly risen to explain the cause of his noble Friend's absence, and he could not but repeat his regret that the noble Earl had not deferred his observations until to-morrow.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, the course he had taken had arisen entirely from a feeling that the statement put forward by the noble Duke ought as speedily as possible to be explained, especially to our friends on the other side of the water. As to the use made of the gallant Admiral's information, all he need say was that Admiral Elliott and Sir John Pakington were personal friends; that he was justified in communicating what he had seen to his friend, and there, as far as he was concerned, the matter ended. That it was afterwards used in the House of Commons was not his act.

CHIEF JUSTICE MONAHAN.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I wish to call the attention of the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Leitrim) to the subject of a notice of Motion which he has placed upon the paper, and which stands for this day week. My noble Friend the other evening, without any previous notice, made several remarks upon the conduct of Chief Justice Monahan in reference to certain proceedings at the last summer assizes for the county of Donegal. My noble Friend the Lord Chancellor instantly rose and protested in very strong terms against the course taken by my noble Friend in preferring accusations without notice, and, consequently, without the opportunity of an answer being given. The noble Earl then said he would place a notice upon the paper, which would enable us to discuss the whole question; and, in pursuance of that promise, he did put down the notice which now appears upon the paper—that he would move for the return of certain presentments. My noble Friend the Lord Chancellor immediately said that such a notice did not at all advance the matter, as it gave no intimation of the nature of the charges which were intended to be preferred. I then understood my noble Friend to say that he would shape his Motion in such a way as to satisfy the friends of the Chief Justice. My noble Friend did me the honour at the time to communicate to me the particular grounds upon which he should bring under our notice the conduct of Chief Justice Monahan. I immediately expressed my opinion that there hardly appeared to be sufficient grounds to warrant such a serious step, and I said that I thought that the conduct of Judges ought not to be arraigned unless there was some specific charge of corruption, partiality, or other gross misconduct, which all persons would admit to deserve serious reprehension. I have reflected on the matter since, and I find my first impression to be the correct one. I have been struck with the inconvenience of bringing forward complaints against a Judge without the existence of serious charges. To the Judge such a course would be prejudicial, for, even if he satisfactorily answers the complaint, still the fact of the charge having been raised will be remembered against him. It will also operate extremely prejudicially for the public interest, in the administration of justice, if every Judge is to be liable to censure in Parliament upon all occasions.

Under these circumstances I have communicated my opinion to my noble Friend, and I hope that he will be good enough to listen to my recommendation and withdraw his Motion, which can be attended by no beneficial result, but which may prove very prejudicial for the public interest.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: My Lords, no Member of this House is more desirous to support the authority of the judicial bench than I am; and it was with sincere pain that I made the observations which I did the other evening with respect to Chief Justice Monahan. I felt strongly that what had taken place had caused much uneasiness in the locality concerned, and I did not intend to comment on the circumstances more warmly than I thought absolutely necessary. The noble and learned Lord on the woolsack having complained that no notice had been given, so as to enable an answer to be prepared to my animadversions, my object in giving my Notice of Motion was to afford such an opportunity. I have, however, no desire to go on with any discussion which your Lordships may think would be prejudicial to the public interests, and I, therefore, feel great pleasure in adopting the suggestion of my noble and learned Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Am I to understand that the noble Earl withdraws his charges? If he does so I am contented, and do not wish to say anything more on this subject. But, unless he withdraws his charges, I must request him to proceed and state them.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: I cannot retract a single syllable of what I said. What the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack wishes me to do is quite impossible.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD was understood to say that charges of this kind were not considered in Ireland to be of that serious character that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack took them to be. The wisest course would now be to allow it at once to drop.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I say that most serious charges were brought against Chief Justice Monahan; for if a Judge betrays his duty and makes himself a political partisan by delivering a party charge to the grand jury I think he is guilty of gross misconduct.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I think the observations with which my noble and learned Friend opened this discussion were in singular taste and discretion, and that my noble Friend on the cross bench followed those observations by gracefully withdrawing his notice of Motion. There the matter might have ended satisfactorily to all parties; and I must say I regret the remarks which have since fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

EARL GREY: I cannot agree with the expressions of the noble Earl opposite. It seems to me that nothing can be more unsatisfactory than that a most serious charge should be incidentally thrown out against a Judge, and that, when objection is taken to going on with that charge without notice, notice of Motion should be given, and that then that notice should be withdrawn, unaccompanied by any withdrawal of the charge itself. I put myself in the position of Chief Justice Monahan. If I were accused of abusing my position as a Judge by delivering a partizan charge, and such an accusation were formally preferred against me in this House, I should desire either that my friends should have an opportunity of meeting it, or that it should be distinctly withdrawn. Therefore, I entirely concur with my noble and learned Friend on the woolsack that one of two courses, and one only, ought to be taken by the noble Lord on the cross bench. He ought either distinctly to say that there is no ground for any imputation on the conduct of Chief Justice Monahan, or else to state publicly in this House the ground on which he condemns that conduct, and so allow those to whom that learned Judge may trust his defence to answer the charge as best they can.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I am exceedingly sorry to see the noble Earl opposite so unwilling as he appears to be to permit oil to be thrown on the troubled waters. If I also were to place myself in the position of the learned Judge referred to I feel that I should be perfectly satisfied. Of course, the honour of every man must be in his own hands, and he must be the best judge of how it is to be vindicated. But I do not believe I am less particular on that point than other public men, and I have no hesitation in stating that I with very great regret heard the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack use the expression which he did after my noble Friend (the Earl of Leitrim) sat down. My noble Friend was ready to drop the subject, and willing to abandon the charges supposed to have been made. ["No!"] At all events, he said he would not bring them on before your Lordships. And when the noble Earl opposite throws out a taunt respecting accusations I must say I am not aware of any specific accusation having yet been laid upon your Lordships' Table. There was, indeed, a general expression of condemnation of a learned Judge's conduct the other night, which I as much regretted to hear as any other of your Lordships; but there was not such a positive and particular charge made as to render it necessary that this House should carry this unfortunate matter further. When my noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford), who is certainly as careful of the character of a Judge as any man, said what he did, and when the noble Earl on the cross bench stated that he would not proceed with or repeat the statements which he made the other evening, I am sorry that anybody possessing so much weight with your Lordships as the noble Earl opposite does, from his great ability and experience, should not have used his influence, as I have already said, to throw oil on the troubled waters.

EARL GREY: My reason for rising was that the noble Earl on the cross bench distinctly stated that he did not retract a single word of what he had said. In my opinion a censure upon a Judge ought not to be lightly pronounced. If pronounced at all, it ought to be done upon grave occasions, and with due notice, so that there might be time to prepare an answer to it; and I cannot but think that under the circumstances a Judge is not placed in a right position if an accuser does not retract his charge as well as withdraw his notice of Motion.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW: As the matter now stands, these charges have been brought forward, but have not been abandoned by the noble Earl on the cross bench, who, in conformity with the desire of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford), has merely consented not to proceed further with the subject. As put by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack the case is perfectly just. But, as I perceive we are not likely to have any more upon this question, I feel bound to say that, although I have had no acquaintance whatever with Chief Justice Monahan, I know the sentiments entertained by the Bar generally towards him, and I am sure it is the universal feeling in Ireland that a more upright, more learned, or more impartial Judge never sat on the bench of that country.

LORD LYVEDEN: I agree that the noble and learned Lord who introduced this subject to-night did so with the best possible taste. But he said that none but the gravest charges—for example, the charge of corruption—ought to be brought against the Judges in Parliament. Now, I understood the noble Earl on the cross bench to use the word "corrupt." ["No!"] Certainly, he stated that this Judge had said on the bench what he must have known not to be true. [The Earl of LERTM: No!] After the violent expressions in which the noble Earl had indulged it was not sufficient that he should now say he would not persevere with his charges. It was surely incumbent on him to express some regret for the language he had used.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I really did not hear the violent language ascribed to my noble Friend. At the time he was addressing your Lordships I was otherwise engaged. I did not understand that the noble Earl made any specific charge—certainly he made no serious charge—against Chief Justice Monahan. On that I formed the opinion which I expressed, and if your Lordships really think I was wrong in recommending my noble Friend to withdraw his Motion I am sure he will not consider himself bound by anything I have said. Indeed, after the discussion which has just taken place, I will not ask him to follow my advice on the subject, unless he feels that he is entirely justified in doing so.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I am sure no one can doubt the spirit in which the noble and learned Lord opposite advised the noble Earl on the cross bench to withdraw his notice; but I cannot help thinking that the suggestion the noble and learned Lord now makes is really the correct one; and upon the whole, unless the noble Earl is prepared to withdraw the charges he made against Chief Justice Monahan on a former occasion, it is most desirable for the character of this House and of an absent Judge that the noble Earl should persevere with his Motion, and bring forward the charge in order that the matter may be discussed and disposed of. It is all very well to talk of throwing oil on the troubled waters, as a noble Lord expressed it, or making things comfortable; but this is not a matter between two sides of the House, or between one noble Lord and another; it has reference to the character of an absent Judge, which is placed in the greatest jeopardy. The noble Earl denies that he used the word "corrupt," and that he ever said the Chief Justice had stated what was not true; but undoubtedly the purport of his charges was that he sitting on the bench had acted as a political partisan; and, as I conceive, a graver charge cannot be made against any Judge. How would that learned Judge stand if the Motion, in the present state of the matter, were not brought forward? The charge would remain. It would be said the noble Earl in his place in Parliament made a grave charge against a learned Judge; but on it being represented to him by the noble and learned Lord opposite that the charge was not sufficiently grave to be brought forward in that House he had withdrawn the Motion. It would be added that the noble Earl did not withdraw the charge, and the House had no opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. I do hope, therefore, the noble Earl will take one of two courses—either entirely retract the charges he made or persevere with the Motion of which he gave notice.

LORD CRANWORTH: I entirely concur in what has been stated by the noble Duke. The matter must somehow or other be brought before your Lordships; but I appeal to the noble Earl whether common fairness to Chief Justice Monahan does not require that he should shape his Motion in some other terms than those in which it now appears. In its present form it communicates nothing whatever which would enable the learned Judge through his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack or any other Peer to make his defence. Surely the notice ought to state distinctly with what the noble Earl charges the Chief Justice.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON: I am sorry, my Lords, to take up your time further on this matter, but this discussion ought not, in my opinion, to end without some expression in regard to Chief Justice Monahan coming from this side of the House. I can only say that from the position I held two years ago in Ireland I naturally came in contact with nearly all the Judges. I was frequently, both in society and on matters of business, brought into contact with Chief Justice Monahan; and I can assure your Lordships that there was no member on the judicial bench of whom I formed a higher opinion. I believe him to be a man of extremely high character and talent, and of the utmost impartiality.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: I cannot agree to follow the counsel of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth), nor do I feel in the least called upon to do so. This matter is not without precedent, as has been asserted by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. On the contrary, I find exactly similar charges were made some years ago in the other House of Parliament against an equally learned Judge—the late Baron Smith. Nay, more, I find the name of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in the list of the majority on a division upon that occasion for an inquiry into that learned Judge's conduct.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I rise to order. There is at present no Question before the House. ["Oh, oh!"] That would be sufficient to stop this discussion from going on. But surely it will be expected by your Lordships that the noble Earl should not proceed to bring forward his charges without any notice whatsoever. I never complained in the slightest degree that he should bring a charge against a learned Judge. It might be his duty to do so. My complaint was that, without retracting the charge against Chief Justice Monahan, he abandoned his intention of bringing it on for discussion.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I rise to order. When the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack calls my noble Friend to order he is not entitled to make a speech. My noble Friend was not bringing forward the charge against Chief Justice Monahan without notice; he was insinuating something against the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the Government with which he was connected on a former occasion.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: I am entirely in the hands of the House. I am perfectly satisfied with the notice as it stands. I am not prepared to put on the paper a bill of indictment against Chief Justice Monahan. I will not do it. I am not, like some of my advisers, a learned Lord; I am a simple layman; at the same time I have as good a sense of propriety as any noble Lord in the House. I have had occasion to complain, perhaps to the great annoyance of your Lordships, of the manner in which the Government of Ireland is conducted. In presenting a petition from the county of Donegal, I, among other matters, animadverted on the conduct of the Chief Justice; but I did not say that he stated what he knew was untrue. I said what he stated was untrue and that he must have been misinformed; that he must have received, out of court, wrong information. What I complained of was that a Judge should get information on certain matters out of doors and act upon it.

LORD REDESDALE: I really think it most desirable that this matter should end here. The noble Earl, having expressed an opinion with regard to Chief Justice Monahan, gave notice of a Motion on the subject; he is willing to say no more about it, but cannot admit that it was an indiscreet charge. A very high opinion has been expressed of Chief Justice Monahan; and he may well rest satisfied with that expression of opinion on both sides of the House—quite as well as if the charge had been discussed; and as the noble Earl is willing not to carry the matter further I really think it should be allowed now to drop.

LORD BROUGHAM: Whatever the noble Earl on the cross benches may say in words, of his refusing to retract what he before said, I consider that in substance and effect the charges against Chief Justice Monahan were withdrawn when the noble Earl consented to abandon his Motion.

TICKETS OF LEAVE—CASE OF MICHAEL GARDINER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved for Correspondence respecting the granting of a Ticket-of-Lieave to Michael Gardiner, a Convict, who pleaded guilty at the Spring Assizes for the County of Roscommon in 1849 to an Indictment for Conspiracy to murder Major Denis Mahon. The noble Earl said it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that in 1847 the south west of Ireland was in a very disturbed state, and that several magistrates and others were shot at, and attempts were made against the lives of a number of persons. Major Denis Mahon, one of the principal landowners in the county of Roscommon, was shot dead a short distance from his own residence. For this murder three persons were arrested, and tried at the Summer Assizes of 1848. One was convicted and hanged; a second escaped conviction, the jury having, through terrorism, disagreed; and the third, Michael Gardiner, who was indicted not for the murder but for conspiracy to murder, and who, in fact, plotted the whole affair, and employed the actual murderers, offered to plead guilty if his life was spared. In 1848 there were sixty-six prisoners for trial in the county of Roscommon, of whom four were for murder and nineteen for conspiracy to murder. In the following year, to show that crime had not decreased, there were ninety-seven prisoners, of whom nine were charged with murder and fourteen with conspiracy to murder. In the case of the murder of Major Mahon the prisoners refused to join in their panel. The man who fired the fatal shot was executed. The second was discharged, because, although he was assured by a gentleman who was present that the evidence was perfectly clear, the jury dared not agree upon a verdict. Gardiner was then put upon his trial, and offered to plead "Guilty," provided he were assured that his life would be spared. Mr. Monahan was at the time the law officer of the Crown, but it was not until subsequently, when Mr. Hatchel filled that position, that the plea was finally accepted. The result of its acceptance was that Michael Gardiner had sentence of death recorded against him—a sentence which, however, was afterwards commuted into transportation for life. He could not say in what prison the offender had, since 1849, the period of his conviction, been confined by the authorities; but in the month of March in the present year, to the great surprise of the magistrates and people of Roscommon, he received a ticket-of-leave, and was allowed to walk back to the scene of his crime, and, so to speak, to walk over the grave of his victim. It might be said he had behaved well in prison, and that according to the rules acted upon by the governors of our convict establishments he was entitled to the ticket-of-leave which he had obtained; but the simple answer to such an argument was that the sooner rules which admitted of such occurrences as that to which he was alluding were changed the better. He might add that it had been proved in evidence that Gardiner was actually the man who had loaded the gun with which the murder in question had been committed—and some explanation was, under those circumstances, he thought, due from the Government, why it was he had been set at liberty? It was but right that he should also state that Gardiner, having gone back to his former haunts, had, he believed, some time ago betaken himself to Manchester, which was the head quarters of the Ribbon Societies of the United Kingdom, it might be there to receive instructions as to how he should proceed in carrying out the principles to which, before his imprisonment, he had been shown to be attached. He should simply say, in conclusion, that he hoped the Government would take the matter into their serious consideration.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he did not wish to make a single observation in opposition to that revision of the rules of our convict prison which the noble Earl had suggested, but must assure him that so long as those rules remained as they were, the confinement of Gardiner could not with propriety have been continued beyond the period at which his ticket-of-leave had been granted. Although, he might observe, the noble Earl had given notice that he intended to make a Motion on the subject, he yet had not formally done so, and, indeed, there was no correspondence whatsoever bearing upon the point at issue, which, if ordered, could be produced. He might further observe, that as he understood the rules relating to the carrying out of our convict system, prior to the final abolition of transportation in 1857, it was an established regulation that a criminal who was sentenced to transportation for life, and was retained in this country, should be discharged on licence at the expiration of ten years from the time of his conviction, unless during the time of his imprisonment, he should have been proved to have been guilty of any misconduct justifying his further confinement. When transportation was abolished and penal servitude instituted in its stead, it had been found necessary to revise that rule; and proceeding analogically, it had been laid down that any convict sentenced to penal servitude for life should be kept in custody for a period of twelve years, with the same proviso as had previously existed with reference to transportation for life. But to advert to the case immediately under the notice of the House, he should remind the noble Earl he had omitted to mention that another man named Michael Brennan had pleaded "Guilty" on the same occasion as Gardiner to the same offence, had precisely the same sentence pronounced upon him, but had that sentence remitted by the law officers of the day, after having undergone an imprisonment of only two or three years, upon the ground that the evidence against him was much less clear than that against Gardiner. He had explained how the rules with respect to convict prisons had been changed in 1857; but Michael Gardiner was convicted under the old law, and his sentence was commuted to transportation for life. Therefore, he would have been entitled to claim his discharge on licence at the expiration of ten years; but it was felt that his case was so bad that it was requisite to carry the rules to the utmost extent that was permissible, and, therefore, Michael Gardiner was detained for twelve years, and was not discharged before March of the present year. Consequently the noble Earl would see that however much the rules might require modification, no undue leniency had been exhibited towards Michael Gardiner, but that the full punishment was carried into execution. The noble Earl had stated that Michael Gardiner had been very recently walking about Stroke's Town. He (the Duke of Newcastle) was not aware that that was the case, but he was glad that the noble Earl was aware that the man was no longer in that neighbourhood, and had removed to Manchester. He was acquainted with the name of the street and the number of the house where the returned convict was residing. He could not say whether the man had gone to that town for the bad motives glanced at by the noble Earl, or from a desire to get out of a neighbourhood, a stay in which ought, from reminiscences, to be so horrible to his feelings; but the noble Earl would admit that the Government could have taken, according to the usual rules, no other course than that which had been adopted, though it might be a question whether the rules should not have more elasticity than at present.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON believed that the convict system in Ireland worked generally in a most excellent manner, but he was convinced, from the explanation given and from his own experience, that in this instance nobody was to blame and that the system alone was in fault. He also quite concurred in the hope that that system would be so far changed as to prevent such gross cases as that now brought before their Lordships' notice. He thought that a man condemned to penal servitude for murder for life should be placed apart from his fellow beings for the rest of his life. He was induced to intrude now upon their Lordships' attention in consequence of a case which occurred while he was in Ireland. In an island near Dublin, called Ireland's Eye, a man named Kirwan murdered his wife in a most dreadful manner, and upon circumstantial evidence he was convicted and sentenced to death. A memorial, as was usual in all such cases, for a remission of the sentence was presented to him, and to his surprise the memorial was supported by the opinion of the two presiding Judges—Mr. Justice Crampton and Mr. Baron Greene, Judges of the highest character—on the plea that evidence had since come to light which ought to have been brought forward at the trial, and which might have saved the man from conviction. His own impression was that the man, if innocent, ought to be pardoned altogether, and, if not, that the extreme penalty of the law should be inflicted; but, of course, where the two Judges recommended a commutation of the sentence, he could hardly, on his own responsibility, order the man for execution. He felt so strongly on the subject, however, that he laid the case before the then Lord Chancellor, with the intention of being guided by his decision. The Lord Chancellor concurred with the Judges, and the sentence was accordingly commuted. He next heard of this dreadful murderer in the following way:—When he was again in Ireland, in 1858, the man's name appeared in a batch with others which were submitted to him with the view of recommending their return from Bermuda. He, however, refused to recommend the return of Kirwan, and he thought he was justified in that course. He was glad to have the opportunity of clearing himself from the imputation of having done, on his own responsibility, that which he felt at the time to be wrong, and of pointing out the possibility of the worst of murderers being brought back upon society under the present system.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that with the present system of Government in Ireland it was almost impossible to preserve the peace of the country. With regard to tickets of leave, he thought that, if given at all, they should only allow the holders to go beyond the confines of the kingdom; least of all should men who had been convicted of the grossest crimes be allowed to return to the place where they had committed those crimes.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON expressed the satisfaction with which he had listened to the explanation given by the noble Earl (the Earl of Eglinton) respecting the case of Kirwan, and he believed this explanation would give equal satisfaction in Ireland. He had heard with surprise that a ticket of leave had been given to a person who had been convicted, at least, of a conspiracy to murder, and that he should be permitted again to revisit the scene of his former crime and perhaps, as had been forcibly said, to walk over the very grave of his victim. He thought that the release of a man who had committed an offence so closely allied to murder was inconsistent with the safety of human life throughout the country.

The Earl of Eglinton

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was also shocked that under any system a person convicted of murder, but whose sentence of transportation had been commuted, could, after the lapse of a few years, revisit the scene of his crime. He heartily concurred in the disapproval which had been expressed with regard to such a system, and he would undertake, with the assistance of the Home Secretary and of the Under Secretary of State (Mr. Waddington), to revise that system, and see whether such an abuse could not be put an end to.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE expressed his acknowledgments for the assurance given by the noble and learned Lord, and said he was quite satisfied with the result of the discussion which had been elicited.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he appeared to have been misunderstood both by the Lord Chancellor and the noble Lord. What he was explaining was the rule as to convicts in Ireland. The rule as to ten and twelve years' convicts in England was quite different.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, 'till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade, On what day he intends to move for leave to introduce his Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts? The reason he put the question was that the right hon. Gentleman had informed him it was his intention to introduce the Bill, if possible, this week, and had authorized him to write to his constituents, with whom he had compromised himself. ["Order, order!"]

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was extremely difficult to give a decided answer as to the time when public business would come on. He was very anxious to bring in a Bill, but he could not tell the hon. Baronet on what day it would be introduced, or whether it would be possible to introduce it at all during the present Session. He was not able to command time; but in a day or two he trusted he would be able to give the hon. Baronet a positive answer.

THE MAIL CONTRACTS.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, The number and date of the different breaches of contract committed by the Cunard, Peninsular and Oriental, and West India Companies, during the two first years of their service, and the number of penalties imposed; and to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in how many instances such penalties were remitted by the Treasury?

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask how it had happened that the Papers for which he had moved in reference to that question, and which had been ordered by the House, had not yet been produced?

MR. PEEL said, that the papers for which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel French) had moved were being prepared by the Admiralty; and he (Mr. F. Peel) could not state when they would be ready. In reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway county (Mr. Gregory), he had to state that, although he had had some difficulty in procuring the information which the hon. Gentleman required, in consequence of the distance of the time to which it referred, he had, he believed, succeeded in ascertaining all the facts which were necessary to furnish an answer to that question. He would first take the Cunard Company. That company had been in existence since the year 1840, and during the whole of that time, and not merely during the first two years of their existence, they had never committed any breach of contract; they had incurred no penalties, and they had never, that he was aware of, at any moment asked for any indulgence or allowance from the Government; they had, in fact, carried the mails with undeviating regularity during the twenty-one years of their contract. The Peninsular and Oriental Company had been almost equally successful in the regularity with which they had performed the obligations of their contract; and he could only find one instance of the imposition of a penalty upon them, and that was with regard to their branch service between Malta and the Ionian Islands. In the year 1841 or 1842 they failed to provide a vessel for the conveyance of the mails between Malta and those islands, and they were fined £1,000 for that breach of contract, and they were required to pay that sum. With regard to the West India Company he found that that company should have commenced their voyages on the 1st of December, 1841, according to their contract, but in consequence of a delay in the completion of their vessels they were allowed to postpone the opening of the service for a single month, that was to say until the 1st of January, 1842. He could find only one instance of a breach of contract on their part in the departure of their vessels from this country, which was in the month of December, 1842, when one of their vessels was five days behind time in leaving the port of Falmouth. In consequence of that delay they were fined £3,500; and, although they remonstrated very strongly against the imposition of that penalty, the Government insisted on its payment. He would refer to the evidence of Colonel Chappell, who stated with respect to that company before the Committee, in 1849, that—

"There have been 181 mails despatched from this country since they commenced, which have all gone at the appointed moments with one exception, for which the company were, in my opinion, most unjustly fined £3,500, which they were obliged to pay."

With regard to the Intercolonial Mail Service, it appeared that it fell into great confusion and irregularity during the first year of their contract. They alleged that the reason of that irregularity was that the scheme of routes was so intricate and so extensive as to be almost impracticable. The Admiralty, however, maintained that the real cause was that the company did not maintain a sufficient number of vessels in the West Indies, and they fined the company £8,000 on account of the defciency in the number of their vessels. The objection, however, made by the company to the scheme of routes was afterwards admitted, and that scheme was altered, and the penalty was remitted by the Government. The only other fine they had incurred in the nature of a penalty, as far as he could discover, was one in the year 1842, also in connection with a disarrangement of the intercolonial service of the company. Upon that occasion they were compelled to pay £2,715 for the assistance the Government had rendered them in carrying the mails between the West India Colonies. Their own vessels not being ready upon the appointed day the Government sent a ship of war, or one of the Consuls hired a vessel, and in consequence of that service a sum of £2,715 was abated from the amount to which they were entitled. That was, he believed, a complete statement of the breaches of contract on the part of any of those companies, and of the penalties to which they had been subjected.

INDIAN ARMY—MEDICAL BRANCH.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, If he has any objection to state what arrangements have been made with regard to the position of the Medical Officers of the late East India Company's Army on its amalgamation with the Queen's Forces; whether it is intended that Medical Officers who received an increase of rank by the Warrant of January, 1860, similar to that granted to Officers of the Queen's Army by the Warrant of October, 1858, shall also receive the same increase of pay in proportion as was then granted to Medical Officers in the Royal Army; and are the Senior Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Service to be promoted to the rank of Principal Inspector General, Inspector General of Hospitals, and Deputy Inspectors General of Hospitals, as heretofore, when vacancies occur; or are those appointments in future to be filled by the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Royal Army?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was sorry to say he could give no satisfactory answer to the hon. Gentleman. The whole question of the Medical Staff and Medical Service in India was under the consideration of the Indian Government and the Secretary of State for War, and until some decision was come to it was impossible to give the hon. Gentleman the information required.

FISHING AFFRAY ON THE SCOTTISH COAST.—QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, Whether he has heard that one Fisherman on the coast of Argyllshire has been killed, and another wounded, by shots fired from Her Majesty's Steamer Jackal, or her boats; and whether he will explain to the House by whose authority this was done?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not able to answer the last portion of the question of the hon. Member. He had, however, received a pretty full account of the unfortunate occurrence; but as it would necessarily form the subject of a judicial investigation, it would not, perhaps, be proper for him to enter into a full statement of the details. The accounts of the transaction were rather conflicting. On the one hand, there was the evidence of the boat's crew, and there was that of the revenue officers on the other. It appeared from the statement of the latter that they had gone out for the purpose of seeing whether the men were engaged in illegal fishing, and that they found them in the act of trawling. The officers then landed two marines, and those marines went round until they got within the vicinity of the fishing boat; they called to the fishermen, who continued their occupation. They then fired blank cartridge, and afterwards a shot, intended, as he understood, to be wide of the mark. On the other hand, the fishermen did not admit that they were trawling. They said that they were hailed, and that immediately on being hailed they replied that they were coming on shore, when a shot was fired, and one of their number was killed.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. ADAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, as he has three most important Bills on the Paper for Second Reading to-night, and as neither this House nor the Public has had sufficient time to consider the probable effects of all these Bills, he will not consent to postpone the Civil Service Bill until a later day?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question of his hon. Friend behind referred to only one of the Bills. Now, any alteration to be made in that Bill must be made in Committee. He had an alteration himself to propose in Committee, and he, therefore, hoped there would be no objection to take the second reading of the Bill that night. He did not intend to fix the Committee on the Bill before that day week, which would afford ample time for considering its provisions.

SYRIA—THE GOVERNOR OF THE LEBANON.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to repeat the question which he had addressed to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the other night, Whether it is true that it has been decided at Constantinople by the Representatives of the Powers that the Lebanon shall be placed under a Governor who shall be selected from the Maronite sect; and, whether that Governor is not to be under the orders of the Governor General of Syria, but is to communicate directly with the authorities at Constantinople? He also wished to know whether that decision has received the assent of the Representatives of Her Majesty?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I have to state that the arrangement which has been agreed to is that there shall be a Christian Governor of the Lebanon; but it is not specified in the agreement whether he is to be a native of the Lebanon or not. The Commissioners had agreed, with the assent of all their number, except the French Commissioner, that the Governor should not be a native; but when the question came to be considered by the Representatives of the various Powers at Constantinople it appeared that they had received different instructions from their respective Governments. It was agreed, however, upon the proposition of the Prussian Minister at Constantinople, that a Christian Governor of the Lebanon should be appointed, but, as I have stated, without any specification whether he was to be a native of the Mountains or not, and in that arrangement Her Majesty's Ambassador concurred. As to the other part of the hon. Baronet's question, I believe the Christian Governor will be under the orders of the Pasha of Sidon; but I cannot give a positive answer on that point because Her Majesty's Ambassador has informed me that various details were to be consigned to a Protocol, and I have not yet received any notice of such a document.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN VICTOR EMMA-NUEL AND LOUIS NAPOLEON.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a question of considerable importance in reference to a statement which he had seen in an Italian Paper, and which bore in a particular manner on the present state of Italian affairs. He had just seen a statement to the effect that his Majesty the King of Italy had left Turin and repaired to the town of Tulos, near St. Jean de Maurienne, which was within the French frontier, in consequence of an urgent despatch from Paris, and that it was supposed it was for the purpose of meeting his Majesty the Emperor of the French there. He wished to know if the noble Lord had any knowledge of the matter?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL replied that he had no knowledge of the circumstance.

EAST INDIA LOAN BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought that trustees ought to be allowed to invest trust money in the stock which would be created by this Bill in the same manner that they were allowed to invest in the existing India stock, and gave notice that he would move a clause to that effect.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that that House had been called upon from time to time to vote loans for India, which amounted in the aggregate to an enormous sum, and yet they knew very little at any particular moment of the financial condition of that country. It was quite astonishing to see how mistaken the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had been in the statements he had submitted to the House with reference to the finances of that country. The right hon. Baronet was, no doubt, anxious to state what was the truth, but the facts had completely contradicted his anticipations. On the 6th of February last he told them that, although a loan might be required in the course of the year on account of the Indian railways, none would be necessary for the current service of the Government; and the right hon. Gentleman had, in fact, made what was known as a "prosperity" speech. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) said at the time he thought the right hon. Baronet took too sanguine a view of the financial state of that country, but he was rebuked by the hon. Gentleman, the present Under Secretary for War (Mr. Baring), for his want of confidence in the calculations of the Indian Minister. The fact was, however, that the House was now asked to sanction a loan on account of India to the amount of £4,000,000. That loan would raise the debt of India to more than £100,000,000, upon which an annual interest of £5,000,000 would have to be paid, although the interest on the Indian debt in 1857, only four years ago, was only £2,500,000. On the 3rd of June the right hon. Gentleman said that he anticipated that in the year 1860-1 there would be a reduction of expenditure. A few days after there came a lengthy statement from Mr. Laing which showed that the expenditure of that year, instead of diminishing, would be increased by about a quarter of a million. The financial condition of India seemed to him to be totally unintelligible. Mr. Laing had certainly made a very able statement upon the subject, just as his predecessor, Mr. Wilson, had done a short time previously. They were at present aware, however, that there was not much ground for their trusting to the calculations of the latter distinguished and lamented gentleman. The scheme of Mr. Wilson had since fallen to the ground; and, although Sir Charles Trevelyan had told the truth in a rather awkward way, it was clear that he was entirely right and that Mr. Wilson was entirely wrong. It was now generally admitted that the only remedy for the unfortunate state of the finances of India was to be found in a reduction of military expenditure. They were all very much at sea with respect to the real condition of the evil with which they had to deal. They were intermingling the expenses of the Indian Government with the outlay upon gigantic railway works; while, in his opinion, the two subjects should be kept entirely distinct, or nothing but danger and confusion would ensue. He confessed it appeared to him that Mr. Laing, in his recent calculations, had taken too favourable a view of the finances of India, and he doubted very much whether it would be possible to realize in the coming year that Gentleman's anticipated surplus. We raised the enormous revenue of £41,000,000, and Mr. Laing attempted to show that this would leave a surplus over expenditure; but the hon. Gentleman's own figures showed this to be very doubtful. Mr.

Sir Henry Willoughby

Laing proposed to effect a reduction of expenditure by abolishing the navy of India. But the result of such a measure would be to transfer an expenditure of £600,000 or £700,000 from the revenue of India to that of this country. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) believed that there were many items of expenditure which Mr. Laing had overlooked—such, for instance, as the loss on the exchanges, which might be estimated at £500,000 a year. Nothing could be more amusing than to read the affectionate exhortations addressed by the right hon. Gentleman to the Government of India, urging them to reduce their expenditure, and the replies of that Government, humbly suggesting that he should reduce the home charges. But the truth was that the House had no means of controlling the expenditure of India. No doubt, the home charges, especially as regarded the military expenditure, were most extravagant, and in asking for this loan the right hon. Baronet ought to show the necessity for those charges. Was it true that, although the men in the depôts had been reduced by one-half, yet that the officers who were paid out of the Indian revenue had been maintained at their full strength; and had not stores been sent from this country to India which were not required there and had not been asked for? It was the duty of the House to call upon the Government to look strictly into these matters. The debt of India had increased from £59,500,000 in 1857 to £103,000,000, and the only chance for that country was the reduction of the army. Yet those reductions could not be carried out without danger. He understood that 200 regiments of the Native army were about to be reduced. [Sir CHARLES WOOD signified that this statement was not correct.] He believed that 100 battalions were to be reduced instantly. He thought that sudden changes of that kind in India, where affairs were in a delicate, if not critical, state, were much to be deprecated. He doubted the wisdom also of imposing new and dangerous taxes upon the people, and, above all, he was certain that they were acting with great impolicy by adding to the existing dead weight of India, which at this very moment was not less than from £15,000,000 to £16,000,000. It was, therefore, with very great reluctance that he saw this proposition for an Indian loan brought forward, particularly after the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that the year 1860 would see the end of these loans. With respect to the accounts, he could not too strongly condemn the mode which had been adopted, of mixing up railway accounts with the general revenue of the country.

COLONEL SYKES said, that unless the Secretary of State for India was assisted by means of a loan he would not be able to fulfil his engagements in this country, and the public service would be, in consequence, greatly damaged. The estimates sent from India were not trustworthy, and the explanations not easy to be understood. First they were told that no less than £6,678,097 would be required to balance the income and expenditure in 1860-1; and now, coming close upon the heels of the former estimates came one from Mr. Laing, in which he stated that he actually anticipated a balance of income over expenditure of £239,896 in 1861-2. That excess of income could, however, only be obtained by making a very formidable and dangerous reduction in the Native army. He did not know whether it was resolved to reduce as many regiments as had been stated, but he believed the proposal was to dismiss 64,000 men. Surely the Indian Government would not be guilty of such rashness and impolicy as to dismiss all those men who had been trained to arms at once? The saving, therefore, could only be prospective, for if they proceeded to disband this large number of men at once the result would be to cover the country with bands of brigands. If, in addition to reviewing the Indian expenditure, his right hon. Friend would turn his attention to the expenditure at home, he would find a wide field for curtailment. The troops in the depôts far exceeded the number required, and the amount of stores sent out to India was so great as to be actually embarrassing to the authorities there. At the same time he was sensible how inexpedient it would be to embarrass the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, though with very great reluctance, he should vote for the loan.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that in reference to the remark of the hon. Member (Sir Henry Willoughby) that the Indian Government had embarked in "gigantic railway schemes," he wished to remind the House that every one of the railways waiting for completion had been contracted for by the old Court of Directors, and certainly no contract of the kind of any importance had been entered into since the time of the mutiny; the Government, therefore, were merely carrying out engagements into which they had long entered. If the railways were not completed, the Government would sustain immense loss in paying guaranteed dividends upon the money raised, and, therefore, it was far better for them to advance the money required to complete them with as little delay as possible. Practically, no difference would be made to the money market, for no greater amount would be levied by the Secretary of State than the companies themselves would raise were they in a position to do so. He utterly denied that the statements of accounts were obscure. Having read with great attention the speech of Mr. Laing to the Legislative Council, and the various official returns and accounts submitted to the House, he must say that he had never seen financial statements conveying a clearer perception of the matters to which they referred, the railway accounts being kept wholly separate from the general accounts of the Government of India. It was true that occasional mistakes were found to have been made in the estimates of expenditure; but when such difficulty was experienced in attaining a clear view of the public income and expenditure of this country, as appeared from a Return recently laid on the table of the House, it was not to be wondered at that discrepancies were sometimes observable in the statements of Indian revenue. For himself he did not feel the slightest apprehension for the future of India, either in respect to finance or any other matters, and he believed that the Government of that country were fully prepared to take every measure for the curtailment of the expenditure with judgment and discretion.

MR. AYRTON said, in times past he had joined in pressing on the Government the necessity of embarking in the construction of Indian railways, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Indian Government had some reason to complain that rival schemes should now for the first time be pointed out as desirable or advantageous. For his own part, he did not think the objections well founded. It was suggested the other night that the water communications might be so improved as to render railways unnecessary; but this idea was opposed to the experience of practical men for the last ten or fifteen years, and to the considerations which had repeatedly been urged upon the Government. In connection with the construction of railways in India, they had seen enough to show them that there must be ground for stating that it was not easy to improve the water communication, and that great results in the way of such improvement could not be effected for the small sums which some persons considered to be sufficient for that purpose. His own idea was that the Government could not have adopted a better course than promoting the lines of railway they had sanctioned. It was not enough for the right hon. Gentleman to come and ask for power to raise money to contribute to the railway companies, unless he gave those companies practical support and protection in the prosecution of their great enterprises, and unless he gave guarantees that he was willing to carry out the engagements of the Government with perfect good faith. For instance, he understood that the Government were now offering land to the companies, in very inconvenient situations, provided they would pay for it; whereas the original understanding was that the Government would grant the land to the companies free of cost, wherever they wished for it. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would see that it was very shortsighted policy on the part of the Government to attempt to gain any small advantage over the railway companies, or to deviate in the smallest degree from any engagements, however onerous, which they had undertaken, with a view of inducing private persons to invest their money in those railways. If he held out the prospect of fresh guarantees, and brought new competitors into the market, great difficulties would be experienced in raising the money necessary for the completion of the present undertakings. As the right hon. Gentleman had sent into the market a number of companies, all with guarantees, and all competing with each other for capital, there was no other course open to him than that of obtaining the loan which he now proposed to raise. It should be remembered that the money thus raised would not be unproductive; it was not analogous to loans raised to make good deficiencies of Indian revenue, but would pay interest, which would be derived from the industry which the railways themselves would develop.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the first question raised was that of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield). He (Sir Charles Wood) was the last person to object to the introduction of such a provision in its proper place as the hon. Member proposed, but he did not think it would be proper that the clause suggested should be introduced into the Bill before the House. In 1859 a Bill was introduced to amend the law of property and to relieve trustees, one of the clauses of which empowered trustees to invest trust-money not only in the Securities in this kingdom, but in certain other Securities, amongst which was included the Stock of the East India Company. A question was raised in the Courts of law, whether that clause enabled trustees to invest money in the loans raised in this country by the Government of India. The decision of a Court of law was, that trust-money could not be so invested in India Stock of that description, it could only be invested in the Stock of the East India Company. Now, anxious as he was to improve the India Stock, he thought that to introduce into this Bill a clause conferring that power would be very unfair; but he should be very glad to see such a power given by any Bill relating to the power of trustees to invest trust property. It was exceedingly inconvenient to mix up with this Loan Bill the general question of the finances of India. He had stated before, and he now repeated it, that he was not at present in a position to bring forward the question relating to the general finances of India. All he could say on that point was that, whether there was a surplus or a deficiency, he was alike under the necessity of asking for this loan. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) said he had given too favourable an account of Indian finance in his speech in the House in February last. To show that he had not done so, he begged to read the following statement from Mr. Laing, with reference to the deficit of 1860-1. Mr. Laing in his recent speech said:—"The position, therefore, we are left in by the Budget of 1860-1 is simply this—a deficit of £6,000,000, less £500,000 increased revenue; remaining deficit, £5,500,000." What was the statement which, in February last, he (Sir Charles Wood) made to the House, and transmitted to India? On the 2nd of February he wrote to the Government of India in these words—"The annual deficit that will have to be dealt with at the close of 1860-1 may be assumed to be £5,500,000." He did not think he had taken too favourable a view of the revenue, when it turned out to be identical with that which Mr. Laing stated it to be at the end of the year. At the same time he must admit that there were certain discrepancies in Mr. Laing's statement, which, without an explanation not yet received, it was impossible to reconcile with the accounts on the table of the House, and he should only refer to one of them. Mr. Laing stated that so far from there being a diminution of expenditure in 1860-1, as compared with 1859-60, there was a positive increase of upwards of £200,000 in 1860-1. But there were on the table of the House the official accounts, signed by the Members of Council, and the figures showed that the nett expenditure amounted in 1859-60 to £43,997,000 and in 1860-1 to £38,362,000, showing an actual reduction in the gross expenditure amounting to £5,635,000. He begged to say that upon the whole he was inclined to place more confidence in the official document, sent with the authority of every Member of the Council of India, than in the statement of the hon. Gentleman made in the reported speech. It appeared that there was a balance of £1,000,000 more in the Indian Exchequer than had been anticipated, and he had a general confidence in the improved state of the Indian finances. What the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) said was perfectly true. But he (Sir Charles Wood) would again repeat whilst with regard to the income and expenditure of India it was easy to keep the railway expenditure distinct, with regard to Ways and Means it was impossible to separate it. In this country we depended on the railway receipts for payment; the railway expenditure in India depended on the public treasuries; so that it was impossible to keep this expenditure apart from the account of Ways and Means. Then he had been asked why he was obliged to have recourse to this fresh loan? It was not for the purpose of keeping a balance between income and expenditure, but because he (Sir Charles Wood) was not in possession of funds at home to make the payments that must be made. He had in the home Treasury £2,000,000 more last year than he had this; and he had sent £1,000,000 to meet the possible demands on account of the famine and of the railroads—so that he had £3,000,000 less at his banker's this year than he had last. With the exception of the demands for railways, he did not expect to have to borrow a single sixpence, in order to defray the expenditure of India.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. VANSITTART said, that this was a most important Bill—so important that it might be regarded as the pivot upon which the future good government of India turned. In considering this question it appeared to him that the first step to be taken was to decide the principle on which it was proposed to govern India:—In other words, was it proposed to govern her from home, by adapting to Indian feelings and habits the system which prevailed in England; or was it proposed to leave the responsibility of taking the initiative in all matters which affected India to her local Governors and Legislative Councils? If the House decided for the former course he maintained that the sooner the present Calcutta Legislative Council was shut up the better, and all central legislative authority should be vested in the Governor General and his Supreme or Executive Council, subject to the control of the Secretary of State for India and his Home Council. If, on the other hand, they decided to adopt the latter course, an Act should be passed to enlarge the numbers and powers of the existing Calcutta Legislative Council, and to extend similar Councils to Madras and Bombay. In the latter case the Supreme or Executive Councils at the different Presidency towns, together with a large proportion of the Home Council, might be advantageously and economically abolished. Now that India had been fully incorporated with the rest of Her Majesty's dominions he could not understand the object of saddling her revenues with the expense caused by the maintenance of three separate and distinct Councils. As far as he could learn from the explanatory statement of the right hon. Baronet in introducing the Bill it appeared that it would have the effect of multiplying these Councils very considerably, of which there were already too many, and of re-establishing the old system of scattering local boards of administration or local councils over the country. Shortly after Lord Ellenborough arrived in India he turned his powerful mind to the consideration of this very question, and, knowing by experience how cumbersome and expensive they were, he substituted responsible Secretaries in their place, and abolished the boards of revenue, salt, opium, stamps, and several others. In 1849, on the annexation of the Punjab, a board of administration was formed for the Government of that province. It consisted of Sir John, then Mr., Lawrence; Sir Robert, then Mr., Montgomery; and Mr. Mansell. Lord Dalhousie, however, very soon found that it would not answer, and he accordingly abolished it, and appointed Sir John Lawrence as Chief Commissioner of that province. Independently of these defects there were several others in this Bill. The local Councils to be assembled at the pleasure of the Governor General in different parts of the country were to possess such limited powers that they would be merely itinerant vestries. It was proposed also to curtail the powers of the Central Legislative Council to such an extent that it would present a more pitiable appearance than it had done since it was first created in 1853 by the right hon. Baronet. He did not, however, quite understand what was to be the nature and constitution of these Councils. He feared, therefore, that this Bill had been hastily and crudely considered. He was the more disposed to think so because, on perusing the correspondence on the subject which the right hon. Baronet had placed on the table, the three separate despatches written by the Governor General, dated the 9th of December, 1859; the 15th of January, 1861; and the 23rd of January, 1861, differed very materially from each other as to the constitution of these Councils. It was, moreover, much to be regretted that the right hon. Baronet had allowed three-fourths of the Session to pass before he introduced this Bill, and Bills Nos. 2 and 3, which also stood for a second reading this evening, so as to render it impossible to send them up to the other branch of the Legislature in sufficient time to be properly discussed this Session. Looking to the breathless haste with which these Indian Bills were being pushed through the House—the great mass of business to be got through during the remaining six weeks of the Session, such as Appropriation of Seats Bill, the Election Law Amendment Bill, the Highways Bill, the Galway Contract, Church Rates, Artistic Copyright, County Surveyors, and several other Bills; and, considering lastly, that the Committee of Supply was almost untouched, he thought it would be more prudent to withdraw these three Indian Bills until next Session. If a Motion were made to that effect he should be prepared to give it his cordial support.

MR. W. E. FORSTER desired that the Secretary of State for India should inform the House whether the proceedings of the principal Council at Calcutta were to be made public or not. It had been hitherto in the power of the Governor General to make regulations for the Legislative Council, and such regulations were made by Lord Dalhousie, and the deliberations of the Council were conducted much in the same manner as the deliberations of the House of Commons. By the 19th section of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman it was provided that the Governor General should have the same power as hitherto, and he would, therefore, be able to make regulations for the new Council. But he was exceedingly anxious to know—he did not want defined in actual terms—what sort of regulations would be made? It appeared from his introductory speech, that the right hon. Baronet seemed to expect the regulations would be very different, and to desire that that should be the case; and he found also, upon reference to the despatches, that Lord Canning disapproved of the manner in which the proceedings of the Council had been hitherto conducted. What he wanted to know was whether the Council were to sit in secret or public session, and whether the reports of their deliberations were to be made from day to day, or at the end of the discussion of any particular measure, or not until the end of the session? The only information they had obtained upon this point was conveyed by the despatch of Lord Canning, dated the 15th of January of this year, in which, after alluding to the disadvantages which were felt in the mode of publicity hitherto allowed, he went on to say—

“For these reasons I recommend that in the Legislative Councils of the North-Western Provinces of the Punjab, as well as in that of the Governor General, the business should be conducted as in a committee or commission, and not in the form of a set Parliamentary debate, and the proceedings should be reported under the control of the Governor General.”

This insured that the proceedings should be reported; but it did not insure that they should be reported from day to day. That was a matter of principle, involving the important question whether public opinion in India was to influence the discussion of laws while they were in process of being made. He was glad it was intended that there should be not only non-official European Members of the Council, but that Natives were also to some extent to be admitted, so as to feel the way to giving them a share in the government; but he felt that if there were no means of informing the public of the proceedings of the Council, so that public opinion might be brought to bear upon them, the advantage of admitting non-official and Native Members would be very much diminished. In addition to this we had a very large number of Europeans in India, and we desired to increase the number; but in this there was the difficulty of inducing free and independent Englishmen to live under a despotic rule, and that difficulty would only be increased if the action of public opinion upon the Council were taken away. There were one or two cases to which he wished to allude, in which the advantages of the publication of the proceedings of the Council, and even of the speeches of the Members from day to day, were felt throughout India. When Mr. Wilson proposed his income tax, the measure, when it was first mentioned, was felt as one of great hardship by the English residents; but upon his explanation of the necessity of the measure, and of the equality with which it was to be levied, the objections subsided, and it was received without any objection or any feeling of dissatisfaction throughout India. The Times, indeed, remarked upon the wonderful phenomenon of a community which almost liked to be taxed. Mr. Wilson also proposed a tax upon tobacco, which it was thought would not affect the English residents; but, by reason of its being known that the measure was in contemplation, the public press took up the matter, it was carefully examined into, and it was found out what a disastrous effect it would have throughout the country; and Mr. Wilson, seeing how much more important a matter it was than he had at first supposed, and seeing how great its effect would be upon the Natives, reduced the tax from about 3s. a pound to 6d., and afterwards abandoned it altogether. The publication of the proceedings in this case probably prevented a passive resistance to the tax throughout India. Another reason why he could not help thinking that it would be absolutely necessary to take care that the proceedings should be published from day to day was that it was permitted to the Governors of the different Presidencies to make regulations for their own Councils, subject to the sanction of the Governor General, and he had no doubt the Governor General intended that the proceedings of the local Councils should be conducted as at present. He could not help thinking that if they had the local Councils confined by the arrangements of this Bill to a very subordinate position to the General Council, while they had the strength and prestige which would be given by having their deliberations placed before the public, there would be a elashing of power which would make the whole machine very difficult to work. He was very sorry that the local Councils were to be debarred from entertaining questions with regard to the land tax. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: That is a misprint.] He was glad to hear that it was so. We were all looking to India for the supply of cotton, of which we were deprived by what was going on in America, and he believed that that which, as much as the want of railway communication, operated almost as a preventive to the growth and supply of cotton, was the exceedingly onerous and oppressive nature of the land tax.

Sir CHARLES WOOD was understood to explain the precise nature of the misprint to which the hon. Gentleman had referred; but his remarks were inaudible in the gallery.

Mr. LAYARD said, he did not think any assembly had ever been called upon to discuss three measures of such enormous importance as the three relating to India which they were now to discuss at so late a period of the Session. They were measures not only of great importance in themselves, but they involved principles which might hereafter affect our rule in India to an extent which few there present would imagine. He did not rise with any desire of opposing the Bills; on the contrary, he willingly admitted that the Secretary of State for India had shown a desire to deal in a large and fair way with this exceedingly difficult question of the Government of India, and had made changes which deserved the approbation of all who took any interest in Indian affairs. He (Mr. Layard) viewed the Bill before the House with much favour, although he was not perhaps prepared to go the whole length of supporting all its provisions. In two respects it would improve the state of things in India. In the first place, it would make the Government by Councils more effective than it had been ; and secondly, it would give an opening for the employment of Natives in a position in which he much wished to see them employed. He thought no one could doubt that the Legislative Council established some years ago had been a failure. That Council was neither a consultative Council, nor a representative Council nor a Legislative Council. The Governor General did not consult that assembly, or if he did consult it, and received advice, he did not consider himself bound to act upon it. Very recently there had been an instance of that. When a Motion for papers was made in the Legislative Council, and carried by a majority, the decision of that majority was treated, he might say, with contempt. No notice whatever was taken of it. The Council was not simply a Legislative Council because it had debates somewhat after the fashion of that House, and had orders and regulations not unlike those of the House of Commons. It was not a representative assembly because it represented nobody except a few officials—it did not represent the Natives, nor that portion of independent Englishmen established in India who were engaged in various matters connected with commerce and agriculture. With regard to knowledge of the wants of the country the Council was also deficient. It was true the two Presidencies of Madras and Bombay had representatives there ; but there was only one for each of the Presidencies, and there was an overwhelming majority against them ; and not only that, but those Members could not represent the views of the Presidency which sent them. Recently, in the case of the income tax, the representative of Madras was prevented from making those representations in Council which Sir Charles Trevelyan charged him with, and the reason why Sir Charles Trevelyan took the course he did was because it was impossible that the objections which he took in the most forcible manner to the scheme could be urged in the Legislative Council. Now, he was of opinion that the introduction of such Councils as were proposed by the Bill would have a very great effect in India. First of all, it would enable local Councils to deal with matters with which they were locally acquainted. Every Gentleman knew that the population of India was made up of many different races with the greatest variety of

creeds, and with different manners and customs ; so that the Bengal civil servant, who might know Bengal, might be perfectly ignorant of every other part, and what was good legislation for Bengal might be very bad for the other Presidencies. Could any one doubt that if the income tax had been discussed in the local Councils of the several Presidencies it would have passed ? Certainly not. In Madras everything that Sir Charles Trevelyan prophesied had come to pass. There was no one acquainted with India but thought the imposition of the income tax was a great mistake, and that sooner or later it would have to be abrogated. There was another thing in which he thought the Bill would prove advantageous, and that was that it would give the two Presidencies, and ultimately the North-West Provinces and the Punjab, an interest in self-government. And, thirdly, he considered the institution of Legislative Councils as a great step to the division of that great country into distinct governments. He did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester in thinking that the time for that had come—but it might yet come. Besides, those Councils would relieve the Governor General from much of those business details which he had now to go through, and which rendered it almost impossible for him to get through the public business entrusted to his charge. As for the representation of the Natives, he did not think that the Bill went far enough, and he should, therefore, be prepared to take the sense of the House when in Committee on an Amendment that one half of the “additional Members” should be Natives. He thought it of the utmost importance that Natives should be admitted to these Councils. Hitherto the Natives had no representation whatever, either in India or even in this country—there was scarcely a Member of that House who raised his voice in their name, while the independent Englishmen established in India, of whom the House had heard a great deal, and who were said not to be represented, made noise enough, had the whole press in their favour, and were enabled by their money and influence to command attention to their claims. What he wanted to see was the Natives represented in fair proportion to the independent English settlers in India. It was said that the Natives would not speak in the Councils at all, but would always defer to the opinions of European members. He was inclined to doubt this; but at least, if they were admitted now, in the next generation they might be expected to say a few words, and in the third they would, perhaps, speak as much as Europeans. They could not be expected at once to take part in business which had been the heirloom of the Anglo-Saxon race; but they might be educated to take part, and he thought they would feel proud to take part, in the proceedings of these Councils. He agreed with Lord Canning that most important and valuable advice might be obtained from the Natives of India, and he ventured to say that during the short journey he had made in India the most important and most interesting information he obtained was from Natives. He found that they took the broadest views of Indian affairs—not the European view, but the Native view—which it was of the greatest importance that the Government of India should understand. He was sorry to see the tendency in England to treat India as a colony, like Australia, and not as a dependency. There was the greatest difference between the two. India was a dependency, but Australia and Canada were colonies. In the latter the Government might dispose of the lands, and plant settlers; but they could not do so in India. In India they had a country thickly populated, every inch of soil belonged to some one, and an ancient civilization, not perhaps of a very high kind, but still a civilization, and the remains of a people who had done great things. Nobody who had been in India but must have been struck by the magnitude of the works which had been executed there, and which showed that the resources of India were at one time developed to an extent to which they were not devolved at the present day. It was all very well for gentlemen of Manchester to say that the Natives were lazy, and that Englishmen must be sent there to make them work. They could not make a lazy people work. But he denied that the Natives were lazy. Let them look at the troops, and he would venture to say that no troops ever exceeded them in what they had gone through. He had heard that they would march even thirty-five or forty miles a day without a halt, and they had done so during the late mutiny. But the question was not the idleness of the Natives, but simply a question of return for their labour. In the indigo districts the planters had endeavoured to make it appear that the ryots had resisted the cultivation of indigo, and were opposed to the introduction of English capital; but he believed there never was a statement more opposed to the truth. Let them be paid and a return for their labour given them, and they would cultivate indigo, cotton, or anything else. But in the petitions from Manchester the Natives were altogether ignored, as if those creatures did not exist at all. He was not opposed to the introduction of English capital; on the contrary, he thought it would be the best means of binding the two countries together. All that might be effected by wise and judicious legislation, and if the Legislative Councils performed their duty, and if the Native element were properly represented in them, there would be a much safer and sounder state of affairs in India. As to publicity there was nothing about it in the Bill. He thought it right that there should be publicity, but he agreed with the Governor General that in that case it would be necessary that the people should not be misled as to what was passing in the Councils. The people of India had prejudices of their own, and those prejudices ought to be respected. A mere mistake, a mere misunderstanding led, perhaps, to that dreadful mutiny which ended in the destruction of so many of our fellow creatures. Lord Canning stated that authorized reports might go forth, and he (Mr. Layard) thought that if there was to be publicity there should be a competent person to see that proper reports were published. The press was now almost as influential an organ in India as it was in England; many papers were circulated throughout India of which they knew nothing; but all those papers would report what passed in the Legislative Councils, and it would not be easy to say the enormous amount of mischief that might be done by any misstatement of the proceedings. He thought the powers of the Legislative Councils too much restricted, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider in Committee whether more latitude might not be given to them. Questions regarding the finance of India, its revenue, its debt, might with advantage be discussed by those Councils. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for what he proposed to do. He believed he was pursuing the proper policy for the Government of India; and he believed that that policy, if consistently carried out, would tend to reconcile India to this country.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that so far as he had an opportunity of considering the provisions of this Bill, he was disposed to regard it as a step in the right direction. He thought the right hon. Gentleman, in emancipating the Councils of Madras and Bombay from that state of thralldom in which they were placed by the Legislative Act of 1833, had done good service to India. But he considered that if the Government of that country was to be carried on with vigour the power must be concentrated in a Governor General, and to retain that power he must necessarily maintain a large control, especially in finance matters, over the other Presidencies. He thought the introduction of a non-official element into the Legislative Council of Calcutta was a desirable one. And if they admitted Englishmen who were unconnected with the Government into that Council, they ought on principles of justice to allow the Natives to have seats there also for the protection of their interests. But he could not concur with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard) in his desire to see so large a portion of the Government consist of Natives, because he (Sir Edward Colebooke) thought it would be absurd to give them an equal share; the best security they could have for the Government of that country was to give a large and preponderating share in the Council to those who were connected with the Executive Government of the country. He entertained very great misgivings with regard to those parts of the Bill which concerned other provinces under the Government of Calcutta. He could not see why the Legislative Council of Calcutta should not make laws for the province of Bengal, or what possible advantage could arise from having one Legislative Council sitting in Calcutta to legislate generally for India, and another Legislative Council sitting in the same Presidency, of which Calcutta was the chief town, to legislate for Bengal. With regard to the North-West Provinces of India, he did not think the time had arrived when they ought to venture upon introducing a Legislative Council into that part of the country. If, however, that experiment were to be tried at all, it was one that ought to be carried out by an Act of the Imperial Legislature.

COLONEL SYKES said, he saw no reason for supposing that the Natives would be mere ciphers if admitted to the Council. They held public meetings and made very intelligent speeches, and took much interest in public affairs, and it was plain from their petitions to the House that they did not overlook their own rights. He was surprised to find that there was no mention of Natives in the Bill, and if the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) had not given notice of an Amendment for their introduction into the Councils, he (Colonel Sykes) would himself have done so. He thought that too many restrictions were placed on the operation of the Council; but on the whole he believed that the tendency of the Bill would be to do good. It was the restoration of the traditional system of the down-trodden East India Company, whose local Councils at the different presidencies before the Legislative Council of India passed rules and regulations for local purposes, but which for the future would be called acts instead of rules and regulations.

MR. BUXTON hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India would inform the House whether it was intended that the proceedings of the Councils would be published from day to day or not? Experience had shown the immense value to India of having the mind of the people of that country brought to bear upon legislation while the process was going on, instead of at a subsequent time when it had become the law of the land. He thought a little too much had been made of certain remarks made elsewhere upon the restrictions to which Members of the Council would be subjected in regard to finance matters; but it must be remembered that in this country they were under still greater restrictions. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India on having at last proposed the introduction of the Native element into the Legislative Councils. Those who had their attention turned to what was passing in India could not have failed to perceive how very intelligent the Native population was becoming, the interest taken by them in the affairs of their country, and he had heard Sir John Lawrence himself say that he and his brother had derived most important assistance from many of the Natives. He thought the policy of the right hon. Gentleman inaugurated a new era in the Government of India. That policy went on the basis of not treating the Natives as a conquered race, but as cooperators in the Government of that great empire.

MR. KINNAIRD congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the favourable manner with which the proposed changes had been received by the House, though the time allowed for their consideration had been very short. He felt convinced, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had not attempted to force the measure on unduly, but that he had seized the first opportunity of proposing it. He trusted that the Bill would not be hurried through Committee. The provision that the seat in the Council should be held for one year only was, he thought, inexpedient, also that the initiative power given to the Councils was a power they ought not to have. He would, however, reserve his objections to certain details of the measure for the Committee; and would merely say now that he thought the measure was one for which the right hon. Gentleman deserved the thanks of the country.

MR. AYRTON said, this Bill reminded him of a man who made a machine with so many complicated wheels and cranks in it, that when he wanted to put it in motion it would not move at all. He (Mr. Ayrton) was one of those who held that, as long as we intended to keep India, the power of governing must remain, as it had hitherto been, solely and exclusively in the hands of British subjects going out from this country. He believed it not to be possible to keep India if we shared the powers of Government with the Natives. At the same time, however, that we retained all the power in our own hands, we were bound to exercise it with wisdom, with moderation, and with forbearance. Through all time all the nations of Asia had been subject to despotic power; but that power had been exercised with an intelligence and forbearance to which the English Governors of India had been strangers. However despotic the Native Princes of India might have been, they made no laws without consulting in their durbars such of their subjects as could give expression to the general feeling of the community. No such precautions had been adopted by the Governors-General of India in the presumptuous ignorance and arrogance with which they had exercised their authority. It was this disregard of the feelings of the people which led to the mutiny. Nothing could have been more scandalous than the annexation of Oude and the seizure of Nagpore, and nothing could have been more calamitous than the passing of laws by the Legislative Council which were contrary to the religious feeling of the people. The question now was whether the power of governing India should be shared with the Natives? He believed that that was an impracticable project. We must maintain our rule. All that was required was that we should give guarantees that our power should be exercised with due regard to the feelings of the people. The only guarantee required was that the British authority should not make laws without consulting the people of the country. That could not be done by taking two Natives from a commercial town and making them members of the Legislative Council. The constitution provided by this Bill was better adapted to the government of a joint stock company than of a great empire like India, which could not be governed by Councils "consisting of not less than six or more than twelve Members." He could understand a proposition that the Governor of a province should send for a certain number of influential Native chiefs who might be supposed to represent their people, and that, upon commercial questions, he should invite the principal Native merchants to give their opinions; but, having ascertained their views, the responsibility of carrying them out clearly rested on the British authorities in India; and to set up an irresponsible Council of six, elected by nobody and speaking merely their own opinions, who had undertaken no duties except to play at legislation, was merely shifting one of the most important duties belonging to the office of Governor, which ought to be discharged by him under the controlling authority of the Home Government. Passing from the local to the general Councils, he believed the right hon. Gentleman had embarrassed himself by this double system of legislation. Instead of having one legislative body at Bombay and another at Calcutta, the boundaries of whose authority it would be impossible accurately to define, a much wiser course would have been to give complete power of legislation to the local Councils, under the sanction and ratification of the Governor General, by which means complete uniformity would have been attained. He further thought it unnecessary that the Governor General should have a legislative Council, but the local Councils he regarded as of the highest political importance. We were about to create in the most gratuitous manner a signal danger to our rule by familiarizing the whole of the Native population with the idea that there was but a single Government in the country. We had obtained our dominion in India owing to the fact that it was composed, not of a single race capable of harmonious action, but of the different races having no feelings or sympathies in common. We had conquered India and built up our empire in detail; we had succeeded whether at Bombay, at Calcutta, or at Madras, because we were always acting with an intelligent mind against a divided people, or some subordinate Government which had separated itself from the original empire of India. Why should we not continue to avail ourselves of the same circumstances to maintain our rule in India? Why were we to teach the Natives what they had failed in discovering for themselves—that they would one day be a great nation? How could we hope that in time to come 40,000 or 50,000 Englishmen would maintain their rule over an united population of 200,000,000? Discontent, if it should break out in one province under a separate system of Government, would be speedily quelled by the assistance which could be rendered from other parts of India. But in the eyes of those intrusted with the conduct of Indian affairs the importance of maintaining separate Governments seemed altogether secondary to the details of the machinery by which that Government was to be carried out. They had given themselves up to the political pedantry of administration, forgetting those great principles of policy by which empires were raised and dynasties built up, and the neglect of which led with equal certainty to ruin and destruction. The time had come to use the language of warning, and he implored the right hon. Gentleman to strike out of his Bill many of its more complicated parts, so as to render it more consonant with the simplicity of Asiatic ideas. The object of the Bill ought to be simply to put an end to the Council which had done so much mischief, and to leave to the Executive Government authority to take such measures as it might deem necessary. Attempts at precise legislation upon minute details could only produce confusion, and would surely be injurious in its results.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE trusted that what had fallen from the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) on this Bill would not be accepted as the feeling of the House. At this period of the Session they found four Bills brought forward in one night, each of which ought to be the subject of considerable debate and deliberation. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India might not have had time to proceed with them in the early part of the Session, but they ought to have been in the possession of the House, and the feelings of the Council for India in respect to these Bills ought, likewise, to have been made known. He believed it would have been sound policy on the part of the Government to regulate the finances of India so as to make the income balance the expenditure, before establishing a body which, if it should prove anything more than a debating society, would lead to a great deal of additional expense. A few years ago the expenditure for Ceylon was £70,000 or £80,000 a year; but the effect of a Legislative Council had been to raise that expenditure to £350,000 a year, though the island was not larger than some of the collectorates of India. He feared that a similar result would follow from this measure. He should have recommended Her Majesty's Government, instead of bringing in four Bills this year, to bring in a measure which would have reduced our army in India in a gradual and systematic manner, which would have provided a substitute for our Indian navy—which he believed was to be entirely done away with—and which would have made our Indian income something like balance our expenditure in that country. How the duties hitherto performed by the Indian navy were in future to be discharged was a matter which the House knew nothing about; but what appeared to be probable was that this country would be called on for men and ships to do duty along a seaboard of 2,500 or 3,000 miles.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, it was probably not from any want of will that the right hon. Gentleman had abstained from offering a measure for equalizing the revenue and expenditure, but simply from the impossibility of devising a measure that would have any such effect. Countries whose finances were prosperous were countries well governed, and, therefore, he thought that the best course which the Government could take with a view of equalizing the revenue and the expenditure in India was to bring in Bills such as these. All the measures introduced by the right hon. Gentleman were conducive to the good Government of India, and if they were successful would bring about that fiscal improvement all were desirous to see. By giving the people a voice in their own affairs, by improving the administration of justice, and by admitting the Natives to a share in the Government of their country, we should lay the foundation for a more prosperous state of finance than had yet been seen in India. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets thought that the Bill did not give the local Councils power enough. He would have legislation carried on by them subject only to the veto of the Governor General. But no single man could undertake to consider and give a veto on all the Bills passed by those Councils. The Governor General must have some one to assist him in that duty; and if so, was it not better that he should have the assistance which the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give him, and surely it was better that this Council should be composed, not of irresponsible persons, but of persons whose conduct was open to public observation? There were certain measures which must be undertaken by the local Councils, and others which it would be very inconvenient to have treated in a different manner in different places. The hon. and learned Member would not wish to see conflicting Customs' regulations or different coinage in different parts of India. At the same time there were local matters which could be treated with advantage by local Councils. If we could have but one country, so much the better; and in Europe we were endeavouring to get rid of geographical differences. He desired to rule India, not by keeping the Natives in ignorance, which in these days of the free press and of public inquiry was impossible—but by elevating them and making them feel that it was their interest that our rule should continue. Our security in India was not that the Natives could not turn us out, but that they would not—no people on the face of the earth would drive out a good Government. He believed that the people cared very little for the Government that was over them if it only governed them well. He would encourage in the Natives the wish for our civilization, and he had long advocated their admission to posts higher than those which they had hitherto held; but he would not give them too great a voice at first. He would be for a more gradual proceeding. He approved the small representation, inadequate though it was, which was to be conferred upon the people of India. He rejoiced to see that non-official Europeans were also to form part of the Council. He should be glad to see the independent European population of India greatly increase, and it was no small benefit which the railways conferred upon the country that they really did lead to the extension of the class in question. He should give the main features of the Bill his cordial support.

SIR CHARLES WOOD expressed his gratification at the manner in which these Bills had been received from all sides of the House; and the only duty he had then to discharge was to answer the few questions which had been put to him. His hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. Forster) had asked him to what extent publicity of the debates of the Legislative Council was to be allowed. Now, that was one of those details which he (Sir Charles Wood) thought had better be left to the discretion of the Governor General. He agreed in the opinion of Lord Canning that publicity ought to be the general rule; but that mischief might arise from precipitate and inaccurate publicity. His hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) had said that he had himself derived the greatest advantage from his communications with the Natives. Upon that point Lord Canning was entirely of the same opinion as his hon. Friend; and it was on that very account that powers were taken in the Bill for the purpose of enabling the Governor General to avail himself of the services of Natives in reference to the various questions which he might have to consider. The limitation of the time for which a seat was to be held was to enable the Governor General to obtain the assistance of Native chiefs, who could hardly be expected to attend for two, much less for three years. It had been said in the course of that discussion that their great object ought to be to obliterate the distinctions between the conquerors and the conquered in India. Now, that was precisely the policy which he (Sir Charles Wood) wished to carry into effect. Those Bills distinctly provided that the Natives should be employed in the Legislative Councils as well as in the highest judicial courts, and in the most important executive offices. The same spirit ran through the whole of them—the spirit which animated that policy which Lord Canning had been most successfully carrying out, and which, he believed, with his hon. Friend, would afford the best security for the permanence of our rule, for it would make the highest class of Natives, as well as those of low degree, feel that their own good was bound up in the continuance of our sway. He believed that was the best mode of consolidating and perpetuating our dominion in that country. He might observe, however, that he had not thought it at all desirable to name the Natives expressly in the measure. He held the perfect equality before the law of all Her Majesty's subjects, without distinction of race, birth, or religion, and he would not do anything which could lead to the supposition that he doubted for a moment the existence of that principle. He had never admitted that there was any distinction between any of the subjects of the Queen, whatever might be their differences of birth, or race, or religion. That was the spirit of the Proclamation of Her Majesty on the occasion of Her assuming the direct government of India; and that was the principle which would continue to actuate him in all his administrative measures.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES WOOD moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD asked, what inducements were intended to be held out to barristers and other members of the legal profession, English or Native, to practise in these courts?

MR. VINCENT SCULLY concurred in thinking that three more important Bills than those now before the House were never introduced, and yet nobody appeared to take any interest in these debates except those who profited by the plunder of India. He knew his opinion was unpopular, but it was not necessarily the less true. If we wished to retain our power there we must not admit the Natives to the Government. Our going to India at all was a mistake and an injustice; we were in India contrary to the law of nature, which was inimical to the spread of our race in that country; though he did not say that, having possession of that empire, we should now surrender it; but it behoved us to be careful to whom we intrusted the reins there. Our rule in India was jealously watched by one of the greatest States in Europe. The Emperor of the French was steadily preparing his advances upon us; he had possession of Suez, the neck, as it was called, of British power in the East, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government, knowing the danger that threatened, steadfastly resisted the cutting of a canal through that isthmus. Napoleon III. had also possession of the best bay on that coast; he was master of a great portion of Africa; he now held Syria, and he had also an armed force in Cochin China. These were alarming facts, and ought to be borne in mind in legislating for India. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) might spare himself his alarm as to the permissive power to admit Natives into the Indian Cabinet. That was a power no more likely to be exercised than the power under the Act of 1829 to admit Roman Catholics into the English Cabinet, which had never since been acted upon. In The Times newspaper the right hon. Baronet was represented to have said that the Bill had been submitted to the Judges of the Supreme Courts of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, and was highly approved by them. He was also reported to have said that the Judges of the Mofussil, who were to be made co-ordinate with those of the Supreme Courts, had not the slightest legal training.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was out of order.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he was only quoting remarks which had been imputed to the right hon. Baronet by The Times.

MR. SPEAKER said, that was just the irregularity to which he had called the hon. Member's attention.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had not stated that the right hon. Baronet had used those words, because the right hon. Baronet had assured him that he had never done so.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY only referred to this matter as a very good proof of the utility of his intended Motion on the expediency of having authorized reports of their debates. It appeared from a letter entitled Observations and Suggestions on the proposed amalgamation of the courts, written by the Chief Justice of Bombay, Sir Matthew Sausse, one of the most eminent Judges in India, that "the administration of justice in the Mofussil was the most unpopular of British institutions in India"—that "the administration of justice in the Presidency towns was very popular, notwithstanding the expense of litigation in the Supreme Courts." The reason for this difference was that "the Judges in the latter were trained in the principles of law and evidence and in their practical application," while in the Mofussil or "country courts, owing to the deficiency of legal education, the Judges had no fixed principles of law and evidence to guide them, and decisions varied with the person or the feelings of the Judge." The letter said that the remedy proposed was "to unite the popular with the unpopular and the professionally inefficient with the efficient elements into one court," and the writer added his opinion that "the hopes and good intentions of the framers of this measure would be grievously disappointed." What would be thought if it were proposed to take a perfectly untrained gentleman from the Court of Quarter Sessions in this country and put him to sit beside the Judges of the land to decide upon the questions submitted to the superior courts? The main proposition of this Bill was to mix up the learned with unlearned gentlemen, for what object he could not understand, except to admit some of the Native element, with the expectation that the civil servants who were Judges of the Sudder Court would be able to give some information to the Judges of the Supreme Court. The principle of the Bill might be right, and he should not vote against the second reading, but he hoped that before the Bill reached another stage they would receive some information on which they could intelligently act.

SIR HARRY VERNEY protested against the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Scully) that none took an interest in Indian questions but those who had profited by India or expected to profit by it. There were many Gentlemen in that House who honestly endeavoured to legislate for the benefit of India, though they never had any connection personally with it, or had derived any profit from it. He regretted that the House had not been furnished with all the information they ought to possess on this subject; they ought to have had before them the opinion of the Council of India. He had voted against the Members of the Indian Council being excluded from Parliament, as they could have given much information on Indian subjects; they were the men who knew more about India than any other class; and yet the House was debarred from an acquaintance with their opinions on this most important question. He hoped the House would insist on the production of the opinions of the Council. He protested against any information being concealed from them on such a subject.

Mr. DUNLOP was understood to support the Bill.

Mr. TORRENS said, there were some parts of the Bill which could, he thought, be advantageously amended. For instance the covenanted servants of ten years' standing were put upon a par with barristers of five years' standing. The hon. Member (Mr. Scully) had spoken of the learned and the unlearned sitting together in the same court, the learned being barristers of five years' standing, and the unlearned, members of the Covenanted Civil Service of not less than ten years' standing, who had served as Zillah Judges. But he should be inclined to regard the latter experienced persons as the learned, and the inexperienced barrister as the unlearned member of the Court. The standing of the Judges of the proposed Court well deserved the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

It was hardly fair or considerate to the Covenanted Civil Service to legislate for the possible association of a barrister of five years standing, on the same bench with the covenanted civil servant of twenty-two or twenty-three years standing, which is, he (Mr. Torrens) believed, the shortest period of service at which a covenanted servant has ever attained the honour of a seat on the bench of the existing Sudder Court in Bengal.

COLONEL SYKES held it to be impolitic to put barristers of five years' standing, who might be about thirty years of age, on the same bench with covenanted servants who might have had from twenty to thirty years' experience. A population of not less than 150,000,000 required the administration of justice according to the Mahomedan and Hindoo codes, and by Judges who understood their languages—qualifications not likely to be possessed by barristers of five years' standing. Hitherto the Mofussil courts had been presided over by Native Judges and had given the greatest satisfaction; but it seemed they were to be superseded by new local courts, presided over by an European barrister, at an expense to the Indian Government of five to ten times the cost of Native Judges. People spoke of these proposed small cause courts as being new to India; but the fact was they existed in India long before the county courts were known in England, and they had worked so satisfactorily, that the Native Judges had decided on an average, from ninety-seven to ninety-eight cases in every hundred civil suits, with comparatively few appeals from their decision.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), that who should practice before the Courts in India was settled by the Courts themselves. The Sudder Court decided who should practise before it, and under what regulations; so did the Supreme Court; and in like manner the High Court would decide for itself who should practise before it, whether barristers, advocates, or solicitors. In reply to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) what he (Sir Charles Wood) had said was this — that a draft of a Bill had been sent out to the Judges of the Supreme Court of Bengal. Their suggestions had been received and considered, and the greater number of them had been adopted. With respect to the Judges at Madras, the expression of their opinion was in favour of amalgamation. He certainly had received some suggestions from one of the Judges of the Supreme Court at Bombay in a letter, which, no doubt, had been correctly cited by the hon. Member, but which not being a public document he (Sir Charles Wood) did not feel justified in laying it upon the table of the House. The hon. Gentleman then said that the Bill had been introduced without due information. But in the Report of the Committee of 1851-2, and the labours of the Law Commission, which reported the same year, abundant materials would be found. The hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) had charged him (Sir Charles Wood) with acting in this matter without taking the opinion of the Indian Council. He thought the hon. Baronet ought to have ascertained whether the fact was so or not before he made this charge. The truth was that the matter had been repeatedly discussed in the Council; many of the suggestions thrown out had been adopted; but no recorded statement of opinion had been made either for or against the measure, as all were perfectly agreed as to what its main provisions should be. With regard to the objection taken by the hon. Member opposite

Colonel Sykes

(Mr. Torrens), he had only to say that in fixing a five years' standing at the English Bar and ten years' standing for a civil servant as a qualification for a Judge, he had merely repeated the existing qualification for Supreme Court and for the Sudder Courts according to the existing law. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had recommended him to bring in another additional Bill; but he (Sir Charles Wood) had been already blamed for introducing so many Indian measures so late in the Session, and he scarcely thought the House would approve of another.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday next.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

MR. VANSITTART said, that although it appeared that the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had made common cause with the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India in reference to the passing of this Bill, which sapped and would ultimately destroy a service in which some of the best years of his life had been passed, he hoped the House would permit him to offer a few observations. The right hon. Baronet, in introducing his Bill, observed that its objects were to legalize certain appointments which for fifty years and more had been made in India, and to provide that appointments might be made in certain cases, notwithstanding the provisions of the existing law. With regard to the first of these allegations, it seemed to him that the legality of the appointments referred to had been fully recognized by successive Acts of Parliament passed in 1813, 1833, 1853, and 1858. It was rather remarkable that, though the technical illegality of the appointments had long been known, it was never deemed necessary to legalize them by a special Act of Parliament until it was thought expedient to use such an Act as a sort of shoeing-horn to draw on a clause in order to injure the Covenanted Civil Service. As regarded the necessity of throwing open that service, that had already been done by s. 32, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106. By that Act, this exclusive Service, as it was the fashion to call it, had been thrown open to free and unreserved competition. So open was it in this respect that it was competent for any young man to present himself at the India House in January or July of any year, and, provided he were of the prescribed age, he could claim to be examined. In consequence of that Act parents had been put to great expense in the education of their sons for that Service; because such was the severity of the examination that it not only exceeded that for any office or department of the Civil Service of this country, but instances had occurred and were occurring of the health of a young man being so seriously impaired by the cramming to which he had been subjected preparatory to his going before the Examination Commissioners that after a short sojourn in India he had been ordered home on medical certificate and compelled subsequently to relinquish the Service. Now, the system which prevailed in England was the very reverse of that. All nominations merely for permission to compete for the Civil Service appointments rested entirely with the Government of the day, and it would be regarded as a breach of Parliamentary decorum were a Member sitting on the Opposition side of the House to submit an application in behalf of a young man, however high his attainments might be, for the purpose of his being permitted to compete along with other candidates. In England, therefore, a parent was forced to submit to the humiliating necessity of interceding with an avowed supporter of the Government of the day for leave for his son to be examined to prove his fitness to enter the public service of his native land. This Bill actually sought for powers to do away with that test of merit, and to substitute in its place Parliamentary influence, nepotism, and jobbing of the very worst description, breaking faith at the same time with those who had gone out to India under the competitive system. Among other plausible reasons for this proceeding it was said that it was impossible to procure a sufficient number of civilians to fill the appointments consequent upon increase and additions made to our Indian territories. It was, no doubt, true that the list of candidates diminished every year, and that fact had been confirmed by the Sixth Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, which had been laid on the table within the last few days. But what was the reason? Why, the high standard of the examinations and the abstraction of the great prizes from that profession. Reduce that standard and preserve the prizes and they would get any number of young men. The standard might be advantageously reduced without impairing the competitive principle, and without substituting for that principle the wholesale jobbing which was sought to be established by this Bill. If we required proof of what would be the results of the working of this Bill, it was only necessary to refer to the correspondence of Lord Cornwallis, recently published, and to the last speech which Lord Macaulay made in that House. He was in a position to state that within a few weeks of his much-lamented death, Lord Macaulay mentioned to a Member of the Indian Council that he still retained his opinion, and expressed his willingness to record it in writing. Lord Macaulay said—

"But my firm opinion is that the day on which the Civil Service of India ceases to be a close service will be the beginning of an age of jobbing—the most monstrous, the most extensive, and the most perilous system of abuse in the distribution of patronage that we have ever witnessed. Every Governor General would in such case carry out with him, or would soon be followed by, a crowd of relatives, nephews, first and second cousins, friends and sons of friends, and political hangers-on; while every steamer arriving from the Red Sea would carry to India some adventurer bearing with him letters from some powerful man in England, all pressing for employment. . . . Now, against evils like this there is but one security, and, I believe, but one, and that is, that the Civil Service be kept close."—[3 Hansard, cxxviii., 747-8.]

Lord Macaulay added—

"That excellent and valuable man, Lord William Bentinck, in the month he left India, said, 'I have now been here seven years, and during that time I have had to dispose of immense lucrative patronage, and I have never but once in all that time been able to do a single service to a single old English friend.'"—[Ibid., 749.]

The Right Hon. Baronet, the Member for Herts (Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton), on the 15th June, 1855, in a speech which he delivered in this House, said—

"Let me again impress upon this House that it is not enough to subject any candidate to a rigorous examination to decoy into the public service the rising energy and talent of the country, unless you set before them all the lawful prizes of the profession, and convince them that not one such prize shall be abstracted from their ambition, and bestowed upon gentlemen who, however able, are not connected with the service. If the public service is to be really a profession, it ought to be as monstrous to give one of the great prizes in that service to a man who has not been actively distinguished in it, as it would be to give a clever lawyer the Colneley of a Regiment, or a gallant officer the Mastership of the Rolls." [Hansard, cxxviii., 2125.]

It should be borne in mind that by the Act the 21st and 22nd of Victoria, "all contracts, liabilities, and engagements upon the East India Company were made equally binding upon the Crown," and that as the present members of the Indian Civil Service, numbering something less than one thousand persons, went out to India with certain rights guaranteed to them, and as they on their part had, agreeably to the terms of their covenant, subscribed a large percentage of their salaries to the two funds, known as the Civil Service Fund and the Civil Service Annuity Fund, they were clearly entitled to compensation. Yet would it be believed that no compensation clauses whatever had been inserted in the Bill? With regard to compensation there were two ways in which it might be granted. It might be granted either by refunding to a member the amount which he had subscribed to these funds with indemnity for past services, or by guaranteeing the Widows and Orphans' Fund, and by granting increased pensions at the expiration of service. Unless some such provision were made the right hon. Baronet might depend upon it that he would experience the same difficulty and create the same feeling of discontent which he had raised among the military officers by his amalgamation measure of last Session. Although the right hon. Baronet hoped to reconcile them to that measure by offering them a miserable pittance of £50 a year and staff employment, he believed that there were some 1,000 or 600 officers totally and entirely without employment. Without following the right hon. Baronet into the whole of his introductory speech, he would merely observe that he laboured under a misapprehension in saying that "there is no such appointment as assistant collector;" on the contrary, there were just as many now as formerly, and on referring to the East India Register for 1860, he found that there were in the Bengal Presidency alone no less than 139 posted assistants, and 23 unposted. He could also produce heaps of witnesses to prove that it was to its very peculiar training—namely, that of commencing as assistant collector, and then gradually rising to be a deputy collector, joint magistrate, full collector, magistrate, and civil and sessions Judge—that the Covenanted Civil Service had gained its high reputation and efficiency. As the right hon. Baronet had quoted Mr. Mills's work on Representative Government he hoped the House would also permit him to quote a brief passage from that work. Mr. Mills said—

"It is in no way unjust that public officers thus selected and trained should be exclusively eligible to offices which require specially Indian knowledge and experience. If any door to higher appointments, without passing through the lower, be opened even for occasional use, there will be such incessant knocking at it by persons of influence, that it will be impossible ever to keep it closed. The only excepted appointment should be the highest one of all. The Viceroy of British India should be a person selected from all Englishmen for his great capacity for government."

He took upon himself to say that this measure would be as unpopular with the Natives of India as with the Civil Service. The Natives already complained that a different class of men were sent out to India now—men who did not appear to possess that traditional sympathy towards them which existed in the days of our Metcalfes, Thomasons, Colvins, Lawrences, Edmonstones, Plowdens, Prinsepe, Yules, and a host of other bright Indian names. He was really very reluctant to detain the House longer than he could possibly help, but he could not sit down without alluding to the very extraordinary manner in which the right hon. Baronet had behaved in regard to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a question which he put to him on the 8th of March last, assured him that the only Bills of importance which he proposed to bring in this Session were those relating to the Council and the amalgamation of the Courts, Nos. 1 and 2 Bills. He then withheld from the House the dissents or protests of his Council against this Bill. It appeared to him that the right hon. Baronet, with the active assistance of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, was determined to destroy that glorious Service by whose untiring energies and cordial co-operation with their gallant military brethren that magnificent empire had been won and governed—a service which had existed pure and unsullied since the year 1765, when it was recast by its beloved chief, Lord Clive, and which had not only on several occasions received the thanks of the Sovereign and both Houses of Parliament, but had been spoken of in highly eulogistic language by successive Governor Generals, from the high-minded Lord Wellesley to the present Lord Canning.

Mr. LIDDELL said, he quite dissented from the opinion expressed by the hon. Member (Mr. Scully) that hon. Gentlemen in that House, unconnected with India,

did not feel a deep interest in Indian subjects. For himself, and for others who were placed in the same circumstances with himself, he must express his fullest sympathy with the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for India, when he expressed his deep sense of the responsibility attaching to the introduction of three of the most extensive measures Indian policy which it had ever been the lot of any man to bring down to the House in one night. An equal amount of responsibility attached to every Member who gave a vote on those three great measures of reform. But their position was different, and in some respects less favourable for arriving at a correct judgment on these matters than that of the right hon. Baronet; for he was surrounded by a Council, composed of men of long Indian experience and of the highest ability, to guide him; while they were deprived by an inconsiderate vote of the presence in that House of Members of that Council. The propriety of the course which he (Mr. Liddell) had suggested when the Government of India was transferred to the Crown was now fully apparent, when they were called upon to decide on measures which changed the governing power of India and established new courts of judicature, and when they were called upon to make a sweeping change in the administrative body, without the benefit of the assistance which such a Council could afford. The point they had to consider was, whether those grave objections which had been urged against the measure were not more than counterbalanced by its advantages. These objections were mainly two: one of them was, that it aimed a blow at the system which had produced such a distinguished body of men as the civil servants of India. He fully admitted that, unless proper safeguards surrounded this measure, it might give a death-blow to the Civil Service of India. And when they spoke of that system, they must not forget that it had been described in this House as one which had grown up under favouritism, nepotism, and jobbery; but a more honourable set of men could not be found than the civil servants connected with the Government of India. That body had, nevertheless, grown up under the old system. A large change had been made in the service in 1853, which had been followed up in 1858, and they had not yet had time to judge whether the new system would produce men equally eminent. The next objection was that this was a breach of faith with the aspiring youth of this country who had been invited to compete for appointments in the Civil Service of India. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that it was in their favour that the old exclusive body was destroyed, and it was but reasonable to expect that some regard would be paid by them to the claims of the State at the present junction. It was for the House, then, to say whether the objections to the change outweighed the advantages of it. A further objection had, indeed, been made—that by the proposed alteration an amount of patronage was placed in the hands of the Secretary of State, which would work to the detriment of the public service. But he did not think the Bill was fairly open to that objection, though he still thought the House ought to have distinctly placed before them the regulations that were proposed, in order that they might be assured that proper restrictions and safeguards, upon the authority of the Secretary of State, were inserted in this Bill. He would now come to the recommendations in favour of their acceptance of this Bill. They had first of all the stern fact before them of the great number of persons who ex necessitate rei had been appointed to fill the vacancies created by the extraordinary emergencies that had arisen. These persons in the Bengal presidency alone had been stated to amount to 800. He believed that at the present moment all these appointments were in strictness illegal, and the object of this Bill was to legalise them. He wished to call attention to a Minute of the Governor General, issued so lately as August of last year, in which he said, speaking of the low ebb to which the Civil Service of Bengal was reduced, that it admitted of no remedy but a great increase in the Civil Service, if the covenanted Service was to be maintained at all. He stated that in the Punjab and Oude, which, being non-regulation provinces, admitted of a larger infusion of the non-covenanted Service than elsewhere—there were in the Punjab, out of 116 assistant and deputy commissioners, 71 uncovenanted, where the proportions ought to have been about equal; that in Oude, out of 36 such appointments, 26 belonged to the uncovenanted Service, there were three vacant, and no covenanted servants were available to fill those vacancies. The remedy which the Governor General suggested was that these places should be thrown open for competition among the junior officers of the army; and Sir Bartle Frere, a high authority, concurred with him. He must remind the House that the great competitive system, from which so much was expected, had proved inadequate to supply the demand. In July last year 80 prizes were competed for, and only 150 persons came forward to compete; so that, for some reason or other, the prizes that were held out in India failed to induce a sufficient choice of qualified candidates to offer themselves. He thought, therefore, that the Government had no choice but to widen the field. He did not argue for a great enlargement: he hoped the powers given by this Bill would be used discreetly, wisely, and sparingly, but he could not but think that great advantages would be derived by the Indian Government from opening up the service, and that it would instil new vigour and honest rivalry into the system itself. What had they lately seen in India? They had sent out some of their ablest financiers to restore the embarrassed finances of India. Were they received with jealousy? Had not their mission been eminently successful? He hoped and believed the same results would follow from the infusion of new blood into other parts of the system of Government. And that led him to the last feature of the measure he wished to notice—the effect which this measure would produce on the Native mind in India. That was a feature so valuable that in his mind it outweighed every objection that might be urged against the Bill. They all knew the effect which the prospect of advancement in life had on all classes of society, from the boy in the village-school to the highest member of the Bar. What was it that cheered the learned Attorney General in the midst of his laborious life but the hope of his one day reaching the Woolsack. They knew that of late the Natives had devoted themselves to European studies; that they were eminently qualified by nature for literary attainments; and they were entering in large numbers upon the study of law and jurisprudence. By the Act of 1853 the hopes of the Natives of India had been raised by the declaration that henceforward no distinction would be made, either of race or religion, in the appointment to the highest posts under the Government. He was at a loss to see how this declaration could be reconciled with the maintenance of a strictly Covenanted Civil Service. Colonel Durand lately used these remarkable words “that the English had struck no root in India, that they existed only on the surface, and their only source of influence was through the military power.” He was glad to find that that able man was himself to benefit by this change of the law, and that though not of the Covenanted Service he was to be appointed to fill the office of Foreign Secretary to the Council of India. He hoped he would inaugurate in his own person this beneficial change of system, which would elevate the Natives not only in office but in their own eyes, and would abolish the distinction of abject submission on the one hand and complete domination on the other between the governors and the governed. He believed that by opening posts of responsibility and emolument to Europeans and Natives alike, we should do more to fix our rule in India upon a firm and substantial basis than by any other measure our Government could devise.

Mr. LAYARD said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) had shown unnecessary alarm when he talked of this Bill sapping and destroying the Civil Service. If there were the least danger that this Bill would have any such effect, he should be the last man to give it his support. There were no greater names in our history than the names of Indian civil servants, nor had the Natives of India ever had better friends. The Service, now that it was an open competitive Service, was in a very different position to the time when it was a close Service. Such being the case, he did not object to the alterations proposed by this Bill, provided that certain words which he thought necessary were inserted in it—for, as it now stood, he feared it would be a most dangerous measure. He had much confidence in the present Secretary for India, and he hoped he should have as much in future Secretaries, but it did not go quite so far as that of his hon. Friend opposite. The opinion of the Council of India had on some occasions been dealt with somewhat lightly; on two important measures—the imposition of the income tax and the amalgamation of the armies—it was well known the almost unanimous opinion of the Council had been overruled. The manner in which the promise regarding the medical service of India had been disregarded was a proof, too, of the value which was to be attached to mere promises. What were the facts? It was announced that the Natives of India were entitled to all places which were open to Europeans, and the medical service was particularly mentioned. But, after several young Natives had come over to this country to educate themselves at a great expense, and had obtained distinction here, they were suddenly told that the Secretary of State had changed his mind, and that since the amalgamation of the armies they could not hope for army medical employment in India. After considerable pressure had been put on the Government they were told that if they liked they might go to Sierra Leone. This was an illustration of how little they could trust in promises, and how necessary it was they should have definite arrangements included in the Bill. Therefore, unless words to the effect that a residence of seven years in India, a knowledge of the Native languages, and, perhaps, in some cases, an examination should be necessary to entitle a man to employment in the Civil Service, he should be very much disposed to oppose the Bill; but, probably, the right hon. Gentleman would be inclined to give way to the almost unanimous opinion of the House. Two classes of persons would be affected by this Bill—the independent Europeans and the Natives. With regard to the European settlers, he should be glad to see men duly qualified holding the positions in India to which they were entitled from knowledge of the country and of the habits and languages of its inhabitants. Such appointments had already been made, and one of the objects of this Bill was to legalize them. The great danger of jobbery would arise from persons going out from this country with strong recommendations from persons in authority at home or with influence with persons in power in India. He had certainly heard lately of one or two remarkable cases in which there had been something very nearly approaching to jobbery. Another object of this Bill was to legalize appointments which might be made, and the want of some such measure was strongly illustrated by a case which had lately occurred. Captain Meadows Taylor had distinguished himself very much in an official capacity in the ceded districts of the Dekkan. By his exertions roads had been made and a variety of improvements had been carried out, and there was no man who was regarded by the Natives of that part of India with greater respect. When those districts were annexed to the Crown the Government refused to appoint him to the government of them because he was not a covenanted servant, and had appointed in his place Captain Cooper, who, as the head of the Enam Commission, was one of the most unpopular men in the West of India. As regarded this class of persons, he thought it essential that they should have that knowledge of the country which could only be acquired by long residence, and he thought seven years was a very reasonable period to require. As regarded the Natives, the question was more difficult. He thought they ought to open Civil Service appointments to Natives the same as to Europeans, but there was the difficulty of the expense of coming over to this country for the purpose of passing an examination. To remedy this he should propose one of two things—either that the Government should send young men over to the colleges here, and pay their expenses to the time of examination, or that there should be a Board of Examination in India, to which young Natives could apply who had prepared themselves to compete for Civil Service appointments. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in the principle on which the Bill was founded. If they gave the Natives an education equal to the education received by Europeans, it was absurd to withhold from them employment in the Civil Service such as their attainments entitled them to. A body of highly educated discontented young men would be more dangerous than an army of mutinous Sepoys; and, therefore, he was happy to see that by this Bill an opportunity would be given them of entering the Civil Service of the Government. But, at the same time, unless such terms as he had mentioned were introduced, he should be unwilling that the measure should pass, because it would open a door that would interfere seriously with good government in India, and might have the effect, as it had been said, of undermining and destroying the Civil Service.

LORD STANLEY said, there were two points on which the House seemed to have come, if not to an unanimous, at least to a very general conclusion—that the principle of the Bill was sound, but that the details would require careful supervision—and that some conditions or restrictions ought to be inserted in it which were not in it now. When the Bill was brought in he stated that he entirely approved the principle of it; but the more he had considered the matter and the more he had been able to gather the opinions of those interested in and informed on Indian affairs the more he was satisfied that those securities which were alluded to the other night, and which he believed it was the intention of his right hon. Friend to insert in Regulations to be framed by him, ought to be in the Bill itself, and not in Regulations, which might be revoked at any time. Of these two securities, by far the most important as a limitation to the admissions into the Civil Service was that a man should have resided seven years in India; and to that he was inclined to hope the right hon. Gentleman would not offer any objection. But as to the other requirement—the test of knowledge of the language—he could well understand the hesitation of the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that cases might occur of appointments in the Presidency towns where no knowledge of Native languages was required. If, however, they were to choose between two possible inconveniences, he thought the possibility of excluding one or two men otherwise qualified would be a far less evil than the absence of the security implied in the language tests. If it were limited, as he thought it might be, to the revenue and judicial branch, and if a proviso were inserted that in the remaining branches of the service the same test of knowledge should be required as was required now of civil servants before appointment to the same offices, he could not conceive that any possible inconvenience would arise. If that condition were insisted upon there would be four distinct checks on any abuse of patronage by the Governor General. There would be the check of residence, the test of language, the confirmation by the Secretary of State, and the further independent confirmation by the Council. He had heard doubts suggested whether the confirmation by the Secretary of State would be anything more than a mere form. It was said that the Secretary of State would be apt to consider that the Governor General was the best judge of the case, and would accordingly be guided by what was determined at Calcutta. In answer to that he would point out that within the last two years, since his right hon. Friend had been in office, two appointments had been made—made he did not doubt, from the best motives, by the Governor General—which his right hon. Friend considered had been improperly made; and, accordingly, those appointments were cancelled. If that were done by the Secretary of State at present, when he was not called upon specially to interfere in the matter, much more was it likely to be done when his confirmation was specially required, and, therefore, when he shared quite as much as the Governor General in the responsibility of the appointments. As to the interference of the Council being a check not to be relied on, he knew no men who were in a position to give a more independent verdict upon a question of the kind than the Members of the Council. They had nothing to hope and nothing to fear. They naturally liked to act in harmony with the Secretary of State; but he had seen enough of them to feel assured that, whatever respect they might feel either for the Governor General or the Secretary of State, if there was reasonable ground to suspect that undue favour had been shown in any appointment which they were called upon to sanction, they would do their duty in refusing their concurrence. As to the possibility of the Council being abolished, whatever might have been the opinion which prevailed two years ago, no one believed in that contingency now. In 1858, when the new arrangements were made, the popular theory was that Parliament would take such an interest in all Indian affairs that the Council would be unnecessary; but any one who had watched the empty state of the House when Indian discussions had taken place within the last two years or eighteen months, could form his own judgment on the soundness of that view. What, then, were the objections to the principle of the Bill? His hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) told his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that this was an attempt to do away with the competitive system, and to return, by an indirect method, to the system of patronage. If he regarded it in that light, he was the last person to consent to have any share in it. But his hon. Friend contented himself with saying that such would be the effect, without attempting to prove it, except as far as to say that if the Bill passed the old abuse of Governors-General taking out their relations and friends and providing for them at the expense of the public would be revived. Now, inasmuch as no Governor General, as a general rule, remained in India seven years, it would be impossible for him to provide for his friends in that manner; for he did not think they would be content to follow him out, and to hold no office, or only a very subordinate office, for seven years, with the chance of some succeeding Governor General taking pity on their forlorn condition. He did not think that any man in his sound senses would be induced to go to India with such prospects.

MR. VANSITTART : The noble Lord has misunderstood me. I quoted the last speech which the late Lord Macaulay made on India in that House, and I quoted it as Lord Macaulay's opinion.

LORD STANLEY said, the opinion might have been that of Lord Macaulay, but the application was his hon. Friend's. He (Lord Stanley) did not know under what circumstances Lord Macaulay's speech was delivered ; but he had no doubt that if Lord Macaulay had had an opportunity of considering this Bill he would have come to a different conclusion as to its effect. No doubt, if the system which prevailed before 1773 had been continued they would be likely to have the old abuses connected with it. His hon. Friend said farther that he believed the Natives would object to the new system, and would look upon it as an interference with them, because men of an inferior class would be appointed to higher offices. Considering that one of the principal objects of the Bill was to admit the Natives to higher offices than they were now allowed to hold, he should be surprised to hear of any objection on their part. He would be a bold man who undertook to say what the opinion of the Natives of India was. No one could answer for the opinion of a community so vast and so heterogeneous. But he had seen numerous Indian newspapers, written in English, but to a great degree owned and influenced by Natives, and he had never seen one which did not, when the question was touched upon, express a strong sympathy with the desire to open the Civil Service to Natives. The question was raised what would be the effect of the Bill upon the Civil Service itself—whether it would not discourage young men of talent from offering themselves for examination ? In considering how far the Bill would affect the Civil Service, they must endeavour to see what amount of competition there would be on the part of outsiders with the civil servants. He thought it had been abundantly shown that under the provisions of the Bill no man would be likely to go out from England with the view of obtaining one of the offices to which it referred. They must, therefore, look only to the case of persons actually resident in India ; and all who had experience of Indian affairs would confirm him when he said that the number of Europeans in India qualified for high office in the Civil Service, and not belonging either to the civil or the military service, was comparatively inconsiderable. There would be a certain number of military officers admitted to offices from which they had hitherto been excluded. There would be a certain number of uncovenanted servants who would obtain the right, to which he thought they were justly entitled, of higher promotion. There would also be a few barristers. He did not think that the appointments of the latter class would be very frequent, because a successful barrister was doing better for himself by remaining in his profession than if he accepted high office, and a barrister who had failed in his profession was not likely to be selected. Besides these, there only remained the Natives, and he thought there would be no inclination on the part of Governors-General or Governors of Presidencies to be unduly precipitate in appointing Natives to high offices. He thought they were all agreed that although it was right Natives should be appointed, it was a great experiment, and one to be tried very cautiously. Looking to all these considerations, he greatly doubted whether the civil servants would be affected by this Bill in anything like the proportion of 5 per cent of all its appointments, and the civil servants themselves were very formidable competitors. They were selected when young men by the best of all possible methods—they were carefully trained for their special duties ; when they arrived in India they were placed in responsible situations, though still young ; their whole life was a preparation for holding higher offices :—and if, with those advantages in their favour, they were not able to hold their own against competitors not having those advantages, all he could say was that they must be very inferior in ability and energy to what he had always believed them to be. As to what would be gained it was not difficult to see. They would enlarge the field of selection for the public service ; they would give a fair encouragement to the Natives and uncovenanted servants, which they had not had hitherto ; they would apply a stimulus to the energies of the civil servants themselves ; and what he regarded as most important of all, they would effectually remove that feeling of jealousy, not altogether reasonable, and which nevertheless existed very strongly on the part of unofficial Europeans, which at present was one of the greatest social evils in India. He believed that the Bill, limited as he proposed, would be a very valuable measure; but he was bound to say that he concurred in the opinion of those hon. Members who recommended that the authority to appoint to offices should be inserted in the Bill, and not left to regulations prepared by the Secretary of State, and that he was quite prepared to take the sense of the House upon the proposal to insert them.

MR. PULLER said, the most important clause in the Bill dealt with two matters—first, power was given to the Secretary of State to make Regulations under which exceptional appointments might be made; and, secondly, the right hon. Gentleman would have power to confirm the appointments made in India. He deemed it of far more importance that the Secretary of State should be guided by his Council when engaged in a legislative capacity in framing Regulations than when he was acting executively in confirming appointments; and he should, therefore, propose that the power of framing Regulations should only be exercised with the assent of the majority of the Council. As to the confirmation of those appointments in India, he should be willing to leave it to the judgment of the Secretary of State alone. The first clause appeared to him to contain the real gist and pith of the measure. He concurred entirely in the preamble of the Bill. As regards the Civil Service in India at present, he presumed that it was not denied that it had been intended in some measure that the Natives should be employed in it; but he thought it would be very inexpedient to break down the practical monopoly of a large class of valuable appointments which the Civil Service of India had long enjoyed unless upon some distinct principle, in order that they might know exactly what to expect in future. He contended that the first clause of the Bill went far beyond the preamble or the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, and did not sufficiently describe the covenanted and uncovenanted services of India. If any post had been held by a non-covenanted servant, the clause authorized the filling up of all similar appointments in the same way, so that it would be almost impossible to say what offices were not equally open to covenanted and non-covenanted servants. He maintained that either the Home Government or the Indian authorities ought to decide what appointments were to be open and what closed. A young man entering the Service had a right to know with certainty what his prospects were. Moreover, there was the interest of the public to be considered, that the Service should be as efficient as possible; and to secure this they should hold out the greatest possible inducements to young men of ability to go out to India.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had no objection to the abstract principle of the Bill, but thought the House ought to be told what was the opinion of the most experienced civil servants in India on the subject. If such information were not furnished they should appoint a Committee to inquire into the matter. The real security for the good government of India was that persons should devote themselves early to the Indian service, and should obtain their appointments under such a system of competition and examination as would prevent abuses. With regard to the appointments of Natives he was ready to give a carte blanche to the Government; but if the right hon. Gentleman wanted really to do the Natives a service he had better increase their present miserable rate of pay, which would probably be a greater boon than that now proposed to be conferred upon them. As to the other branches of the uncovenanted service, including persons of European origin, it was extremely hard to draw the line where uncovenanted service ended and the covenanted began. But the real difficulty arose in respect of those who were not in the public service at all. The Bill proposed to throw open the service of India in the broadest manner, and he thought that, unless restrictions were introduced, such a rule would lead to great abuses. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) said that no person in his senses would go out to India for the chance of obtaining these appointments. He differed from the noble Lord, and believed that if this Bill passed without proper securities numbers of persons would go out to India for the purpose of seeking these appointments. With regard to the Indian Council, the right hon. Gentleman had done his utmost to destroy its independence. If the Members had a seat in the House of Commons their opinions would be known and their arguments heard; but, instead of this, they sat and worked in the dark; so that the Council was practically reduced to a nullity. He asked the House to consider whether, in adopting this Bill, they would not tend to destroy the efficiency of the system of competition which had been introduced into India? It would be a great discouragement to the civil servants of India if they were led to suppose that they would not obtain the great prizes of the service.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have proceeded on the exhaustive principle, by bringing forward on one evening four important measures connected with India. Surely it would have been better to divide them, and to have given a greater opportunity for considering and discussing them. It was not to be wondered, considering the professed objects of this Bill, that it should have excited great alarm among those belonging to the Indian Civil Service. He assumed, with reference to the seven years' residence in India, and the knowledge of languages, to be required of uncovenanted servants, that the right hon. Gentleman would not oppose such a provision; but, besides these restrictions, he thought it would be advisable that they should undergo the same tests to which the present covenanted servants were liable, and should enter into the same agreement against trading and against engaging in other pursuits. In the Bill to provide for the amalgamation of the armies the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), whose name would be gratefully remembered by the officers and men of the Indian army, had procured the repetition of that clause of the Act of 1858, transferring the Government of India to Her Majesty, which guaranteed the rights and privileges of those officers and men, and he hoped that a provision would be introduced into this measure giving to the members of the Civil Service a similar guarantee. The Small Courts Act had recently passed the Legislative Council of India. Would the appointments under that Act come under the first or under the second clause of this Bill? If, under Clause 1, the appointments would not come under the control of the Home Government, nor be subject to the conditions which the right hon. Gentleman agreed should be introduced into the Bill. He would remind the House that the present competitive system for appointments into the Indian Civil Service had only been established in 1858. Every inducement had since been held out to encourage young men to enter into this competition, and, it was only fair and just, not only to the older members of the Civil Service, but to those who had more recently entered it, after passing a severe competitive examination, that such regulations and restrictions should be introduced into this Bill as would give them a guarantee upon which they could rely.

MR. ADAM shared the regret which had been expressed by other hon. Members, that the right hon. Baronet had not produced all the papers which bore upon this question, and which might have enabled the House to come to a better decision. It was more necessary in the case of Indian subjects than of any others that the fullest information should be laid before the House. He thought it was a mistake to prevent the Members of the Councils from holding seats in that House, and he trusted that would be rectified. If this Bill was passed too rapidly through the House, Parliament would find that it was committing an act of short-sighted ingratitude to the Civil Service, which deserved well of the country, and of which the country was proud. The right hon. Gentleman had taken power to frame Regulations which were he said to prevent jobbery or other evils; but as the Bill now stood it contained no safeguards whatever. It contained no guarantee that the persons to be appointed under it would be required to have been resident a certain time in India, to understand the Native languages, or to submit to such an examination as was now undergone by the civil servants; nor was there any security for the funds to which those servants had so largely contributed. It broke faith with the "older civil servants who entered that service under the guarantee of an Act of Parliament, and with the younger who entered it by competition" upon conditions which, if this Bill passed, could not be fulfilled; and it broke faith with the public, who were interested in future competitions, and in the securing of the most efficient administrators for India. The present Secretary of State for India and Governor General might use their patronage fairly and honestly, but their successors might not act upon the same principle, and the House, as responsible for the Government of India, ought not to give the power conferred by this Bill without taking security for its proper exercise. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have these restrictions put into the Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE appealed to the House to adjourn the debate. They had now been employed discussing Indian questions since half past four o'clock. One Bill had passed through Committee and they had given a second reading to two; but this Bill appeared to him wholly inexplicable. There was no provision in the Bill to guard the Civil Service from injury, and he knew that a very large and influential portion of the Council had dissented from its provisions. He should now, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate, in order that the suggestions that had been made might be embodied in the Bill.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman would allow the second reading of the Bill to pass, if only pro forma, as he could in Committee bring forward any of the matters of detail which he wished to be introduced into the Bill. With regard to the principle of the Bill, he did not see that the Secretary of State could have acted otherwise than he had done, seeing that for years successive Secretaries of State had represented the difficulty they had in filling up places in the Civil Service. It could not be expected that the uncovenanted servants would be content with the subordinate position which they had hitherto held, and the House would hardly approve if the Secretary of State were to ask for a large sum of money to increase the covenanted service. Five or six years ago he suggested a somewhat similar arrangement, but the right hon. Gentleman saw objections to it. The difficulty that existed should be met in some way or other, and he could not see that this proposal would injure the Civil Service to the extent anticipated. It was thought that the new appointments would not be few, that the checks would be useless, and that the Secretary for India and the Governor General would join together to job the service; but that was not very likely. The civil servants considered that their vested rights were invaded, and so they were; but the answer to that was, that they could not fill all the places. And what was Government to do? Were they to leave the places unfilled? The system must be altered in some way, because many of the present appointments in India were illegal. There must be some solution of the difficulty, and the simplest and wisest way, and that by which least injury would be done to the Civil Service was that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman; and the noble Lord who had filled the same office before him was of the same opinion. No one supposed the noble Lord to wish to injure the Civil Service, and, in fact, no one who knew the Civil Service of India would wish to do away with it or to injure it. He himself believed that the Civil Service was as necessary to the Government of India as an aristocracy was to monarchy. They had a close service in Austria, in Russia, and in France, but none so close as the service in India, for in no other did the rule prevail that unless one entered as a boy he could not take place in the service. He could not but think that the Civil Service showed too great a distrust of the Government. Checks against abuse were proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He had already agreed to the seven years' test of residence in India; he did not know whether he had agreed to the test of language, but that was a proper test, as a man of fair ability might learn two of the languages in a year; and the only other security that he believed necessary was to give every appointment publicity in the London Gazette, with the reasons for the appointments. They must show that they wished to keep good faith with the members of the Civil Service, who had always been distinguished for their ability, and to whom they owed so much in the good government of the empire; but, at the same time, the public necessities must be met, and he did not believe that a better way of meeting them could be shown than that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HENLEY did not exactly see why the debate should be adjourned, nor why any blame should be thrown upon the Government for having introduced four Bills upon Indian subjects on one evening, especially as the appearance of the House during the discussion showed that Indian subjects did not excite any paramount interest. It had been said that the covenanted servants showed unreasonable distrust of the Government; but it should be borne in mind that those servants could know nothing of the intentions of the Government but what they saw within the four corners of this Bill. They did not know what the right hon. Gentleman's Regulations were to be, nor how far any other Secretary of State for India might alter those Regulations; and men whose interests were at stake were apt to be alarmed when they saw such a state of things. What position would the Bill as it stood put these gentlemen in? Great interest had been taken in the mode of filling up appointments by means of examinations; and he honestly declared that when he read the Bill he wondered what its object was. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman, having got as much brains as was required by means of examination, wanted an element of a different kind to mix with it. No doubt some thought there were certain advantages in admitting persons to the service who had not gone through the ordinary preparation and examination; but it was desirable that the conditions on which they were to be allowed to enter should be defined. There was, however, no reason why the number of servants should not be increased by means of the crucible of examination. Was it, then, anything but reasonable that the civil servants should wish to know the terms upon which other persons would be allowed to enter the service?—and for his part he thought it but reasonable that the conditions should be inserted in the Bill. He himself had great faith in the present Secretary of State for India; but then he might die to-morrow, and no one knew whether his successor would be as scrupulous—and this was his reason why the conditions should be part of the measure. These Regulations, however, could not be introduced until the second reading was agreed to; but unless such conditions were introduced a fatal blow would be struck at the system of examinations, for no young man would go through the expensive and laborious course necessary for an examination, and run the risk of the climate also, if he was likely to have his prospects destroyed by any interruption which was not well guarded. He hoped, therefore, that the Regulations would be introduced into the Bill, and that ample time would be given for consideration.

MR. CRAWFORD joined in the request that the House would not consent to an adjournment. He thought that the people of India had an interest in this matter as well as the civil servants, and he was prepared to give his assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. There were certain appointments in the Presidencies which his experience told him it would be very desirable that the Government should have the opportunity of filling up by persons who brought to India recent experience from England. At the present moment the appointment of Collector of Customs at Bombay was vacant, and he had reason to believe that the Government of Bombay were in great difficulty to find in the Civil Service, without detriment to other interests, a gentleman sufficiently well qualified to fill that appointment—[“Oh, oh!”]—he meant with regard to his experience of the general trade and commerce of the country. Hon. Gentlemen who cried “Oh!” perhaps did not remember that a large interest would be affected by the manner in which this vacancy should be filled up, and the mercantile community at Bombay had a right to expect at the hands of the Government, that the Government at Bombay should select to this office a gentleman who would do justice to their interests, and he knew that the Government had great difficulty in finding in the Civil Service a gentleman properly qualified for the appointment. Again, there was the appointment of police magistrates, who had to administer the English law as between Europeans, to superintend the police, and to do a variety of other matters, and it was very desirable that any gentleman who might be appointed to fill that office should be possessed of qualifications which it could not be supposed a gentleman in the Civil Service would have. He thought the object which some hon. Gentlemen had in view would be obtained if the restrictions were made to apply to what was ordinarily termed judicial, magisterial, and financial functions of the Government. On the whole he gave his hearty assent to the measure of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought there was no wish in any quarter to appoint persons to lucrative offices over the heads of members of the Civil Service, thus depriving them of the rewards they were fairly entitled to; but if, as the hon. Member who spoke last had stated, there was any difficulty in selecting from the Civil Service gentlemen qualified to fill the offices he had named, something must be at fault in the education or examination of those who entered the service. If mercantile law and practice were necessary to the Indian service they should form part of the examinations. He regretted that the attention given to the affairs of India did not seem greater now than before its Government was transferred to the Crown. The present Bill did not contain more than the preamble of what was intended. The principle of this Bill was not contained within its limits. The important part of it was contained in those Regulations and restrictions which the House had not seen; and unless they were of a satisfactory nature the measure might be injurious in its effects, instead of promoting the prosperity of India. The right course for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India to pursue was pointed out by the Act which abolished the East India Company's government. It would be an evasion of the intention of the House in passing that Act if the Secretary of State, instead of submitting those measures to his Council, referred them to special Committees of that Council, and then came down and said that hon. Members were not entitled to the opinions of those Committees because they were not the opinions of the Council. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Portsmouth he was sure had moved the adjournment, not with any desire to impede the business of the House, but in order that they might not proceed with the Bill without that information which was requisite to enable them to form a sound opinion on the subject.

COLONEL SYKES said, that at a meeting held on the previous day a Court of Proprietors of the East India Company passed a Resolution, expressing its opposition to the clauses in the Bill, which gave the Secretary of State in Council unlimited discretion over certain appointments in the public service in India, to the detriment of the interests of that country, and in breach of good faith with those who had qualified for appointments under existing acts.

MR. TORRENS hoped that the right hon. Baronet would accede to the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), and insert the safeguards to which that noble Lord had alluded; that he would accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Puller), and insert those offices which parties were to hold under the provisions of this Bill; and that he would produce the opinion of the Committee to whom he had referred the measure.

SIR CHARLES WOOD thought that he had consulted the convenience of hon. Members who were anxious to take part in the debate on these measures by putting all the Bills on the paper for one evening. By that course he had insured that they would come before the House on a particular occasion. He, therefore, hoped that the hon. Baronet, the Member for Portsmouth, would not press his Motion for an adjournment. The right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Oxfordshire, and the noble Lord, the Member for King's Lynn, concurred that there was no serious objection to the second reading; and hon. Gentlemen who had Amendments ought to be desirous that the Bill should get into Committee in order that they might propose them. He was not surprised that this Bill should excite great interest among those who felt an anxiety in respect of the Civil Service in India. He did not for a moment believe that the Civil servants would be injured by the Bill. It was only in exceptional cases that posts hitherto held exclusively by covenanted servants would be occupied by other persons when it was required by the public necessities of India. Some hon. Gentlemen had objected to it as a new principle, but, in fact, it had prevailed for the last sixty or seventy years. Officers of the army and gentlemen not in the service of Government had been introduced as necessity required;—and the fact was that at the present moment the covenanted Service could not furnish a sufficient number of men to do the duties which were absolutely necessary. Lord Canning, in a despatch which had been alluded to, proposed that a certain number of officers of the army should undergo a competitive examination in order to meet the exigencies of the public service, but this could not be done as it was contrary to law. At the present time covenanted servants of four years' standing are placed in magisterial and other positions which properly demanded twelve years' standing. It had been said that there was no necessity for this Bill; but the truth was, that men were wanted to fill places in Madras and in Bengal, and competitive examination could not supply them in time from the Covenanted Service. Lord Canning had stated that most strongly, as also had Mr. Ricketts, Mr. Hamilton, and Sir F. Halliday. An hon. Gentleman had expressed a wish that a list of places which might be held by uncovenanted persons should be inserted in the Bill; but that had been found, after full consideration, to be impossible, and the best plan was deemed to be to take exceptional powers to deal with exceptional cases, subject to certain checks to guard against abuse of those powers. A good deal of debate had turned upon the question whether the Regulations should be inserted in the Bill? He could not deny that that was a natural wish, and to the extent of a seven years' limit he should not object to insert it in the Bill. Some difficulties might arise in requiring a seven years' residence for persons placed in different positions at the Presidency towns. The Collector of Customs at Bombay had recently come home, and there was not a single available civil servant to fill his place, which was temporarily occupied by a deputy collector. Something had been said about languages, but he thought that a better qualification than a mere knowledge of languages would be the competency of the person selected to perform the duties of the office. He could not, of course, specify the exact words which he would propose to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen, but he was ready to introduce into the Bill the Regulations, as far as they were capable of being reduced, into a clear and definite form. He hoped that the hon. Baronet would be satisfied with that assurance, and would allow the Bill to be now read a second time, upon the understanding that, before the Committee, endeavours would be made to meet his wishes as far as possible.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would withdraw his Amendment if the hon. Baronet would fix the Committee for that day fortnight.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would name the Committee for that day week.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that in that case he should press the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE :—I rise to mention to the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty a circumstance which has lately come to my knowledge, and which I think is worthy of the noble Duke's attention, inasmuch as it has an important bearing on a considerable branch of our manufactures. In his speech the other evening the other noble Duke stated that a shot from an Armstrong gun had penetrated iron eight inches thick. I have no doubt that in making that statement the noble Duke stated what is the exact truth; but the result of that statement is very grave; because, unless we know what was the quality of the iron that was penetrated, it may lead foreigners into the belief—it may lead the Spaniards, Italians, and other foreigners who might otherwise come to us for iron-plated ships—into the belief that the English manufacturers are not able to forge plates of iron that will resist the effects of artillery. I have been informed that the iron so penetrated consisted of bars of iron welded together endwise; and being so welded together, of course the welding would be more tender than the iron, and would render them liable to be pierced. But I have also been informed that wrought-iron plates of 4½ inches thick have never yet been penetrated by the Armstrong gun. If this be so it is quite necessary that it should be stated, because a misunderstanding on this point is calculated to be highly injurious to the iron manufacturers of this country. I have no doubt the noble Duke is aware of the difference in the iron used in the construction of steam vessels, and of the results of that difference; inasmuch that if two steamers were constructed of the same scantling, the same size, the same dimensions in every respect, yet if one were constructed of rolled-plate iron she would look beautiful, though on the application of force she would crumple up like a piece of paper; while the other, constructed of boiler-plate iron and not looking better to the eye, would be so strong and compact that it would resist anything. Your Lordships will easily infer from this, that if you use the word iron, when you say that shots have penetrated certain plates, you publish to the world a fallacy if you lead them to the belief that there is no difference between one kind and another, while the distinction between them may be as great as that between any two things possibly can be. I mention this matter because I am informed by the manufacturers of iron that it is of great importance to them, and I hope the subject will undergo full discussion.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I am perfectly aware of the great difference there is between different qualities of iron. So impressed have I been with this matter that I communicated on the subject with my noble Friend the Secretary for War; and we appointed last summer—or rather earlier, about eighteen months ago—a Committee of scientific men and of military and naval officers, to examine into the question of the different qualities of iron, and to ascertain which was best fitted to resist artillery; and when I mention that on this Committee were Mr. Fairbairn, of Manchester, Dr. Percy, of the metallurgical department in the Museum of Practical Geology, together with several other eminent persons, it will be apparent to the House that we have not overlooked the importance of the question. We felt that it was one that demanded our most anxious care. Your Lordships will remember that last year a good deal was said about timber not being properly seasoned. There are, no doubt, great difficulties in ascertaining the proper seasoning of timber; but there are still greater difficulties in the way of men not accustomed to scientific research determining the different qualities of iron. With regard to the iron of which I spoke the other night, it is quite true that it was composed of bars of iron—but not welded together; they were fastened together by means of bolts and wedges. That iron the shot broke and passed through; and I believe we should have had the same result with many plates of iron. But I am ready to admit that it has not yet been ascertained whether plates of six inches thick are stronger than those bars of eight, or whether they can be penetrated. We had a particular reason for trying experiments with iron in other forms than plates—namely, that if they could in other respects be made available you can twist bars of iron into any form you wish, while in plate iron it is difficult without interfering with their strength to shape and mould them in conformity with the various curves of the ship. All these experiments have been tried with the greatest care by scientific persons, who have carefully noted down the results of the different experiments. They have also tried experiments with respect to the sloping sides of the ships; they have tried experiments both as to the power of guns on them, and as to the quality of the metal. Yesterday I went down to see those experiments, and to confer with the persons who conducted them; and I must say it appeared to me from inspecting these plates that sloping sides, or iron placed at angle, did not afford any additional advantage against flat-headed bolts. I mention these things, my Lords, because I have been called upon by the noble Earl; but I feel that if you go into these questions at all, you ought to go into them thoroughly. One might ask many questions on these matters—whether a cast or wrought iron projectile was most efficacious—whether flat or round-headed shot ought to be used; but if these questions are to be brought before the House, they ought to be brought in detail, with all the particulars of each experiment, and, I believe, such a course would, in many respects, be inconvenient. I can only assure the noble Earl that I have this subject constantly before me, and that I feel all its importance.

My Lords, I regret that I was not here yesterday, as I observe that the noble Earl made certain remarks on what I said on a former occasion in reference to the statements of Admiral Elliot. Now, my Lords, I have only to say that to my former opinions I fully adhere. I have nothing to retract. I stated that it would prove inconvenient if an officer of rank in our navy, having obtained permission to inspect the French dockyards and arsenals, were to come back to this country, and to take means of having a statement of what he saw there published in the House of Commons. Such a course would stimulate an excitement which it is not desirable should be raised. Your Lordships are aware that on both sides of the water there is a great deal of sensitiveness on this subject. For my own part I have always been careful not to stimulate it, but rather to assuage angry feelings; and I put it to the noble Earl if Admiral Elliot, when he had seen things which he thought required the notice and attention of the country, and thought that I or the Government made light of his information—if he then had written to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and told him what he had seen—what course does he think the Earl of Derby would have taken under such circumstances? I am confident that if he had received such a notice he would immediately have communicated with Lord Palmerston; but he would not have come down to this House and made it public. I can assure the House that the proceeding of Admiral Elliot will create for us considerable inconvenience. We are often applied to by officers from abroad for permission to visit our dockyards and arsenals; but if a few days afterwards we are to see all this published in the French Chambers, and attention called to the dangers with which our preparations menace France, we shall be obliged in our own defence to be more reserved for the future. I think I may appeal to the noble Earl himself on this subject, and ask him whether he thinks that the conduct of Admiral Elliot was either wise or prudent? If he does, we differ entirely on the subject. I will not go further into the question, but I may state that I shall be prepared in a few days to lay on the table the proposed Regulations for the entry of officers of the Naval Reserve, and I shall then make a short statement which will explain to the House the means which the Admiralty propose to take as to the establishment of this Reserve force.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: I quite agree with the noble Duke that it is inconvenient to discuss scientific questions in this House; but when the noble Duke states that iron eight inches thick was pierced with shot from an Armstrong gun—

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I did not say it was an Armstrong gun.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: I do not care—if it was a projectile of any kind, I say the thing is impossible: and if a shot penetrated such a plate at all it must have been at some accidentally weak part. On the other subject to which the noble Duke has referred I am sorry it has been again brought under notice. I have only to say that I was most unwilling to take any part in the discussion beyond vindicating the character of a brother officer, whose character was assailed—and has been assailed again to-night—by the noble Duke in a peculiar manner, as if he had done something that was contrary to good manners or good taste. Now, it appears to me that Admiral Elliot's act was perfectly innocent and natural. He had only on his return to England told his friends what he had seen; and yet for so innocent and natural an act an officer of such rank and reputation as Admiral Elliot was visited with grave censure and reprobation by the head of the naval service. If a Member of Parliament chooses to raise this question in the House of Commons that is entirely his own affair. I can well understand that the noble Duke may think it unwise to do so. What I understand the noble Duke to be sensitive on is the point that his conduct has been impugned by a political adversary, who has shown the condition of the navy over which he presides as compared with that over which the Emperor of the French presides. I understand that what has raised the noble Duke's anger, and called down this reprobation on Admiral Elliot, is not the course which the Admiral took, but the course taken by a political adversary in the House of Commons—raising the whole question of the comparative state of the two navies. The question that vexes the noble Duke is the publication of the statement that the French will have twenty iron-plated ships of various sizes ready for sea by the end of the present year, while England will only have six or seven. It is, no doubt, a source of serious anxiety that our—adversary I will not call him—but that our rival should be so far ahead of us in this important respect. But whatever may be the annoyance to the noble Duke, that is the act of a political adversary, it is not the act of Admiral Elliot. The question was raised in this House by a noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) who gave his opinion the other night on the state of the French navy. He stated that it was of no use our building any more line-of-battle ships. But what was elicited in the course of the debate? That two French ships, the Solferino and the Magenta, now building, were two-deckers and pierced for 100 guns each. We must, then, be prepared to meet the adversary; and in dealing with this question we must go a little faster. The speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) the other night, was the speech of a statesman, but the speech of a slow statesman. The Government must be more energetic in their operations if they would compete with our neighbour, who will this year be able, it is said, to put to sea with twenty-six iron ships, and take command of the British Channel. The question he was convinced could not safely be blinked, for it was beyond question that iron-plated ships would beat wooden ships under any circumstances. Our ships must now be built of iron; and the best mode of building and fitting such ships was now the only question to be solved.

LORD BROUGHAM: Having been present, which my noble Friend (the Earl of Hardwicke) was not, when my noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Somerset) referred to Admiral Elliot, I can take upon me to state distinctly that there was no charge whatever made against him beyond a want of discretion, and that the gallant Admiral's honour was in no respect whatever impeached. But both to-night and on many other occasions I lament to observe a constant reference to warlike preparations. Of this, whatever grief we may feel, we can on no account complain; while other countries are employed in arming themselves, it is our right, nay, it our duty, to be prepared also, and no one can grudge, however much he may lament, the necessary expense. But I cannot avoid expressing the sorrow which all must feel that a season of profound peace should be one of general warlike preparation, and in no quarter any step taken to lessen the amount of preparation. It is peace with the expenses and burdens of a costly war. Heavy is the responsibility of those who entail this suffering on us all. Deeply are they answerable to their own people, to their neighbours, to the world, for the general necessity of a universal arming, of a peace unattended with its natural blessings. All our pursuits are carried on, our agriculture, our commerce, our manufactures; but we work in arms, and while we labour we are both paying heavily and toiling severely to defend ourselves. It reminds one, as I have once and again taken occasion to remark, of the condition of the peasants in the northern provinces of the Turkish empire, where there is nothing like police, and they go out to plough, and sow, and reap with their loaded muskets strung over their shoulders, to defend themselves in case of an attack while at work. Those who make it necessary for all countries to be armed in the midst of peace are deeply answerable to their subjects, and to the world, for this grievous and unprecedented state of things.

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY said, that the noble Lord who had just spoken had stated that the noble Duke had made no imputation against Admiral Elliot. He was glad to see that the noble Duke assented to that, because he (the Earl of Shrewsbury) was authorized to say that Admiral Elliot, so far from wishing to do anything that might be unpleasant to the French Government felt deeply grateful for the courtesy, attention, and liberality with which he had been treated by the officers of the dockyard. Admiral Elliot did not make the visit in the capacity of Government agent, but as an officer on half-pay, who, travelling in that character, felt desirous of ascertaining the state of the ship-building in a neighbouring country. No one could blame any one for doing that. On the contrary, it was the gallant Admiral's duty to do so. But he went without any authority from the Admiralty; he went in a private capacity, and everything was shown him with the greatest freedom; and the gallant Admiral's opinion was that had French officers been treated in the same way in England, and on their return related to their friends all that they had seen, that we should not have complained. Admiral Elliot and his friends were, in like manner, firmly convinced that in what he had done the gallant officer had only done his duty. He (the Earl of Shrewsbury) regretted that the noble Duke should have called Admiral Elliot's proceeding "not a friendly act." He was sure that he spoke for the whole naval service when he stated that they were all most anxious to be on good terms with the officers of the French navy. He had himself received many courtesies from those gentlemen, and, therefore, should have been wanting in his duty if he did not state what he believed to be the prevalent feeling.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he had not thrown the slightest imputation on Admiral Elliot for looking, or for telling his friends what he had seen. But it was a very different thing when the Admiral authorized an ex-Lord of the Admiralty to make a statement in the House of Commons. The consequence of his conduct might be seen in the proceedings and discussions now going on in the French Chambers. With respect to what the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) had last said, he begged to remind that noble Earl that, in 1859, when he (the Duke of Somerset) came into office, the noble Earl insisted on our line-of-battle being brought up to eighty ships, and there was not a word then about iron vessels. In the same year a joint Committee of the Admiralty and of the Treasury was appointed by the late Government, and that Committee recommended an increase of our wooden line-of-battle ships. It was hardly fair of the noble Earl, having so lately given such advice, now to turn round, cry down wooden ships, and insist upon nothing but iron. And yet the noble Earl now accused the Admiralty of vacillation.

House adjourned at Six o'Clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 14, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Wills of Personality by British Subjects; Public Works (Ireland) Advances and Repayments of Money; Municipal Corporations Act Amendment (No. 2).

3° East India Loan; Annoyance Jurors (Westminster).

THE "GREAT EASTERN."
QUESTION.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the Admiralty have taken up the Great Eastern for the conveyance of troops to Canada; if so, at what rate per man; how many Soldiers are to embark in her; and if their being sent in that ship is with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for War?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, the Great Eastern had been so far taken up that the Government had come to an arrangement with the owners of that vessel that she should carry out a certain number of troops to Quebec. They would consist of seven officers, 220 men, and 110 horses of the Royal Artillery; thirty-nine officers, 868 men, and six horses of the 30th Regiment; thirty-nine officers, 868 men, and six horses of the 60th Regiment; and draughts of various other regiments, consisting of four officers and 101 men, making altogether eighty-nine officers, 2,057 men, and 122 horses, with the usual proportion of women and children. The rates to be paid were for officers, £18; for men, £5 18s. 6d.; and for horses, £20 each; and for stores in excess of the regulated regimental baggage, £2 10s. per ton. These sums would include messing and every other requisite for the officers, victualling for the men, and forage for the horses. All the necessary fittings would be at the expense of the ship, the Government lending bedding for the voyage. He might also state that the arrangement was made with the full concurrence of the Secretary of State for War.

IRISH CONVICT PRISONS.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that he does not intend to immediately fill up the vacancy in the Board of Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, caused by the appointment of Mr. John Lentaigne to be Inspector General of Prisons; and, if so, whether it is his opinion that this course can be adopted without injuriously affecting the working of the system of Convict treatment pursued in Ireland?

MR. CARDWELL said, it was quite true that the Irish Government had expressed their intention not to fill up at present the vacancy in question, and, looking to the diminished number of convicts in the prisons in that country, it was believed that they might make the retrenchment with a due regard to the efficient working of the system.

LICENCES BY BOROUGH JUSTICES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to a late decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in which it was laid down that a Borough having a separate Commission of the Peace, but not having a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, does not come within the meaning of the words "town corporate," in the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 61, s. 1, in consequence of which decision it appears that all licences which have been granted by the justices of boroughs included in that description are rendered invalid; and whether he will introduce a Clause into the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Bill to rectify this defect in the existing Law?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the practice with regard to licences in boroughs not having a Court of Quarter Sessions had been governed by a decision of the Common Pleas, according to which the Borough Magistrates had the power of granting those licences. In consequence of the recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench the construction of the law must now be admitted to be different from what it had heretofore been assumed to be, and, as inconvenience might arise, a remedy was required. He should, therefore, ask the House to discharge the Order of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Bill, which stood on the paper for that night, and ask leave to bring in a Bill under the same title, in which a Clause would be inserted to meet the case.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to extend the accommodation contemplated under the Post Office Savings Banks Act to all parts of the United Kingdom; and whether the Postmaster General is prepared to receive applications from private parties interested in the establishment of Savings Banks in particular localities?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if by all parts of the United Kingdom was meant England, Scotland, and Ireland, undoubtedly the operation of the Act would extend to them. With regard to the particular districts, the principal object of the Postmaster General would be to grant Savings Bank accommodation in the first instance, and by preference, to those districts where it was wanting, where it was desired, and where it did not exist at present in a sufficiently convenient form. The Postmaster General would, first of all, get a sufficient number of districts to make a trial, and he would then be guided by the operation of the experiment in the selected places as to his further movements, but he would look particularly to the agricultural districts, and to the most populous and wealthy of them, as the places to which his attention ought to be directed. As to applications from private parties, it would be very convenient that gentlemen who took an interest in different neighbourhoods in the condition of the labouring class should make known their views and wishes to the Postmaster General, because the general wish entertained in any locality would be a material element with him in coming to a decision as to the particular places, in the first instance, to which he would contemplate extending the Act.

DOVER HARBOUR.—QUESTION.

MR. DEEDES said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If it is his intention, in the Harbours Bill, to adhere to the constitution of the Board now governing Dover Harbour, as provided for in the Bill?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Nicol) having on the part of his constituents, given notice of certain Amendments, with a view of changing the constitution of the Board which managed Dover Harbour, it was therefore the duty of the Board of Trade to consider the Amendments. They were doing so at present. The Harbours Bill was to be proceeded with on Tuesday morning next, and until then it would be the duty of the Board of Trade to give to the proposed Amendments their best consideration.

HIGHWAYS BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Highways Bill had been fixed for the morning sitting on Friday. When the Bill passed the second reading at an early hour in the morning, it was understood that an opportunity should be given of discussing it in Committee. He (Mr. Henley) presumed that the right hon. Gentleman did not recollect this circumstance when he fixed the Committee for a morning sitting, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them an opportunity of having that discussion in an evening sitting.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said: If the right hon. Gentleman altogether objected to a morning sitting he would not insist upon it. It appeared from the communications made to him that that time would be convenient for many hon. Members. If it did not come on on Friday next it should be postponed to some uncertain future day, but he was entirely in the hands of the House, and would take what course was thought proper. If it was thought that a morning sitting would not be the best for the Highways Bill, in that case he would fix the London Corporation Coal Duties Bill for Friday morning.

MR. HENLEY said, he was very much obliged to the right hon. Baronet.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to know, On what day this Bill will be proceeded with, and whether the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department will have any objection to such an alteration in the Clause which provided that the Mayor of a Borough should be the Chairman of the Bench of Magistrates as would confine the operation of the Clause to the case in which a Mayor had had some previous experience as a Magistrate?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Bill would be committed pro forma that evening. It would afterwards be printed with Amendments, and in a subsequent stage it would be competent to the hon.

Gentleman to propose such an Amendment as that which he had just suggested.

THE CASE OF THE "JACKALL."

In reply to Sir ANDREW AGNEW,

LORD CLARENCE PAGET stated that the Jackall was not a revenue cutter but a vessel of war, which was sent down in 1859 with instructions to put herself under the direction of the Board of Fisheries on the west coast of Scotland.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Cabinet, before sanctioning the withdrawal of the subsidy from the Royal Atlantic Mail Company by the Postmaster General, had taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown that that noble Lord had any such power vested in him?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that not having been made aware of the precise terms of the question which the hon. and gallant Gentleman now put to him, he had not had an opportunity of making any inquiry of the Postmaster General on the subject. At the same time he did not think he was likely to be in error when he stated that he was not aware that any reference was necessary in this matter to the Law Officers of the Crown. He did not believe, so far as his knowledge of public business went, that it was usual to refer to the Law Officers of the Crown in matters of contract, either with regard to the performance or as to the cancelling of contracts, unless they appeared to the Executive Government to be attended with some doubt, or to turn upon some point of law with respect to which they were not competent to form an opinion. In the present case he believed his noble Friend the Postmaster General did not consider there was any doubt on the question, and that had been the cause if he did not think it necessary to call in the assistance of a legal adviser.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now go into Committee of Supply.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS BILL.— GLOUCESTER AND WAKEFIELD.

QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether is the intention of Government to proceed with the Appropriation of Seats Bill on Monday, and if so, whether they intend to propose any new Borough Constituencies, or mean to leave it to the House to fill up the vacuum that is created in the Bill by the rejection of the Metropolitan Constituencies? There was also another question which he wished to ask with reference to Gloucester or Wakefield. He some time ago called the attention of the House to its asserting a power which he maintained it did not possess, and stated that, unless they were prepared to bring in a Bill to punish a corrupt constituency or alter its bounds, they had no right to suspend the writ. He wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman were prepared to bring in a Bill for any of those purposes?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, with regard to the last question, that it was not the intention of Government to propose any measure with respect to the boroughs to which the hon. Member had referred. The course which had been taken had been taken deliberately, and so far as the Government were concerned, they intended to withhold the issue of the writ during the present Parliament. With respect to the other question, he had already stated that Government would proceed with the Bill for the appropriation of the four seats on Monday; and the course which they intended to take upon it would be best stated when the House went into Committee on the Bill.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE:—Then I give notice that I shall move on Monday that within seven days Mr. Speaker make out new writs for the City of Gloucester and the Borough of Wakefield.

INDIA—COURTS IN THE MOFUSSIL.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Courts for the adjudication of small causes will be created in the Mofussil in India; and whether the Judges appointed in them will be Barristers or men of legal training, with a sufficient knowledge of the language of the country within their jurisdiction?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the Government of India had determined on the establishment of small courts in the Mofussil, and were preparing to carry that resolution into effect. Barristers would be appointed, in some cases to these Courts, and he had stated his opinion to the Government of India, that it was indispensable that they should possess a knowledge of the language of the district in which they were to be stationed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE GALWAY POSTAL CONTRACT. SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. GREGORY: Before I proceed to the consideration of the Motion of which I have given notice, I wish to assure the House that it is not my intention to make any allusion to those personal matters which have hitherto formed the staple of the discussions on the subject of the Galway contract. I will only remark that it is the custom in private life for any gentleman who has the misfortune to hurt the feelings of another, either through incorrect information or inadvertency, to take the earliest opportunity, after he has found his mistake, of explaining how the error arose, and of expressing regret that it should ever have occurred. I will venture to say that in 99 cases out of 100 such an explanation is accepted in the same candid and friendly spirit in which it is conveyed. I am bound to say that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government has evinced that frank and fair spirit which always characterizes his dealings with this House. As soon as the noble Viscount found out that the Irish Members had neither made a threat nor sought an interview in regard to the Galway contract he stated to the House that he was perfectly satisfied with the explanation which had been given, and that he entirely believed it. I only wish that at the same time the noble Viscount had been authorized on the part of his noble colleague the Foreign Secretary to make a similar avowal. In that case, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would have had the good fortune to have made a very interesting harangue and of having derived very considerable advantage from it, and had he stated that he was mistaken in the insinuations which he threw out, he would never have heard a word more on the subject, at least, from myself. I will make only one other remark on this subject, and it is this—that it ought to be borne in mind that insinuations against any body of Members are not confined to those Members, but affect the status and character of the House at large, both in the eyes of the country and of foreign nations. I have been given to understand that the Committee for which I am about to move is to be conceded, but till we obtain that assurance from an official source on the Treasury bench I trust that hon. Gentlemen who are disposed to support the Motion will not leave the House. The terms of my Motion are for a Committee to inquire into the circumstances which led to the termination by the Postmaster General of the postal contract with the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company. As the Cabinet have adopted what I may call the solidarité of responsibility with the Postmaster General, it may naturally be held that the Committee is going to inquire into an act of the Government; and I cannot help recalling that on a former occasion, when a Committee of this House was moved for to inquire into the conduct of the war, the Motion was resisted on the ground that it involved an inquiry into acts of the Government, and led to the secession of a large and most influential portion of the Cabinet. I hope, however, that hon. Members who are disposed to support my Motion will remain in the House until we receive a confirmation of the report as to the intention of the Government on the present occasion.

It has always been a stereotyped accusation against the Irish Members, that, instead of devoting their energies and abilities to the practical improvement of their country, they have ever been disposed to be led away by different projects of agitation, of which the result must be sterile, and the object impossible. But in the year 1858 that imputation could not be directed against us. At that time a project was set on foot which it was fondly believed would be the precursor of many other enterprises of a similar kind, the project for the establishment of transatlantic communication from an Irish port with America. The national importance which was attached to that undertaking was proved by the number of subscriptions, the extent of country from which they came, and the character of the persons from whom they were received. In every part of Ireland the small farmer, the shopkeeper, and the man who had retired from business contributed to the undertaking, and Mr. Laing himself said, in a speech delivered on the 9th of August, 1860, that upon the contract being entered into, 1,750

Irishmen were induced, under the circumstances, to become shareholders and subscribe money to the undertaking, believing it to be for the interest of the country. At no time, not even during the memorable tour of the Marquess of Normanby in the year 1835, was there more satisfaction evinced through Ireland than there was when the subsidy was granted by the Earl of Derby's Government. All Irishmen felt that at last they had got something more than words. They hoped that a new policy was about to be inaugurated, and that this was one of those measures of improvement which had been promised by William IV., in answer to a joint address of both Houses of Parliament, moved as an Amendment to Mr. O'Connell's Motion for the repeal of the Union. They knew that they had hitherto contributed their share to the general taxation, and thought that it was fair that some of it should return to them. Nor was that only the opinion of Ireland, it was equally the opinion of the people of England, because memorials in favour of this communication were addressed to the Treasury emanating from chambers of commerce and signed by some of the most eminent commercial firms in the country. There were, however, two quarters from which opposition arose—Liverpool and Glasgow. In the year 1851 similar uneasiness prevailed, but the Report of Earl Granville and a speech made by him in the same year reassured the people of Liverpool, and their apprehensions were for a time laid at rest. Earl Granville, in a speech which he made on board the Atlantic in the autumn of 1851, confirmed the feeling which then prevailed, and seems now very generally to prevail in Liverpool, that the monopoly of the communication with America is a prescriptive right of that port, and one which ought not to be disturbed. That theory the people of Liverpool have very lustily maintained, because, when in 1858 this project was revived, the whole tone of the articles in the Liverpool newspapers was very much to the effect that Ireland ought not to be led away by these visionary and foolish schemes, but ought to content herself with growing potatoes and other agricultural produce, and to leave the conveyance of goods and emigrants to America to the Liverpool merchants. When, however, this company was fairly started in 1858; when they saw that its vessels were carrying as many passengers as they could possibly accommodate; when the crimps and lodging-house-keepers of the town of Liverpool found that these unfortunate emigrants were escaping from their grasp; when people found that goods were coming in, not only from Belfast but from other parts of Ireland to a greater extent than these vessels could carry; when they saw that the service was continued throughout that tremendous winter, the press of Liverpool ceased their satirical remarks upon the names of these vessels, upon their ill-described tonnage, and upon the discrepancies between the time tables and the performances of the ships, and one general cry arose as to the atrocity of the Government sanctioning two subsidies. From Scotland, too, came the same cry, led off by the hon. Gentlemen the Members for Greenock and Montrose. It was felt that a good thing had been going, and that Ireland had got hold of it, and that thereby a great indignity and injustice had been inflicted upon Liverpool and the Scotch companies. In the year 1859, immediately after the granting of the subsidy, Parliament was dissolved, and shortly after it reassembled, in consequence of complaints which were made as to the nature of contracts, and with reference to this particular one, a Committee of Inquiry was appointed, and certain proceedings came to light inculcating certain persons; but neither the noblemen and gentlemen who conducted this undertaking, nor the Government which gave the subsidy, were inculpated by the evidence which was given before that Committee. Before that Committee the late Government was put upon its trial. It was accused of political jobbery, and assertions were made that this contract had been given for the sole purpose of influencing Irish Members and constituencies. I am not going to enter into that question. My noble Friend (Lord Naas) so entirely disposed of it the other day, by showing that the contract was considered, entertained, and determined upon long before there was any question of a dissolution, that I need not say another word on the subject. I believe most firmly that the Earl of Derby's Government were influenced by considerations which did them the greatest credit. I believe that instead of intending to govern Ireland by a mere system of conciliating this man and catching that one and putting him into a place, they intended to inaugurate a general policy which should have for its object the benefit not of individuals but of the whole country. They felt, as we feel, that while we contribute to the general finances of the country we have hitherto obtained very little in return. They felt that large sums of money are annually lavished, and not merely lavished but thrown away, upon English purposes, such as Alderney; that while large grants have been recommended for making harbours of refuge in England hardly anything has been recommended for Ireland, and that while contracts to the amount of £900,000 are sanctioned for English ports, no contract for an Irish port has been approved. The best witness I can produce upon this part of the question is Mr. Laing, who, with regard to the justice of the claim put forward on the part of Ireland, says,

"If there were to be any subsidies for the conveyance of mails across the Atlantic at all, Ireland, which contributed one third of the whole postage, and which from its geographical position afforded the nearest and therefore the speediest point of departure, might justly demand to have its claims considered.—[3 Hansard, clx. 999.]

This sentence is, in my opinion, quite sufficient to exculpate the Government of the Earl of Derby. In the Report of the Commission of Earl Granville, to which I have already referred, several statements are made to show the disadvantage of having an Irish port of departure, which experience has proved to be directly contrary to the facts. It is stated that the gain of time would be inconsiderable—only ten hours upon a passage of eleven days. It was shown before the Committee on Contracts last year that the gain to passengers would be actually twenty-four hours; that, as regards letters, upon the whole communication there would be a saving of several days, and in telegraphic communication a saving of nearly one-half of the time now occupied. It was said that merchandise would not go from an Irish port. That is not the fact, because more merchandise has been sent from Belfast alone than could at one time be carried by the Galway steamers. It was also alleged that passengers would find the frequent transfer objectionable. When speaking of passengers let me refer to the Report of Lord Canning in 1853, in which contracts were considered with reference to the convenience of passengers, as well as of the postal service. It was said that the frequent transfer would be inconvenient; but it was proved to the Committee that the Galway steamers carried in twelve months as many passengers as Cunard's did in fifty. In order that the House may have some notion of the passenger traffic by the Galway line, I may state that from January, 1859, to May, 1861, 13,254 passengers were conveyed out, and 3,955 brought home by the vessels of that company. Those passengers, by going from their own country, not only escaped the trouble and inconvenience of the transfer at Liverpool, but they avoided the robbery and the spoliation to which persons are constantly exposed at that port. I am also able to declare that the Irish girls going to America by these steamers escaped the debauchery and contamination to which they would have been exposed in emigrant ships, which I regret to say have been instrumental in stocking the streets of New York with unfortunate girls seduced, degraded, and then abandoned. I have insisted on all these points to show that this is something more than a mere squabble between a company and the Post Office, and because I wish to impress upon the House of Commons that this is a national enterprise—an undertaking in which every one of us is concerned. It is not merely because I am Member for the county Galway that I advocate this line, but because every Irishman, high and low, has his sympathies enlisted in this project. We feel that we have a right to a postal service from an Irish terminus, and we are determined to use every exertion and to strain every nerve to get it. If we have given anything in the shape of a political complexion to this case let me remind the House that we have been forced into doing so, because I insist that from the commencement of the contract until now the present Government—which I have usually supported—has shown a strong animus and a feeling against it. I do not refer merely to the dealings of the Postmaster General with this company, but I refer to the speech of Earl Granville, in the House of Lords, and to that of the late Mr. Wilson in the House of Commons on the vote of Want of Confidence.

I turn now to the immediate subject of this Motion, the contract itself, and, as dates are of the very greatest importance, I shall ask the House of Commons to do me the favour of bearing in mind the dates of the statement I am about to make. On the 22nd of October, 1858, a contract was entered into between the colony of Newfoundland on the one side, and the Atlantic Company on the other, for a monthly postal service between Galway and St. John's, Newfoundland, and the United States of America, under an annual subsidy of £13,000, of which £8,500 was to be paid by the Colonial Government of Newfoundland, and £4,500 by the Imperial Government. On the 21st of April, 1859, a contract was entered into between Her Majesty's then Government and the Atlantic Company for a postal service to be performed between Galway and Boston and New York, and providing also for the delivery of telegraphic messages between Galway and St. John's. The service was to be performed fortnightly, and the payment was to be at the rate of £1,500 a voyage, or £3,000 for the double voyage out and home. The ships were to be of certain specified conditions—of not less than 2,000 tons burden, and with engines of 450 horse-power. These may appear little matters, but it will be seen by-and-by upon points which I have to clear up that they are not without importance. In 1859 four ships were contracted for, at a cost amounting in round figures to £400,000. Their plans, lines, and specifications were submitted for the approval of the Admiralty, and the specifications so laid down were approved. I lay stress on this point because hereafter it will be seen that these ships did not exactly answer the specifications; and, perhaps, if those specifications had been more accurate the ships would have performed the service better. I now approach what I cannot help regarding as the cardinal point of the whole transaction. The Galway Company, finding that they had a service of a very arduous character to perform, and a fleet of first-class steamers to provide, naturally required sufficient time to set these afloat and to fit them properly for performing the service. They accordingly demanded and obtained a period of fourteen months from the date the contract was entered into before they should commence to carry it out; and the month of June, 1860, was fixed upon as the time for beginning to perform the service. But after the contract had been signed by the Government of the Earl of Derby circumstances arose which greatly complicated the affairs of the company. In the first place, Parliament was dissolved; and shortly after it reassembled a new Government was inaugurated, and from the moment it was installed a series of what I may call attacks were directed against the company. Questions were being continually put to the Ministry; little matters were being perpetually urged on the subject of this company; gentle hints and jogs were constantly conveyed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury, which were perfectly unmistakeable. Owing to the formation of this contract and to other circumstances, a Committee was appointed to sit on the subject of postal contracts generally. It was named early in July, 1859, and continued to sit till the end of the Session, but did not make its Report. On the meeting of Parliament in 1860 it was reappointed, but the Report was not made until the 22nd of May in that year; and in that document this passage occurs—

“It will, of course, be open to Parliament to decline to vote the money for carrying out this contract, but your Committee are not prepared to recommend that course.”

Although such in terms was the recommendation of the Committee, I think anybody who is aware of all the circumstances which occurred at that time must be perfectly certain that the fate of the Galway contract was trembling in the balance. We did not know what course the Government were likely to pursue; and it depended on the steps which the Government took whether that contract would be carried out or not. If we could have drawn the slightest inference from any circumstance which had previously occurred as to the animus and disposition of the Government, we should have argued hostility towards the subsidy on their part rather than any favour towards it. This Report, as I have said, was made on the 22nd of May, 1860, and a month afterwards, on the 22nd of June, the doubts which we had previously entertained were considerably strengthened by a letter from the Treasury to the company. It said—

“Under these circumstances it is impossible for their Lordships to foretell what may be the decision of Parliament, or until the final Report of the Committee is made to give any pledges as to the course the Government may think it their duty to adopt.”

The question was at last set at rest, but not until the vote of the House of Commons on the 9th of August, 1860. That is exactly sixteen months from the time the agreement was originally entered into. I may, therefore, point out that it was not till sixteen months after the original contract had been agreed on, and until two months after the company had been bound to enter on the performance of their contract, that it received the sanction of the House of Commons.

Let me now call attention to the position of the company during this crisis of their affairs. I am addressing a number of Gentlemen perfectly acquainted with mercantile transactions. Let me ask them what would be the position of any company in the world, engaged in an undertaking of such magnitude, bound by contracts amounting to half a million of money, whose whole hopes of getting their share capital paid up, and of inspiring contractors with the necessary confidence that their claims would be met were dependent upon the existence of a contract—if the fate of that contract were kept in uncertainty for sixteen months? The Directors had nothing whatever to rely upon; they could not even assure their shareholders that the contract would be carried out. That, I repeat, is the cardinal point of this case. If you meet us with the letter, we meet you with the spirit. If laches have been committed, we say that those laches are excusable; and that in consequence of the position in which this company was placed, by no fault of their own, but by the action of the House of Commons, this House ought to view the proceedings of the company in a fair and lenient spirit, and should give them the benefit of every doubt which may arise in their minds. What then, I will ask, occurred in June, 1860? This Committee was still sitting. Every consideration that could be urged against the company was brought forward; and I am bound to admit that some very unpleasant transactions came to light. But with none of those were the shareholders or any member of the present Board of direction in any way connected. In June, 1860, although the contract had not been sanctioned, the company determined to put their ships afloat. They were afraid that if they had not their ships afloat, opportunity would be taken by their opponents to bring that fact before the Committee; that a breach of contract would be alleged, and that an unfavourable impression would be made on the Committee, the effect of which might be to induce them to make an adverse Report. Under those circumstances the company actually commenced the service two months before the contract was granted; and they were called on and recommended to carry it out by the Treasury. That fact is not in writing, but I think it can be sufficiently proved before a Committee of this House. They were recommended by the Treasury to put their ships afloat, although at the time the Treasury had no means of paying them for that service.

Mr. Gregory

The next subject is that of the Newfoundland contract. I confess that I have been placed in a very difficult position in regard to this particular matter, because I found that yesterday evening a reply was sent by the Postmaster General to the statement of the Directors, in which they allege as a grievance that his Lordship had forced them to give up the Colonial Subsidy, while he kept them to the service to St. John's for which that subsidy had been granted. The House will bear in mind that in a letter from the Admiralty, written by Mr. Brady, that Gentleman makes this observation—"Nothing can be clearer to my mind, and certainly when the contract was settled it was not intended to send mails to St. John's." In spite of what Mr. Brady said—in spite of the instructions of the Admiralty, the Treasury Minute, and every official document—the carrying of the mails to Newfoundland was forced on the company at the mouth of the pistol by the Postmaster General. He had a double-barrelled pistol; because, while he forced them to carry those mails, he also compelled them to give up the Colonial Subsidy. In his reply to the statement made by the company on this point, the Postmaster General states that the contract for the carriage of the mails between Galway and Newfoundland was only for one year and had terminated; but I reply to the Postmaster General by stating simply that what he alleges is inaccurate. It is perfectly true that the contract was made for only one year, but it was to be renewed for five years if the Colonial Legislature consented; and they did consent. That is my reply. This matter of the carriage of the mails to Newfoundland is the most important point connected with the subject, because it impoverished the company and laid the foundation for the final cancelling of the contract; but I shall not go into it more minutely, as I think it is better to leave it for a Committee. It is alleged that the company has become subject to pains and penalties because they have not strictly carried out the contract according to what the Postmaster General considers the letter of the agreement, while it is not remembered that it was under a threat of the withdrawal of the contract that the company was forced to accept the condition of carrying those colonial mails on the terms imposed by the Postmaster General.

I now come to the destruction of the contract. In October, 1860, the company did apply to his Lordship to postpone the subsidy till March, 1861. That was their first proposal; and a great deal has been made of the fact of that suggestion having been thrown out by the company; but coupled with it was a request that the Prince Albert should be accepted for the temporary service, in consequence of the loss which had been sustained by the company, till their other vessels were ready. That request was refused. In a communication of the 12th of December, 1860, the company referred to the new condition of carrying the mails fortnightly to Newfoundland, and they asked for an extension of the time for commencing the service till June. They alleged that they had been forced by the alteration of the contract, and by what they considered to be the additional duty which they had been compelled to perform, to ask for that indulgence. They requested that instead of taking the extension to March, the time which they asked for when they did not contemplate carrying the mails fortnightly to Newfoundland, they might be allowed to take up to June. If the House will examine the correspondence they will see that in letter "61" they asked for the extension to June; in letter "62" they pressed for it; and in letter "63" they spoke of the loss of the Connaught, and proposed that the Prince Albert should be accepted. In letter "76" they gave their final protest, when the terms imposed upon them were that they must either give up the contract or consent to go on with the service in March; although, if their first demand to extend the time to June had been conceded, they would have been in possession of the Adriatic by that time, and the probability was that the service would have been carried on. I shall not go into the particulars of this matter, but I may make this observation—that in the letter of the 26th of March, discontinuing the service, the Postmaster General stated that the company had not one vessel capable of carrying out the contract. On that day I am informed they had one of the finest vessels in the world—the Adriatic. She had been employed by Sir Samuel Cunard, in consequence of some accident to one of his steamers. She carried over the mails from America to Cork for him, and the directors of the Galway Company applied to the Post Office to let her go out; but that department absolutely refused to let her make even one journey until she was surveyed by the officers of the Admiralty. Though the practice of surveying mail vessels is a good one I think that, considering the Adriatic had carried over the mails for Sir Samuel Cunard, the Postmaster General might have permitted her to make one voyage for the Galway Company without a survey. However, all these matters may be thrown on one side, because for almost every one of those laches and those concessions and indulgencies the Galway Company had, if I may use a vulgar expression, to "pay through the nose." The payments for fines inflicted on the company from the beginning of this business to the end has amounted in round numbers to over £8,000. It is supposed that this company has received a large sum for doing nothing; but let me assure the House that they have received no money except for services actually rendered, and that the total amount received by them is only £14,700. There have been irregularities, no doubt, and there have been concessions granted by the Postmaster General, but those concessions have been paid for. The company have been fined over and over again. I contend that those fines having been levied condonation has taken place, and that, therefore, dismissing those points, we must come at once to the crowning occurrence that took place on the 7th of May. In consequence of not having any vessel of their own the company chartered the Parana. I may mention that she is a vessel fulfilling all the conditions of the contract in respect of tonnage and horsepower. Her speed had been proved on former voyages, in which she had actually reached Boston in one day and several hours within the contract time. She had also returned in a shorter time than that specified in the contract. She was, if we may judge from these circumstances, a vessel capable of fulfilling the contract. By the contract dated the 21st of April, 1859, the company are bound to keep seaworthy and in complete repair a sufficient number of good, substantial, and efficient steam vessels of certain tonnage, but in case the vessels become disabled they shall immediately replace the same by good and efficient vessels of similar tonnage obtained by hire or otherwise. The words used are "efficient vessels," and there is not a word as to speed. The Parana had gone within a day of the time mentioned in the contract, and, therefore, provision was made for the unfortunate accident that had taken place. The accident to the Hibernia occurred after she had been passed by the Admiralty surveyor, and when she was on her way to the port from which she was to start. I am perfectly aware that the vessels to be employed under this contract were to be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, but I contend that their approval or disapproval was not to be merely arbitrary, but based on some distinct and intelligible principle. What is the principle on which the Admiralty disapproved the Parana? Lord Stanley of Alderley disapproved her on the ground that the Admiralty surveyor had stated that she was not able to carry the mails to St. John's within six days; but allow me to remark that that forms no part of the contract. The Postmaster General in one of his letters states that the company had only once taken the letters to St. John's within six days, but he omitted to mention that the company had carried despatches repeatedly from St. John's within six days. With regard to this question of carrying the mails to St. John's within six days, on which the whole matter hinges, I have to make this observation:—By the new contract entered into by the company, provision was made for taking the mails to St. John's, but no time whatever was specified. The time specified had reference to conveying the mails to Boston alone, and the proof of this is that there are no time tables for St. John's. Therefore, when the noble Lord says that in his refusal to accept the Parana he was guided by the decision of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, my reply is that they did not say the Parana was not competent to carry the mails to Boston within the time specified in the contract, but they were asked if it could go to St. John's in six days, and they said it could not go. The fact is, that the Parana did go to Boston, and accomplished the voyage within one day of the time specified, and came back in a shorter time. I ask, then, was it a wise or proper mode of dealing with the company to refuse a vessel which the Postmaster General had every reason to know would do the service within the specified time? I am extremely obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peel) for the answer he gave to the question which I addressed to him yesterday. I wanted to know what penalties had been imposed on other companies for breaches of contract, and what indulgences had been shown to other companies when such breaches were committed. The right hon. Gentleman paid a high compliment to Sir

Samuel Cunard, and I think that compliment well deserved; but it is of importance to observe that in regard to Sir Samuel Cunard's company no penalty can be imposed, except a fine of £100 for not having a ship ready to start. There are no penalties imposed on that highly subsidized company for over time, and no power to terminate the contract, because no time is specified.

Lord Stanley of Alderley takes to himself a great deal of credit throughout the whole of the correspondence. He speaks a great deal of the indulgence shown and the immense concessions made to the Galway Company. He seems to be one of those who take the benefit of that passage, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." The noble Lord evidently thinks that he has conferred considerable blessings on the company. He says "More concessions have been granted to this company than to any other company that ever existed." Now, let us see what is said by the Committee presided over by Lord Canning in 1853 with reference to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. That Report says—

"The mode in which this Company has performed its contract has of late been the subject of many complaints, and our attention has been called to several memorials which have been addressed to the Treasury, the Admiralty, and the Colonial Office, by parties interested in the communication with the West Indies."

The answer of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) referred to the first two years of the Royal Mail Company's existence, but what I have now to read relates to a later period. The Report says—

"The Company admit the correctness of the return which has been presented to the House of Commons. From this return it appears that in the course of the last two years the packets have only kept their stipulated time of arrival at Southampton on three occasions; that they have sometimes exceeded it by as much as fourteen or fifteen days; and that, on the average of the two years, they have failed to keep time by four days for each voyage."

"We find also," the Report goes on to say, "from a return furnished by a mercantile house in Liverpool, through the postmaster of that place, that in the three years from February, 1850, to March, 1853, the duplicates of letters from Panama despatched by way of New York were received in Liverpool sooner than the original letters forwarded by the Royal Mail Company were received in Southampton on twenty-nine different occasions."

There is one passage in the Report which appears to me to apply so closely to the point now in hand, that I hope the House will favour me with their attention while I read it. It says—

“We are satisfied that the Royal Mail Company has had great difficulties to contend with, and has made great exertions, and incurred heavy expense towards establishing an efficient fleet of vessels. On the other hand, it has been treated with great indulgence by the Government, and large allowance has been made for its shortcomings, in consideration of the unfortunate losses it has met with, and the interests involved in its maintenance.”

Those losses consisted of two ships.

“The subsidy which it receives is very large, and it has never been exposed to the competition of public tender. The abandonment of the North American branch within the first year of the contract, without any corresponding diminution in the subsidy originally granted, has rendered the rate of payment per mile much higher than was agreed upon when the company was formed.”

Here, Sir, is a company profiting by the abandonment of a portion of its contract. The Report goes on to say—

“It has, moreover, of late been very confidently asserted that several parties would be willing to undertake the service at a much lower sum than that now paid to the company; but while the contract remains in force there are no means of testing the sincerity of such offers.”

What is the decision at which the Committee arrived? They say—

“Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that, while it would not be fair towards the company at the present moment to determine the contract, or to inflict any penalty in respect to past deviations from it, the public interest, nevertheless, demands that a stricter course than has heretofore been followed with respect to such deviations be adopted.”

I have no hostile feeling towards the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. I know the difficulties they have had to contend with, and I have no wish to see them subjected to punishment at the hands of the Government; but I could not refrain from noticing the different treatment that company has received from that which has been extended to the Galway Company. I cannot but look upon the decision which the Government have come to on this matter as a great national misfortune. I am not going to say that the town of Galway has derived the most marvellous benefits from the existence of this company. That would be an unfair and exceptional mode of dealing with the question. But let me remind the House of the fact that Belfast and the north of Ireland have been so struck with the vital importance of direct communication that a new line has been commenced, and will shortly be finished, solely for the purpose of connecting Galway with Belfast. I may also say that the south of Ireland has been so impressed with the necessity of being in communication with Galway, that a line was sanctioned last year in Parliament to connect Limerick, Cork, Waterford, and the south-west of Ireland with Galway; and I fear that the withdrawal of the contract will have the effect of inducing the company to apply to Parliament to be released from its engagements, and thus deprive that part of Ireland of its communication with Galway. In former years, partly from the Commission of 1841, and partly from the general impression that prevailed in England, all idea of a communication between Ireland and America was pooh-poohed as visionary. Sir Samuel Cunard stated that if his ships were to call at any port of Ireland he must have an enormous increase in his subsidy. But what has taken place? Sir Samuel Cunard has now found out that it is absolutely necessary to accommodate the south of Ireland, and the consequence is that Cork has been made a port of call without any increase of subsidy being asked for. Other companies also, who formerly thought that Liverpool was the only place to be accommodated, have found out that Londonderry ought also to be a port of call. We now find that packets run both by the southern and northern route, and Ireland has three distinct ports of departure for America, when only a short time ago it was thought unnecessary she should have any American ports at all. I think that both the south and north of Ireland owe a great debt of gratitude to the late Government, because it is from no love of those ports that Sir Samuel Cunard sends his vessels to Cork and Mr. Allan his to Londonderry. We may also be assured that in this, as in other cases, when the jealousy is extinguished the love is likely to wax faint. Then, with respect to the subsidy—it is but £74,000 a year; and let us look for one moment what are the advantages to England of that subsidy. At this moment news from the United States is greedily sought for, and the difference of a few days earlier or later is of vital importance to every man engaged in trade. And when the Postmaster General, Lord Stanley of Alderley, stated in “another place” that after all, so far as England was concerned, we might just as well have vessels running from Queenstown, inasmuch as they went to New York as soon as from Galway, he forgot the enormous importance of the telegraphic communication that is brought from St. John's, and which transmits news four or five days later than by the direct ocean communication. I believe it is totally impossible to over-estimate the value of this communication between Ireland and America.

Hints have been thrown out that Ireland would be satisfied either with having ships touching at her ports or with having another contract thrown open to public competition. Well, I confess that, considering the hard usage that this company has received—I mean with regard to being forced to hurry on their ships, which has driven them into all this difficulty—considering, also, the danger that such a contract would be accepted by persons whose only object would be to do away with this communication between Ireland and America—I hope the House of Commons will take, I will not say a lenient, but a just view of this question, and devise the means of extending indulgence to this particular company. With regard to our part of the world, I think that Galway has some peculiar claims. Everybody knows that Galway is not a very wealthy place, but I believe all Irish gentlemen are perfectly aware that a very large and liberal subscription, almost exceeding the means of the persons subscribing, has been raised with the view of improving the accommodation of the port by providing a suitable landing place. The town of Galway has brought in a Bill to tax itself to the amount of fourpence in the pound on rateable property to improve its piers and harbours; and the county of Galway has agreed, by the resolutions of two successive grand juries, and of the presentment sessions of every barony except two, to tax itself one penny in the pound in order to improve the harbour of Galway and provide docks for the ships. When, therefore, it is thrown out that we never help ourselves, let the House see how ready we have been to put our hands in our pockets, although they are not deep ones. We have done our best, and we think that there ought to be some consideration shown to us. Let me refer to a circumstance that has occurred, to show the difference between the treatment sometimes extended to one country and the other. I refer to the course taken by the Treasury towards Ireland and Scotland. Last year the Harbour Commissioners of the town of Galway asked permission of the Treasury to expend £1,200 of their harbour dues in laying down moorings. The Treasury refused, though the only effect would have been to postpone for six months the last instalment of the debt due by the Commissioners. Simultaneously with that refusal, namely, on the 23rd of July, 1860, an Act passed this House to provide for the settlement and discharge of the debt due to the Treasury from the Commissioners of the Harbours and Docks at Leith. This debt amounted, in 1838, to no less than £528,374, and Heaven only knows how much remained unpaid in July, 1860. The end of the operation was that this immense debt, although contracted by the city of Edinburgh, was compromised by the Treasury on the payment of the sum of £50,000, as may be seen by the Schedule of the Act. That is the treatment extended to one side of St. George's Channel as compared with the other.

I will not allude to the great amount of personal distress in Ireland which will be occasioned by the termination of this contract. But this is practically an announcement that capital must fly away from a people so unfortunate. I am very much afraid that the course pursued by the Government will add another to the many resentments cherished by that country against this. It will be considered in that country that this course has been adopted in a grudging and envious spirit towards an undertaking that was calculated to come into rivalry with Scotch or English interests. This may be very erroneous and it may be very unreasoning—[ironical cheers]*—*and I am perfectly ready to acknowledge that it is so. But I say that those who undertake the management and government of a country must make allowance for popular sentiment. This House of Commons which sets up to be a burning and a shining light to the whole world, and places all its measures on the solid basis of argument and reason, did it not defer last year to what was called an unreasoning and erroneous sentiment? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will remember that on the Religious Census Bill a most important provision was struck out solely in deference to what he called an unreasoning sentiment. And, therefore, Sir, when hon. Members cheer me ironically for saying that it is an erroneous sentiment on the part of the people of Ireland, let me remind them that an erroneous sentiment on the part of a large section of the people of England was deferred to last year by the Secretary of State himself. The late Under Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Drummond), well known for the aphorism that "property has its duties as well as its rights," used to say that "how to do it" was in his mind a matter of as great importance in the government of Ireland as "what to do." I wish Her Majesty's Government would take into consideration that opinion of Mr. Drummond, and, rely upon it, they would be no losers if the contentment of a people be a gain and a success. I am quite aware that Her Majesty's Ministers have great difficulties to contend with—they have the greatest of all difficulties to contend with—the difficulty of being ignorant how to do it. They are in this position, that they have not one single Irish gentleman connected with them from whom they can obtain the slightest reliable information as to the temper of the people. Moreover, they do not take the trouble to consult those gentlemen out of the House who would be willing to enlighten them on the subject. As paradoxes are at a premium in the Cabinet, perhaps they are acting upon the hypothesis that persons who are well-informed and enlightened on the subject through experience are so blinded by ingrained and inveterate prejudices that it would be better not to apply to them for their opinion. That, at all events, is their practice if not their theory, and they will have every opportunity of carrying out that principle with perfect and uninterrupted success, because I conceive that when we who are supporters of the Government go back to our constituents, our fidelity to our party will not be, as heretofore, a matter for glorification, but a matter of excuse. I know perfectly well that it will be thrown in my teeth that my argument goes to the length of maintaining that Ireland is to be favoured by the grant of subsidies and contracts; but that is not the argument I used. That is not the meaning I wish to convey. The question at issue is not this miserable dole of £72,000; but the question is whether, while English enterprise is met with favour, Irish enterprise is met with every disfavour? It is the question of the spirit and animus which have influenced you from the beginning to the end of the matter. It is the question whether political antipathies are to be indulged in at our expense, and whether in wounding Ireland you can discredit the Earl of Derby and gratify party pique by the destruction of a nation's hopes? I confess the prospect is not a cheering one. When I go back to those who sent me here, I shall be forced to tell them that Her Majesty's Government have given a practical proof that we in Ireland may contribute, but shall not receive—that we may sow, but shall not reap, and are not worthy of the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table. I now, Sir, put my Motion in your hands, and the way in which I should wish the matter to be investigated and decided on is not by having a large Committee, but I should rather desire to see the subject left to the arbitration of five persons selected for their impartiality. If you choose to put on the Committee one Member on the part of Ireland to conduct the case, and one Member on the part of Government to defend the Government, perhaps that would be the most satisfactory mode of proceeding; but all I can say is this—that, insisting that the question shall be judged not merely on the letter but by the spirit of the contract, I shall myself, for one, acquiesce with the most perfect readiness in the impartial decision of five English Gentlemen.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"A Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the circumstances attending the termination, by the Postmaster General, of the Postal Contract with the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company."

—instead thereof.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I wish to say a few words in reply to the observations made by the hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his speech. It was irregular, no doubt, to refer to a former debate, but since the hon. Gentleman has chosen to commit that irregularity I must be permitted to follow him in the same course. The hon. Gentleman has made a charge of want of frankness in the part I took in the debate alluded to, and I beg to state what occurred. There had been, on the morning of a very important debate, an intimation in a newspaper of the most general circulation—The Times newspaper—that a rumour existed of a bargain made between the Government and the Irish Members that, in consideration of £36,000 being paid on account of the Galway contract, the Irish Members were to support the Government. Now, Sir, I considered that rumour as a calumny, and I stated on behalf of the Government that it was a calumny on the Government. I certainly had a right to do that. It was obvious that the calumny was aimed against the Government on one side, and against the Irish Members on the other; and it was my business, as a member of the Government, to deny the imputation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire spoke early in that debate, and referred incidentally to the question of the Galway contract. It, therefore, became my opportunity and my duty to refute the calumny. It was for the Irish Members to refute that part of the calumny which referred to them; but, with respect to the conduct of the Government, I stated that I had been informed by my noble Friend the Prime Minister that a gentleman, who seemed entitled to ask the question, had asked him to receive a deputation of Irish Members on the Monday morning, and that so anxious was my noble Friend to avoid any misconception that he declined to receive the deputation. Now, I do not say that Mr. Daly was authorized to make that communication; I did not say that he stated himself to be authorized, but I said that he seemed to be entitled to ask the question, and I do not know that if I had to make the statement to-day I could use words that would more correctly convey my meaning. My noble Friend afterwards, in answer to a question from the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French), made a statement in respect to what passed between Mr. Daly and himself, and any one who reads in the newspapers the speech of Father Daly, as he is called in Galway, will find that that gentleman gives exactly the same account of the interview. Some days after, I having made no imputation on any hon. Member—on a Wednesday, when it is not expected that public matters will be introduced, and when the Bills of private Members were generally the subject of discussion—my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon came down to the House and disclaimed on the part of the Irish Members any authority having been given to Mr. Daly or any other person to use threats to the Government with respect to the impending division. My noble Friend, I understand, immediately got up and stated that he was perfectly satisfied with that declaration, and there the whole matter seemed to be at an end. That statement was made to my noble Friend and not to me. My noble Friend accepted the disclaimer—I was not present in the House—and I concluded that the business was at an end. But as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregory) has made a statement to-night, I am ready to say that I, like my noble Friend, accept the disclaimer, and readily believe that Mr. Daly had no authority, and was not entitled, to propose the deputation to the Government. On the other hand, it must be admitted that, supposing the Government had acted with the greatest injustice to the Galway Company, it would have been disgraceful to the Government and to the Irish Members if, for the sake of a majority on a question under discussion at the time, there had been any contract between them. I, therefore, think I was bound to make the statement I did a few days afterwards. The Times newspaper stated that that had been a current report, and that they gave publicity to it. That being so, both the Government and the Irish Members ought to be obliged to that newspaper for bringing prominently to light the current rumour; and, for my part, I was glad to have the opportunity of utterly disclaiming that there was any truth in that report. It is not my intention to enter now into the question of the Galway contract, as the Government do not intend to oppose the Amendment. The whole of the subject will come under the consideration of the Committee, and if any injustice has been done to the Galway Company, or any injury to the interests of Ireland, I hope that injustice and that injury may be redressed. In reference to the concluding observations of the hon. Member, I may say that I remember, upon one occasion when I called on Viscount Melbourne, that that noble Lord informed me that he had offered the appointment of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to Lord Althorpe, who refused the office, stating that he did not suppose the appointment would be very popular. Upon this Viscount Melbourne remarked that he was entirely mistaken, and that no people more than the Irish would have admired, respected, and appreciated his plain and simple character and his love of justice. I agree with Viscount Melbourne that the Irish people do appreciate justice, and if any injustice has been committed towards them, they will naturally feel sore on that account; but I believe that a Government wishing to stand well with the Irish people ought not to exdeavour to do so by offering them any unfair advantage, but, in order to be popular, ought to be guided by the principles of justice.

MR. BAXTER said, he was glad that Her Majesty's Government did not intend to oppose the Motion made by the hon. Member for Galway in a singularly temperate and able speech. Such a course was only respectful to the people of Ireland, who, there could be no doubt, felt strongly and unanimously on the subject, and were entitled to have it thoroughly investigated, though in his humble opinion they had been greatly misled and deceived. The more investigation was carried to the bottom of the question, the more clearly would it appear that the Postmaster General had only done what it was his bounden duty to do—what he was forced to do by the circumstances of the case, by the action of the Company themselves, and as many commercial gentlemen well acquainted with the facts thought ought to have been done long before. Before making a few observations, and they should be but few—because his case was so much better than that of the hon. Member for Galway—he might be permitted to clear the ground by distinctly stating that his hostility to the Galway subsidy had nothing whatever to do with the fact that the vessels sailed from an Irish port. Hon. Gentlemen would recollect that he had before stated in the House, that wherever there was effective competition on any ocean—and there was such competition on the North Atlantic—a subsidy became a profligate waste of public money. Those being his views, he thought the Earl of Derby's Government quite wrong, not only in granting the Galway subsidy, but in renewing the contract with the Cunard Company. There were several hon. Gentlemen who sat with him on the Committee last year, and they would do him the justice to say that he lost no opportunity of exposing the evils that resulted from the extension of the contract to the Cunard Company. The hon. Member for Galway intimated that Scotch interests were perhaps concerned. He could only say that he (Mr. Baxter) had no connection with any steam packet company, or with any port from which trans-oceanic steamers sailed, and his simple desire was to save the public money by exposing the evils that sprang from a system of unlimited subsidy. At the same time he would admit that in his view Ireland was entitled, if for no other reason, from her geographical position, to a direct postal communication with America; and he always held the opinion, that in any new arrangement with the Cunard Company, it would become the bounden duty of the Government to see that Ireland was made a point of departure and a point of arrival. But that could very wisely have been done, and ought to have been done, without hastily renewing the contract with the Cunard Company on the old terms—terms which, as every one connected with commerce knew, were ridiculously advantageous to that Company, and without giving a subsidy to the Galway Company, which never had sufficient means to carry on the business—and which he had no hesitation in saying was nothing more than a commercial sham. They must all admit that, as soon as the contract was signed by the Government and solemnly ratified by the House of Commons, it was the duty of Government not only to “implement” it, but to “implement” it in the most fair and liberal manner. Now, how far was the charge which the directors of the Atlantic Royal Mail Company brought against the Government, in a document more full of misstatements and inaccuracies than any document he had ever perused—how far was that charge correct? The first question that arose from the people of Ireland and from that House was what was the financial position of the Company itself? Many Members of the Committee of last year believed that the Earl of Derby's Government had not made sufficient inquiry with regard to the pecuniary responsibility of the Company; but he held in his hand a document which set the matter at rest—a document extracted from The Times. The balance-sheet of the Company, made up to the 31st December, 1860, showed a subscribed capital at that date, of £406,390, while the losses amounted to £335,839, leaving a balance of £70,550. He had some little experience in these matters, and having run over the various items contained in this balance-sheet, it did occur to him that they were not very correctly stated. He, therefore, put the document into the hands of an experienced accountant, requesting him to examine it, and he reduced the balance of £70,550 to £19,996. [MR. HENNESSY: How was that done?—Colonel FRENCH: Oh, by simple subtraction.] Since December of last year the Company had lost a great deal of money, and he was sure he was not addressing a single commercial man in that House who did not believe that even if they were to give to the Company every shilling of the £72,000 in the present year, their position, financially speaking, was wholly hopeless and irremediable. Now, with regard to the ships which the Company at the present time had ready to perform the contract. Hon. Gentlemen might flatter themselves that the case was not really quite so bad as had been represented. He was rather struck with the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), who seemed to hope against hope, and said that if indulgence were granted to them, the Company might yet be able to carry on the service. But what was the fact? It was a very ugly and indisputable fact that at the present moment the Atlantic Royal Mail Company had only one ship answering to the requirements of the contract. That ship was the Adriatic. [Colonel FRENCH: And the Hibernia.] He would come to the Hibernia presently. He wished to be perfectly fair, and he would, therefore, readily admit that there was no finer vessel on the ocean than the Adriatic. She had, he believed, been purchased from the Americans, and formed at one time one of the Collins' fleet of steamers. Now, the Company were bound by the conditions of their contract to have steamers of 2,000 tons and 450 horse power. It required four steamers to perform the service, and four steamers were ordered by the company in due course. The first vessel ordered was the Connaught, than which a worse vessel never crossed the ocean. He was only surprised that the officers of the Government ever permitted that vessel to go to sea. To every one's astonishment, however, she made one passage. On her second voyage she sprung a tremendous leak, also took fire—and her crew and passengers were only saved by the greatest heroism and daring displayed by the captain of an American brig. The second ship taken to perform the service was the Hibernia. Her history was, if possible, still sadder. She left Southampton, took her station on the Galway line, and what was her hard fate? She got as far as Cape Clear when she, as stated in the document to which he had already referred, encountered a severe hurricane. All he could say was that the captains of five other steamers belonging to three different lines, who were in that neighbourhood at the time, were perfectly unconscious of any hurricane. Their reports stated that there was nothing further than a tolerably heavy sea. That sea, however, seemed to have proved too much for so bad a ship as the Hibernia; she had to put into Cork, leaking fore and aft, and the greatest possible difficulty was afterwards experienced in bringing her round to Liverpool, where at last she did arrive. Now, as the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) was anxious to hear about the Hibernia, he (Mr. Baxter) would read for the information of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Report of the Government Surveyors in regard to the Hibernia. The Report was dated the 6th of April, 1861, and was as follows:—

"We have surveyed the Hibernia in dry dock at Messrs. Laird's yard at Birkenhead in reference to the Postmaster General's communication respecting the leaky state of that vessel, consequent on encountering a heavy gale on her passage from Southampton to Galway, and we found the whole of the butts of the flat keel and bottom plating for about 180 feet amidships very much strained; and that several of the butts of the upper strakes in the wake of the paddle-boxes and sponsons have, likewise, been considerably strained, indicating such a deficiency of strength in the vessel, especially in a longitudinal direction, as to render her unseaworthy, and to fully account for the leakage, which, it is said, required the whole of the engine pumps and bilge injections to keep it under. The Company have caused a survey of the ship to be made, with a view to determine what should be done to strengthen her, and in other respects to make her fit for the service she is intended for, and their proposals for this object when decided on will, we understand, be officially submitted for the consideration of the Postmaster General. The engines for driving the paddles are stated to have performed well; but the main shaft of the engine, for driving the air pumps, has been somewhat strained, and is to be replaced by a stronger one.

(Signed)

"J. LUKE."

Then the second survey, made on the 2nd of April, 1861, by the Liverpool shipwright surveyors, J. Martyr and W. Campbell, was to the following effect:—

"We beg to report that the paddle steamer Hibernia has arrived at this port and been placed in dry dock. We have examined her, and she appears to show great symptoms of weakness, and will require to be considerably strengthened. We, therefore, submit that her certificate be cancelled. N.B. Certificate cancelled accordingly."

So much for the Hibernia. But he was told that a sum of no less than £40,000 would be required to make that vessel fit to go to sea at all, and he was quite sure of this, that neither the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon nor the hon. Member for Galway, even after that £40,000 had been spent upon her, would trust their lives in her across the Atlantic. Having thus disposed of two of the vessels, or rather the vessels having disposed of themselves—he now came to the third vessel which was built—namely, the Columbia. In the document to which he had referred, the Atlantic Royal Mail Company complained grievously that they had not been able to see the Reports of the Surveyors of the Board of Admiralty, or of the Surveyors of the Board of Trade on these vessels. Since then, however, these Reports had on his Motion been laid upon the Table of the House, and he wished the Royal Atlantic Mail Company and its supporters great joy. With the permission of the House he would now read a short report made on the 1st of April, 1861, by Mr. Luke, the Surveyor to the Admiralty, in regard to the ship Columbia—

“I have surveyed the new iron paddle-wheel steamer Columbia afloat at Southampton. Her length is 360 feet, breadth 40 feet, depth to keel 30 feet, and tonnage 2,873 tons. The construction of her hull is, in my opinion, in many respects faulty; still, with the alterations and additions which I have had made at Southampton, I consider this vessel to be at the present time sufficiently seaworthy, and fit to carry the mails for two or three voyages during the summer service referred to in the contract, after which she should be carefully examined in dry dock, when I apprehend it will be found that she has not that degree of longitudinal strength in her lower and upper parts which she should have to prevent straining and leakage when at sea. “J. LUKE.”

The vessel was so bad that the Government surveyor would only pass her for two voyages, and he had letters from all parts of the country complaining that she should have been passed at all. The vessel made only one voyage, and he would here read two sentences from a letter addressed by a gentleman to an Irish paper with reference to that voyage—

“I am at last in Boston, after a long passage of eighteen days. The voyage was one continued tissue of mishaps, but I enjoyed it exceedingly. The Columbia is, I am sorry to say, a complete failure, as she should have been in Boston in nine days and sixteen hours, according to contract. She is very wet and slow as, notwithstanding the immense consumption of coal (120 tons a day), we never went faster than ten miles an hour, instead of fifteen, which she was intended to do.”

She had been put into dry dock at Liverpool, and the last thing heard of her was that she had fallen over on her beam ends. The fourth vessel was the Anglia, which was not yet ready. The company, no doubt, had also the Prince Albert, but she was not a vessel answering the requirements of the contract. She indeed had made the passage homewards three times within the time specified in the contract, but the average of her voyages outwards was no less than four days beyond the contract time. One word as to the Parana. In the statement of the directors they were told that the Parana was a ship which had been employed in the postal service. That was so far true. The Parana was an old ship which formerly belonged to the West India Royal Mail Company. She never was a good ship, and she was condemned some years ago as unfit for the sunny seas of the Southern Atlantic, and without wishing to prejudice the Galway Company he should be sorry to trust his life in her. So much for the financial position of the Company, and the ships they had at their command. Then came the question—how had they performed the stipulations of the contract? He was sure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) would bear him out when he stated that the sine qua non for granting the contract originally on the part of the Earl of Derby's Government, was that the voyage from Galway to St. John's should be performed within six days. What were the facts? He would not trouble the House with details, but he would simply make one statement, which he knew to be perfectly incontrovertible, that out of thirty-nine homeward voyages the vessels of the Royal Atlantic Mail Company had only kept their time five times, and out of forty-one outward voyages they had never kept their time once. The House must not suppose either that those voyages were performed by vessels answering to the requirements of the contract; on the contrary, only two double voyages, as stated by the Postmaster General, were performed by ships answering to the requirements of that contract that had been cancelled. Those facts proved beyond all controversy that the Postmaster General was entirely in the right when he said—“It is evident that the Company are not now and never have been in a position satisfactorily to perform the conditions of that contract.” When the directors put forward the statement that the vessels were built by builders of well-known eminence, he must tell the House that he had been informed by very good authority that two of those ships were built by gentlemen who never built an ocean steamship before. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) laid great stress upon the conduct of the Government in dealing with this contract, and told the House that the difficulties of the company were all created by the absence of any decision on the part of the House of Commons. But during all this period the ships were in process of construction; and the House would be surprised when he told them that two of them at least were ready, but remained on the builders' hands for the simple reason that the Company had not the money to pay for them. As to their difficulties in procuring ships for this service originally, they arose from the fact that the Company never was possessed of sufficient capital to carry on the enterprize. Then the Directors enlarged on the great difficulty in getting ships of such enormous tonnage built, but that was only trifling with the House of Commons. There was not an hon. Gentleman in that House connected with steampacket companies who did not know that there was no difficulty whatever in getting even larger ships built every day, provided they went to efficient builders and had money to pay for them. There was only one other point to which he would call the attention of the House. The Secretary of the Post Office had written to the secretary of the Company, stating that greater indulgence was shown to this Company than was ever shown to any other packet Company. That was substantially true. The Royal Mail Company was, he admitted, very guilty indeed in respect of the time they occupied in their voyages. But the Atlantic Company never kept time at all, and, in addition to that, they had at the present moment only one ship fit to perform the conditions of the contract, whereas the Royal Mail Company, though guilty of heinous sins, was never in that deplorable plight. There was no other instance of a Company which had so conspicuously broken down or to which so much indulgence had been shown. But there was another Company—the European and Australasian—which had to contend with far greater difficulties than the Atlantic Company; but to that Company no indulgence had been shown, and it was a Scotch Company. They had to pay every shilling of the tremendous penalties they incurred, and obtained no remission of the sums to which they had become liable in consequence of the non-performance of their contract. He had been asked to bring their case before the House, but he refused to do anything of the kind, and for this reason, that he was certain that the moment they showed indulgence to Companies, and remitted the penalties due from them, the contracts would become delusions and shams. The Galway Company had not a penny of money, and it had only one vessel that was in a position to meet the terms of the contract. It had utterly failed to perform one of the duties it had undertaken. What, then, could the Postmaster General do, under the circumstances, but what he had done? And he (Mr. Baxter) was at a loss to know what the hon. Member for Galway wanted? Did he want further time for the Company to raise additional capital? Every man of business knew that would be only to throw away good money after bad, and would only make that final winding up which must eventually become more disastrous to those concerned. Did he mean to ask Her Majesty's Government to allow the royal mails to be carried in such ships as the Parana, the Columbia, and the Hibernia? The Government would incur a tremendous responsibility if they in any way countenanced ships which were not fit to cross the North Atlantic. For these reasons he submitted to the House that the Postmaster General had done what was simply his duty—a duty which was forced upon him by the gross mismanagement of the Company and its want of capital. At the same time he should support the Motion for a Committee. And for this reason only—respect for the feelings of the people of Ireland. He supported it, not because there was the slightest pretext for finding fault with Lord Stanley of Alderley, but that the people of Ireland, by an investigation into the affairs of that bubble Company, might be made aware how grossly they had been imposed upon and deceived.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: There is one observation which was made in the earlier part of his speech by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) to the full benefit of which I admit he is entitled—I believe that his course with regard to these contracts has been perfectly consistent. He has not opposed this subsidy, in my opinion, on the ground that it was an Irish subsidy. He adopts a plain and intelligible course when he says “I am opposed to all subsidies for the performance of postal services.” But I wish I could go further and say that the rest of his speech was characterized by the same fair and candid spirit. Now I have no title to speak here on behalf of the Atlantic Steam Navigation Company. I do not know what are the full particulars of their case. I have no connection with them which would justify me in answering on their behalf; but I have the honour to be a Member of this House, and I have some idea of what is fair play. When we make charges in this House with regard to the conduct of the Executive Government, if we are of opinion that the course taken by them is not justifiable under the circumstances, they are here to answer for themselves. But with regard to a private and commercial Company, whose interests, not merely for the past but for the future, are deeply involved in every observation made in the course of this debate, I will ask the House whether the observations of the hon. Member for Montrose were perfectly fair observations? Was it candid in the hon. Gentleman or fair to a private Company whose credit in the world is of some importance to them with regard to their future transactions—there having been no termination of the contract on the ground of want of capital or solvency—that having proceeded on grounds altogether different—was it fair in a discussion of this nature to assert that this Company was in a state of hopeless insolvency, to say that they had not got a shilling, to produce a balance-sheet made up to the end of last year, and announce to the House the results, not as they appear on the face of it, but as he stated they had been made out by some ingenious accountant? Was it fair to conceal what I only know by common report, that since the time of which the hon. Member spoke the Company has actually changed hands, and has now a proprietorship as solvent, as able to fulfil any engagements, and to contribute any sum of money towards carrying it on as any company in the kingdom? Did the hon. Member for Montrose know that, or did he not? I say if, as a matter of common rumour, he did not know it, he is singularly unfortunate in the extent of his information on this subject. Anything more unfair to the Company when they are not here to answer for themselves, and when the Postmaster General has not made it one of the charges against them that they have no capital, I cannot conceive. I will give another instance of the fairness of the hon. Member for Montrose. He says the four ships which were ordered to be built were utterly worthless, and he speaks as if they had not been built by known builders and in accordance with the contract. What is the fact? The contract specified on the face of it what were the requisites of the ships to be built. I know that contracts were entered into with builders known to be of great repute—I know the contracts were for prices not too scanty or niggardly, but for full prices; and I know, moreover, that with regard to every ship built and delivered the Government surveyors announced their approval. Is it fair, then, to a Company which has entered into a contract for the construction of vessels according to the specifications for proper prices, who had their ships surveyed and passed by the Government inspectors, to say now that those ships are utterly worthless—to make that a charge of blame against them, and not as a ground of commiseration, that, having done everything in their power, their ships have not answered their just expectations? Above all, is it fair that the hon. Gentleman should say, as he did say with regard to one of these vessels, that if £40,000 more were expended upon her, as recommended by the Government surveyor, he did not believe any Member of that House would trust himself in her across the Atlantic? But this does not end my charges of unfairness against the hon. Member. He tells us that, it being alleged by the Company that a particular vessel met with a disaster in a great gale off Cape Clear, he has seen letters from captains of merchant vessels who were out at the time, and knew of no such gale; while the papers on the table inform us that the Government surveyor, having examined the ship at Liverpool, speaks of her having met with the misfortune to which the hon. Member now refers in a gale off Cape Clear. Well, then, it comes to this—was the Government inspector competent, or was he not competent, to speak as he does, that the damage received was such as the vessel would sustain in a heavy gale? I have not yet done with my charges against the hon. Member. The hon. Member professes to be accurately informed as to the case of the Australasian Steampacket Company. He spoke of the losses they met with, and the penalties enforced against them. He says other companies met with indulgence; but the Australasian Company was a Scotch Company. They failed to perform the stipulated service, and incurred penalties, which he said were exacted to the utmost farthing. Now, what is the fact? I have got the Report of the Committee on which the hon. Member for Montrose himself sat, and what do I find? The Committee put this question to Mr. Clifton,—"What penalties were enforced against the Company?" So far from the penalties being exacted to the utmost farthing, as the hon. Member for Montrose states, the answer is:—"The penalties incurred amounted to £75,725; the amount remitted was £21,133." Is it fair, then, to mislead the judgment of the House of Commons, on the eve of an inquiry too? Is it fair in the hon. Member, who sat on the Committee where those facts were disclosed, to affirm, as a matter upon which there can be no doubt, that, though in the case of the West India Mail Company indulgence has been shown, yet in the case of a Scotch Company the penalties were exacted to the uttermost farthing?

Speaking for myself, I am extremely glad that this matter has been taken entirely out of the field of politics. I regret that it has ever been mixed up with politics, and I am sure that if anybody has to deplore it it is the Company. The case from first to last is one not for political judgment, but for fair and impartial consideration. It is a question not merely of a local company, and affecting this Company only, but it affects the whole question of Government contracts. I do not think there is anything in the world which will place Government contracts at a discount in the market so much as to allow the idea to get abroad either that the Government is in the habit of resorting to what may be called sharp practice to terminate a contract, or that it deals in a different way in the remission of penalties or the cancelling of contracts with different companies. There are two reasons which, to my mind, are perfectly conclusive as to the granting of this Committee. Up to 1854 or 1855 the form of contract was this:—The Post Office or the Admiralty contracted positively to pay a certain sum of money for the performance of a particular service, and if any dispute arose the contractor was able to take the opinion of a Court of law. But a few years ago the House of Commons altered the form, and this and all other modern contracts simply engage not to pay a subsidy positively, but to pay a subsidy out of monies to be voted by Parliament. The Galway Company, in this case, contend that the Parana, which they tendered to the Post Office, but which the department refused, and thereon broke the contract, was an efficient vessel. That is a question which ought to be tried; but it cannot be tried in this House, nor, owing to the particular form of the contract, can it be tried in a court of law; and the House, therefore, having insisted on the alteration in the form of contracts for the purposes of its own policy, is bound to see that the contractor is not placed in a worse position than he would have been before, and to give him the opportunity of investigation. The other reason is one which has been very forcibly urged by the hon. Member for Galway. He pointed out that the contract was made in April, 1859, and that the service was not to commence until June, 1860. That interval was allowed the Company to raise their capital and to prepare their vessels, and if nothing more had occurred there would have been perfectly good reason at the end of that time for saying, "You are not perfectly ready to begin your service; it is your own fault, you have had time enough." But during the whole of that time the contract was one with respect to which the public entertained the strongest opinion that it was about to be cancelled or repudiated by the House of Commons, and while Parliament was perfectly free to break it on the one hand, on the other hand the Company were bound under heavy penalties to perform the service when the time came. I do not believe that in the history of these dealings between man and man there ever was a contract of that kind which for all that time bound one side and not the other. It does not need a very great experience of mercantile affairs of this kind, or a very keen insight into the motives of men, to see what sort of an effect this one-sided contract must have had on the Company in getting together their capital. The hon. Member opposite says that two of their ships were ready on the stocks at the end of the time, but there was not money to pay for them. Why, that proves the case. The capital of the Company was quite sufficient if it had been paid up; and why had it not been paid up? Because men were not such fools, when they saw the sort of security which the Company had from the Treasury, not to keep their money in their pockets as long as they could, and postpone paying the calls to the last moment. The security was totally worthless, for the Treasury wrote a letter to the effect that they would not undertake to say what would be the action of Parliament on the matter. It requires, therefore, to be investigated whether the Company has been dealt with in a spirit of fairness under the circumstances. In the letter to the Postmaster General from the Company there is an allegation which certainly very much surprised me. The Company say that, according to their own construction of the contract, they were not bound to carry the mails to St. John's. I have looked through the contract, and it is not necessary for me to say what is my opinion of its construction, but from its peculiar wording the point is certainly doubtful, and there is a great deal to be said on both sides. However, the Company say that on their application to the Postmaster General to postpone the starting of a particular ship for a fortnight, he not only consented and exempted them from the penalty, but he also insisted on the Directors of the Company signing an admission that their construction of the contract was wrong and his was right. I do not know whether that allegation is true or not, but if it is—and it has been left uncontradicted—I certainly do not remember that such a course—putting duress on a contractor and buying off, as it were, his construction of an agreement—was ever pursued by a department before, and I hope it will not be drawn into a precedent, for it does not redound to the honour of the department. I think I know what a Court of law would say to the proceeding. I am glad that the Government have consented to the appointment of this Committee, and I only regret that the hon. Member for Montrose has felt it his duty to-night to speak in such a tone of a Company which is not here to defend itself. There is one part of the case about which there is not a shadow of a doubt in Ireland, and that is, that it having been arranged there should be a packet service at the port of Galway, and a communication by railway having been made to that port from other parts of Ireland on the faith of that arrangement, not to carry it out would be to inflict great injustice on Ireland. We have heard about an Irish port being made a port of call; but I beg to remind the House that if that be established as a permanent arrangement with the Liverpool vessels it will not give the benefit desired. You cannot take the goods in the first place. Large quantities of Irish linens are now carried by railway direct to the place of transshipment, but they will not go to Queenstown to be put on board vessels to which passengers are taken out in small boats. But, in addition to that, what are you to do with the emigrants? You cannot have them assembled at a port of call ready to embark by means of a river steamboat. There must be a vessel lying alongside a wharf for days and weeks before to enable them to complete their arrangements and embark from the shore. Although it is not material to the appointment of the Committee, I hope it will not lend any strength to the idea that a subsidy for a packet service will be worth anything which only provides for vessels to call at Queenstown. I believe that a packet service at Galway, by whatever company carried out, will be beneficial in the highest degree to every interest in Ireland. I believe that it will be found that this Company has been dealt with more hardly than any Company by the executive part of the Government, and that there are very fair grounds for reconsidering that opinion of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. and learned Gentleman has adverted in the latter portion of his speech to matters which are, undoubtedly, of great importance; but which, at the same time, do not fall within the immediate subject of debate. The special claim of Ireland for a packet service on account of her geographical position is material to be considered, but it is not proposed that it should be considered by the Committee which we are now asked to appoint, and it scarcely lies within the terms of the order of reference. Looking to the immediate object of the Committee, much irrelevant matter has been introduced into the debate, and I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman is justified in the complaint which he has made against the Member for Montrose. My hon. Friend the Member for Montrose has spoken with great freedom upon what he believed to be the essential merits of this case, and has entered into the motives of public transactions. The hon. and learned Gentleman finds fault with him for entering upon subjects of that description on the eve of an inquiry which ought to partake of a judicial character. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that great inconvenience arises from questions of this kind being sharply contested on the eve of inquiry. But we do not owe this inconvenience to the hon. Member for Montrose. We owe it, on the contrary, to my hon. Friend the Member for Galway, who, although he was perfectly aware the Committee was to be granted, has insisted upon entering into a controversy and impugning the whole conduct of the Government. Sensible of that inconvenience I will endeavour not to make addition to it, and in the few remarks which I shall have to make I shall not find it necessary to enter into those considerations which affect the peculiar position of this Company. I confess I should have been very glad if the hon. Member for Galway had abstained from an exciting discussion of the subject. But, as he has expressed his views very largely in connection with his Motion, it is necessary to enter into at least a qualified protest against certain of the principles he has laid down, to guard the House from assuming that, because the Government agree to the Motion, they accede to his general views more than is consistent with their duty. The hon. Member for Galway seems to me, without reference to this contract, or to Ireland, to have an idea of the nature of the packet service which is fundamentally erroneous. He has treated it throughout his speech as a matter of distribution of grace and favour; and, treating these subsidies as a matter of grace and favour, he is perfectly warranted in saying that grace and favour should be extended to one place in proportion as that grace and favour are extended to another place. But such a view is, in my opinion, perfectly destructive of public administration, and if adopted would open a fountain of political corruption so large and so foul that the corrupt transactions of former times would be eclipsed and forgotten. We have nothing to do with grace and favour in this matter, and if we had, most mischievous would be the results. Again, my hon. Friend complains of the severity of the conditions of the Galway contract compared with the lightness of the conditions of the Cunard contract; but he forgets that those who complain of the Galway contract as a serious error are, likewise, the persons who hold that the prolongation or renewal of the Cunard contract was an error not second in amount to the error committed in making the Galway contract. The general view on which I hope the Government always has and will proceed is that we are not to regard these contracts as favours conferred on one part of the country or the other, but that the whole question is what service is necessary for the country as a whole, and what is a just remuneration to be given for that service? I do not wish to exclude the peculiar considerations of equity which may bear upon this case, but I take the liberty of laying down that general principle in opposition to the general principle contended for by the hon. Gentleman. I do not think that in the particular demand which he makes he has been just to the Postmaster General. One, I think, was an extravagant demand. If I understood him right, he contended that it was unreasonable to subject the Adriatic to a survey; that she was a fine vessel, and had been employed in service of this description, and that the Postmaster General ought not to have subjected her to a survey. The House must recollect that since the time of the Adriatic performing service, from either some particular cause or general wear and tear, she may have ceased to be in a condition to perform service; and, if the Postmaster General had taken such a course as to exempt the Adriatic from survey, I think he would have deserved the reprobation of all who care for the public administration. Again, the hon. Gentleman complains that all concessions granted by the Postmaster General have been paid for. That is not the case, and the hon. and learned Gentleman is, also, in error in that respect. On the contrary, the Postmaster General has stated in a letter which has been laid on the table of the House, although it is not, unfortunately, in the hands of Members, that no penalty was imposed when the Parana was permitted to take the mails, and that no penalties were levied on the many occasions when the Company failed to provide a packet for the mail service at the appointed date. Again, with regard to the Parana being refused, the hon. Gentleman seems to think that there is no obligation on the Company to perform the voyage between Galway and Newfoundland in a period of six days, and that the whole question is, not the service between Galway and Newfoundland, but between Galway and Boston. On the contrary, the whole question is the service between Galway and Newfoundland. The best case for the Galway contract is that the service was appointed in order to take advantage of the position of Ireland to make the quickest possible passage between Great Britain and the nearest point having telegraphic communication with America—that is to say, between Galway and St. John's. The hon. Gentleman admits that the Parana is not fitted to perform the service between Galway and St. John's in six days ; the Postmaster General says the refusal of the Parana was fully warranted by her previous performances in the service of another Company, and by her being on one voyage, when permitted to be used by this Company, one day and five hours, and on another voyage one day and thirteen hours, behind time. The hon. Gentleman said, with considerable truth, that the important point in this case is the question which was raised by him, and stated strongly by the learned Gentleman opposite, with respect to the loss of time and the peculiar position of the country in the interval between the period when the contract was brought under the special notice of the House and the period when it received the final sanction of Parliament ; but I cannot say that the statement of the Directors or of the hon. Gentleman is fair or just. I understand the case which the Company now puts forward to be, that they would have been justified in asking for a postponement of the time for the commencement of the service, and I observe that there is a disposition to insinuate that such a request was actually made and refused. Now, as my hon. Friend the Member for Galway said very truly, this is the point of the whole case. My hon. Friend stated that the Company were told at the Treasury that they must commence the service at once, but, on my making a gesture of surprise, he added that they had no record in writing of that representation. I must say that if a representation of so vital a character was made to the Company it is very unfortunate that they did not obtain some evidence of it in writing. I do not, however, believe that any such representation was made by the Treasury. The Company alleges that it was urged on them that the commencement of the service at the time stipulated was an indispensable condition, and that any shortcoming in that respect would justify the opponents of the measure in calling upon the Government to terminate the contract. The Postmaster General has, however, explicitly denied that any pressure was employed to induce the Company to commence the service. If that fact can be substantiated, I admit that it is very material ; but it is entirely unknown to the Government, and no evidence of it has yet been produced. That will be one of the points, of course, into which the Committee will inquire. I cannot separate the conduct of my noble Friend the Postmaster General from that of the Government, because in the course he followed he was not without the concurrence of his colleagues. My hon. Friend the Member for Galway was entirely mistaken as to the circumstances connected with the proposed inquiry into the conduct of the Crimean war. I certainly do not for a moment question the right of the House, through their Committees, to examine, and if they see fit, to censure the conduct of the Postmaster General or the Government. What I maintain is that it has not been the intention of the Government to treat the Galway Company with anything except justice and liberality. What are the facts of the case ? The Company began the service without any request for a postponement beyond the time which had been fixed. They received, in the first place, the indulgence without the exaction of any penalty of sending inadequate instead of adequate vessels. Next they received the indulgence of substituting a monthly for a fortnightly service ; and when in October they requested the postponement of the service altogether, the fresh indulgence was granted to them of the postponement till March. It is true that the agreement under which that postponement was finally conceded was not signed till January, but that arose only from the unwillingness of the Company to accede to the conditions of the agreement. The intention of the Government has been that we should make every concession to the Company that could be fairly granted, that we should forget all that was faulty or questionable in the formation or original terms of the contract ; that we should take no cognizance of the Company having been unfit to enter into the undertaking, but look simply to this, whether the contract could be fulfilled ; but that if any question of default arose it should be ruled rather in favour of the Company than against it. We have carried out those intentions, and have given to the Galway Company, at least, as much indulgence as to any other, and perhaps even a little more. We put an end to the contract only because it was our conscientious belief that, after so much and such varied indulgence had been granted, any further relaxation would destroy our power and standing ground for the future, and would effectually prevent us from at any time enforcing the conditions of the contract at all. As my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose has said, I can conceive nothing more mischievous than a large extension of the practice of conceasions by the Government in regard to these contracts. Only consider the power which it puts into the hands of the Government of trafficking for political influence in particular districts of the kingdom, and you must see how intolerable the system would become if the Executive were to be allowed unlimited licence in casting away the guarantees by which the public value of these contracts is defended. I hope in the remarks I have made I have said nothing to exasperate or inflame the controversy. We are anxious that the question should be tried in a spirit of perfect impartiality and fairness, and any mixture of passion in our preliminary discussion would afford a bad precedent to the Committee. I trust that the Committee will approach the task in a calm and judicial manner; and, if they do, I am confident that the result will be satisfactory to the House and the country.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he rejoiced to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer lay down the proposition that mercantile arrangements should not be regarded as matters of grace and favour, but should stand upon their own merits, that the value of the services rendered should be fairly and fully weighed, and that ample recompense should be bestowed. He was also glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman admit that it was but just that the claims of Ireland to a share in the large subsidies granted to ports and packet services in other parts of the United Kingdom should be considered. It appeared to him that the hon. Member for Montrose had not responded to the appeal of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway to deal with the question in a spirit of fairness and impartiality. He acknowledged the right of any Member of the House to discuss the subject in all its bearings, but he complained that the hon. Member for Montrose had overstepped the limits of fair discussion when in the presence of those from among whom the members of the Committee would be chosen he stigmatized the Galway Company as a "commercial sham." That was a very ugly word to use, even when supported by the very best authority, and it was surely unjustifiable when founded upon no better evidence than that which the hon. Gentleman had produced. Indeed, the very facts cited by the hon. Member showed that there was more of reality than "sham" about the Company. They had not only conducted the service up to the present time, but they were prepared, under certain arrangements, to continue it. As to the Hibernia, he contended that the Government surveyor who passed that vessel, and not the Company, was responsible for the mishaps which had attended her voyage. He held also that the Company were not to blame for the fate of the Columbia. He did not deny that there had been defaults in some instances on the part of the Company, but he maintained that they had been treated with unnecessary harshness. It was true that on the 1st of June the Company were bound to have a certain number of ships ready, and that these were not ready by the time fixed. But why were they not ready? Doubt hung over the completion of the contract and its sanction by that House, and that doubt influenced considerably the transactions of the Company. Then it was said that ships had been allowed to go to sea which were not within the terms of the contract; but were not fines imposed in those cases? He quite allowed that payment should be made only for each voyage that was properly completed, but there should be something like fair and equitable dealing towards the Company. It was alleged that there was here a waste of public money, for which no equivalent had been received; but when hon. Gentlemen complained that money had been thrown away on the Company, they should recollect that scarcely two years ago they had voted £36,000 as a subsidy to the Red Sea Telegraph, along which a single message had never passed from end to end, and yet the present Government felt it necessary to come down to the House, and, on the ground of keeping the pledge which had been made to the Red Sea Telegraph Company, to saddle the country with the payment of £36,000 a year for fifty years to come. There were two ways of looking at the act of the Cabinet; the one in a commercial light, the other as affecting the country with which he was connected. Now, although the blow was struck at the Company on the ground that it was a mercantile association which had failed to carry out strictly the arrangements into which it had entered, yet it should have been remembered by the Government that that association represented the interests, the wishes, the hopes, and the desires of the people of Ireland; and when the contract was terminated there was not a hint, not a whisper, that any undertaking of a similar nature would be agreed to in respect of the country which had been so suddenly deprived of the advantage of that service, and which it had a right to expect it would continue to enjoy. He would ask the House to direct that an inquiry should take place into the precise cause which induced the Postmaster General to cancel the contract; because, on referring to the printed papers, he found that the Company's vessels had upon the whole kept their engagements more accurately than was generally believed. And he further hoped the Committee would inquire why the noble Lord was so anxious for fixing the month of March last for the renewal of the service which had been suspended by consent of both parties in November. Was it in consequence of certain events which had taken place in the States of North America and our American provinces? If so why was the noble Lord so eager to put an end to it in the month of May, when affairs in that part of the world were in at least as critical, and to us, as interesting a condition, and rapid communication of intelligence equally important? No doubt the Committee would think it their duty to investigate all matters in connection with the Government sending out despatches to Newfoundland, and to see that such an advantage to Ireland was not done away with upon a shadowy pretext of one or two ships being a few hours late at their destination. He could not believe that the proceedings of the Postmaster General were fair towards the mercantile classes in England or Ireland, and he would appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government to do justice to that part of the kingdom with which he (Lord Dunkellin) was more particularly associated. He could assure the noble Lord that the act of the Postmaster General was one which had spread dismay throughout all classes of the people of Ireland. The shareholders were threatened with serious loss, the merchants believed they would be deprived of the means of rapid communication with America, the supporters of the noble Lord's policy were grieved at the belief which this act occasioned—namely, that the present Ministry were unwilling to confer upon Ireland an advantage to which it was justly entitled. The people of Ireland had felt that a debt of gratitude was due to the Earl of Derby for granting the subsidy. The Government of that noble Earl felt, and felt rightly, that it was time something should be done for Ireland, with a view to increase her prosperity and to develop her wealth, and hence they granted that subsidy, which was a practical step, and one which could not fail to encourage her industry and promote her commerce. When upon the hustings at the last general election he had ventured to tell his constituents that the Liberal party, if in office, would show the same spirit of liberality and of justice towards Ireland. After two years, however, the subsidy had been withdrawn, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government would see how difficult it was, under such circumstances, to maintain the superiority of the Liberal party in Ireland. There was a period when the Liberal party and Ireland were identical in interest, and when a Whig Government enjoyed the support of all the Irish representatives; but now it was difficult for the present Government to calculate on the confidence of the Irish Members, and they were divided into numerous small parties, the cause being that the Government were careless about the interests of that country, and showed themselves little anxious to consult the wishes of her people. It was to be supposed that, before putting an end to this contract, the Cabinet would have gone for information as to the feelings of the Irish people on this matter to his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but, in answer to the statements of a deputation that waited on him, his noble Friend said he was debarred from entering into the question on the distinct ground that he had not been informed of the arguments on the other side. He had been astonished to hear the noble Lord the Member for the City of London state that he had the other night felt it his duty to allow no time to go by without explaining his conduct in consequence—of what? Of anything which had been said by any Member of that House?—no, in consequence of an anonymous article which had appeared in a newspaper. A great deal had been said about the connection of Government with an anonymous press; but that connection had never before appeared in such a strong light. It would have been better if the noble Lord, instead of paying deference to an article in a daily paper, had a little consulted the feelings of Gentlemen whose honour was as sensitive as that of Ministers of the Crown. The noble Lord had also referred to Father Daly as a gentleman apparently authorized to act on the part of the Irish Members; but when doing so he must have forgotten that both by Mr. Daly and by the noble Lord at the head of the Government it had been stated that the noble Lord had refused to look upon Mr. Daly as authorized or accredited by the Irish Members. He believed that the whole matter was now cleared up, and that it was thoroughly ascertained that there had been no bargain or promise whatever. For himself, he must say that until three days after the occurrence referred to he had not seen Father Daly for months. He was glad that the Committee had been granted, and he had every confidence that its decision would be one which would authorize the Government to entertain some scheme which would make Ireland a terminus of Transatlantic communication.

MR. HENNESSY said, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, confining himself to a collateral portion of the question, had not only defended the Government, but also the Irish Members, from what he called a gross calumny. He could not, however, agree with the noble Lord that if the Irish Members had upon a vote of confidence voted against the Government on account of their conduct with regard to the Galway contract they would have acted wrongly. There were many precedents for the adoption of such a course. The late Mr. Wilson, on a vote of confidence, spoke and voted against the Earl of Derby's Government because they had given the Galway contract to Ireland; and in discussing the Reform Bill of that Government the noble Lord at the head of the Government referred to their Indian policy, and made it one ground for his vote, while the noble Lord the Member for the City of London criticised the foreign policy of Lord Malmesbury. He had no doubt that many Irish Members who voted against the Government were influenced to only a small extent by their conduct with regard to this contract; but it was the last straw which broke the camel's back, and the whole policy of the Government with reference to Irish interests and the management of Irish business had been so unsatisfactory that Irish Members would neglect the interests of their constituents if they did not take the earliest opportunity of turning the Ministry out of office. There was not a single Irishman in the Cabinet, nor a single Irish officer upon the Treasury bench; and the Chief Secretary for Ireland was so totally ignorant of the country which he had to govern that all the Irish Bills had been referred to Select Committees. Under such circumstances it was not extraordinary that Irish Gentlemen should have made the question a question of confidence. He was present on a recent occasion when a Vote of £120,000 was taken for the Volunteers. Some exceptions were taken to that Vote, but not by Irish Members; yet Ireland had to contribute to that large sum, while it did not receive the slightest direct benefit from it, as the Government had refused to allow any Volunteer corps to be formed in Ireland. Considering how Irish measures were dealt with it was not surprising that many Irish Members should begin to think of transferring their allegiance to the party that knew something about Ireland, and whose policy to that country had been fair and generous. As long ago as 1847 that party proposed to assist the distress of Ireland by large advances of public money for the construction of railroads. A notion had got abroad, and prevailed to some extent in that House, that Members ought to vote on a question simply on its merits, without reference to the general conduct of the Government. He hoped that notion would not spread, particularly among the Irish Members. There had been an elaborate discussion of the difficulties of the Galway Company; the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) gave the House a history of all the accidents that had happened to its vessels; but he had had placed in his hands an interesting paper that might afford some information to the hon. Member for Montrose, and, perhaps, to the Government itself. It was a statement of the casualties of all the companies sending steamers across the Atlantic during the period covered by the Galway contract. It appeared from this statement that Allan's Liverpool and Montreal Canadian line, receiving a subsidy of £80,000 a year from the Canadian Government, lost the Canada in 1859; in the same year the Hungarian was lost, and 120 lives with her; in 1860, the Indian was lost, with 27 lives. Of that Company's ships three were lost, and one, the Hibernia, had to put back. Of the Galway Company not one vessel was actually lost, nor one life. The statement for the Cunard line was equally interesting. In the years 1859 and 1860 the Columbia was lost; the Australasian put back, nearly lost; the Arabia came into collision off Newfoundland with another ship of the same Company; the Arcadia struck on Cape Race; the Hibernia struck near Halifax; the Africa struck on Copeland Islands, near Belfast; the Cambria struck on Cape Codd, near Boston; the Niagara was ashore at the entrance of Cork Harbour, and not being able to proceed to Boston, was replaced by the America; the Canada struck on an iceberg, and put into Boston for repairs; the Persia was reported as having struck on an iceberg, and proceeding across the ocean with a quantity of water in her hold; the Arabia ran on shore on Seal Island. Of Inman's Liverpool and Philadelphia line, in 1859 the City of Glasgow was lost, and 420 persons perished; the City of Philadelphia was lost; the City of Edinburgh was nearly lost; the City of New York was lost; the City of Baltimore was nearly lost. It was fairly said that these were all accidents; might not the same be as fairly said of the casualties of the Galway line? When it had not actually lost one vessel nor a single life, was not the statement of the hon. Member for Montrose onesided? Was it a fair statement? But the opposition to the Galway line in that House had been, and still was, tremendous; it arose not only from national but commercial jealousy. It appeared that the average number of passengers per voyage carried across the Atlantic by Allan's line for one year was 84; by Inman's line, 116; while the average number taken by the Galway line was 404. That startled the other companies; they found that the Irish line was taking away a great portion of their passenger traffic; they, therefore, brought a pressure to bear on their friends in the House and in the press, and the opinion was spread that the Galway line was a failure, when in one important branch of their business it had beaten them hollow. The hon. Member for Montrose might be consistent in his opposition to the Galway Company; he said he was as much opposed to the Government aid given to the Cunard line. But last year a division was taken against the Cunard subsidy, and neither the hon. Member for Montrose nor the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), nor many other opponents of the Galway line, opposed the grant to the Cunard Company. The Irish Members who voted against the paper duty, on account of the conduct of the Government as to the Galway contract, had been charged by Lord Brougham with voting from corrupt motives. But some hon. Members sitting behind the Government, in the discussions on the paper duty, plainly avowed they had a large personal interest in the question. He did not say that hon. Members were wrong in defending their own interests;

but, while they found Members who supported the Government taking this course uncensured, those who defended a national interest were charged with corruption. Had he been a supporter of the Government he should have voted against it on the Budget, on account of its conduct with respect to the Galway contract; he believed those who voted against the Government on that occasion did their duty to their constituents. It was a mistake to imagine that the Galway contract was exclusively an Irish question. He did not advocate the continuance of the Galway postal service from an Irish point of view merely. When lately in France, several mercantile men, and one gentleman especially, who was at the head of the political economists, gave it as his opinion that the Galway line was of great importance to continental and to European interests generally. The real point—namely, that the present Government since their accession to office had done everything to thwart and hamper the efforts of the Directors—had been lost sight of in the speeches from the Treasury bench. As he had said it was made one of the grounds of the vote of want of confidence in the Earl of Derby's Ministry by the late Mr. John Wilson that they had entered into this contract; and it was well known that he and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer took office with a feeling of hostility to the Company. He alleged distinctly that the Government had practically broken the contract; they kept its existence in jeopardy for months, and after the Committee had reported they still declined to give the shareholders any idea what course they would pursue. In doing that they forgot their plain duty, which was to lay aside their prejudices against the Company, and what he was sorry to think prevailed still more strongly—their prejudices against Ireland. Their duty was, not to throw obstacles in the way of the Directors, but frankly to accept the legacy bequeathed by their predecessors, and to extend to the Company every fair consideration.

MR. CLAY said, that in the few words he had to address to the House he would not forget that they were not in Committee upstairs investigating the facts of the case. Some statements had been made by the hon. Member for Montrose which it would have been well had he abstained from making; but, as they had been made, it was only fair to the Company that they should not go forth to the public without qualification. The hon. Member had disposed in a summary way of the solvency of that unfortunate Company, and then had proceeded to damage the reputation of the builders of the ships by stating that the vessels were unsafe and unseaworthy, and that scarcely any one who set any value on his life would trust himself to one of them. He (Mr. Clay) could not speak of all the ships, but he could of two of them. All the vessels were built in accordance with Admiralty specifications, and in the cases of the Columbia and the Anglia the builders, considering those specifications did not provide for sufficient strength, asked for and obtained from the Company permission to give additional strength at a consequent additional expense. The Columbia, which had been so summarily disposed of by the hon. Member for Montrose, had first been knocked about by icebergs, which damaged her hull, and then she ran ashore on Boston Bar, which made a hole in her bottom. She, nevertheless, returned safely to Galway, and thence proceeded to Liverpool, a distance of 530 miles, in thirty-seven hours where she was surveyed. It was found that her bearings had never heated, that her engines were quite unstrained, and that the only damage she had received was external. Subsequently, by some carelessness—he trusted it was nothing worse—the vessel slipped off the blocks and fell on her bilge, knocking some dozen holes in her hull, but, notwithstanding that severe trial, she remained perfectly unstrained. The Anglia had not yet been to sea, but he had no doubt that when she did she would be found as strong as, and, he hoped, more lucky than, her sister ship. With respect to the subject before the House, he was glad the Government had consented to the Committee, because it would enable the House to decide between the conflicting statements that had been made. For himself, he would like to know whether Ireland had not been rather misled in believing that her prosperity was bound up in the continuance of this Galway contract. He did not mean thereby to say whether or not Galway should be the terminus of the great western communication, but whether that communication might not be better supplied by a more strong-backed company. He repeated his satisfaction that the Government had agreed to the Committee, and still more at the fair issue which had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the Company had received as much, or more indulgence than had been granted to other companies.

MR. BLAKE accepted the decision of Government to grant the Committee as some atonement for their unjust and ill-judged proceeding in annulling the contract. The hostility they appeared to feel towards the Atlantic Company was extraordinary. When they succeeded to office, the very first act of their new-born power was an effort to take away the subsidy, and ultimately, in what seemed to be their death struggle, they returned to the charge with greater animosity than ever. Their conduct towards Ireland in the matter was at once impolitic and unjust, and the Irish people could only regard it as emanating from a desire to crush an enterprise which promised to be productive of great future advantage to the country. They had it, however, still in their power to remove that impression, and he trusted they would do so. As nearly every one of the statements of the hon. Member for Montrose would be proved to be utterly groundless when the matter came before the Committee, he would not trespass on the House by dwelling on them further than to refute some assertions which would not come within the province of the Committee to enquire particularly into, and which, if left uncontradicted, might do serious injury to the undertaking. The hon. Member had spoken of the directory as if it had remained unchanged; that they were not in a position to carry on the undertaking, even if an extension of time were granted, and that they had only one ship fit for the service. As to the former Directors, he was not one of those who joined in unmeasured condemnation of them. They had, probably acting from the best of motives, committed some mistakes, but they had great difficulties to contend against, and deserved praise for the manner in which they had surmounted them; but if their continuance in office was an objection, it could no longer be urged, as, with only one exception, the entire of the old Board had been replaced, and the constitution of the new one was such as to give the utmost confidence. The chairman occupied a foremost place amongst the great merchants of the empire. He was a man of the highest character for ability and integrity, and in addition to other very extensive mercantile avocations, owned more steamboats than any other man alive; and though he took up the Atlantic Company more for the patriotic motive of preserving the subsidy for the benefit of the country than for any object of personal gain, still he would not be likely to connect himself with anything which he did not think would prove a success ; and his taking the chairmanship of the company proved he thought so, and, from his superior sagacity, was calculated to inspire others with the same feeling. The vice-chairman, a Member of the House of Commons, belonged to one of the most extensive monetary firms in England, and another of the directors was one of the chief steamboat proprietors in London ; indeed, every one of them were men of position, character, and means, and nearly all had joined the Board within a short time, which proved that when things were supposed to look most serious for the concern, they believed it could be worked up again. Now, as to their ships, they had in the first place the Adriatic, the finest ocean steamer in the world—next to the Great Eastern. The Anglia, another splendid boat, was just launched. These two could at once go on with the service ; and within a very short time the Hibernia and Columbia could take their turn. And as to the Company not being able to perform the contract, if the Government had not taken an advantage of them, they would have done so ; and if they only got another chance and fair play, he had no doubt everything would go on well. The hon. Member for Hull had expressed surprise that Ireland should attach so much importance to the retention of so small a sum as £72,000, and asked if the Irish people considered the loss or gain of the subsidy was wound up with their prosperity. He was sorry and ashamed to tell him that it was a matter of importance to the country to preserve that paltry sum to promote an undertaking which they believed would tend to their commercial advantage ; and it was the only return they unitedly asked for out of the large sum they contributed to the British Exchequer ; for since the unfortunate hour they had given up legislating for themselves, it was the only money given to promote Irish enterprise. He did not join with the Members who made such a tremendous complaint against Government, for having so little of the Irish element on the Treasury benches, as he never saw any benefit result to the country when they got there ; and he could assure the Government that the Irish people would be better pleased to have one good measure passed for the country—like the granting of the Galway subsidy—than if the whole Treasury bench was occupied by Irish Members. And if the latter thought the fact of having Irishmen in the administration was of such great importance, they ought to be satisfied that the want of quantity was made up by the quality, as he believed, if it was any benefit to them, they might claim the noble Lord at the head of the Cabinet as a countryman. He did not know whether the Premier had drawn his first breath in Ireland ; but from the unmistakeable signs he sometimes showed of having Irish propensities, he would venture to say, if he might be excused the bull, that if he was not born in Ireland he was born out of his native land. An hon. Member who had just sat down was, he thought, rather too severe on the Chief Secretary. He was not a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman's Government, and, therefore, had no object, beyond a sense of justice, in saying what he was about to do. He believed there were few who took a more active part in Irish matters than he did, or troubled the Chief Secretary more frequently on such subjects, and he must say that he always found him most courteous—willing to listen to his suggestions, and anxious to do what he thought right, and singularly well informed about Ireland. So far from its being a reproach to the right hon. Gentleman for being willing to leave matters to Select Committees, he thought it reflected credit on him, as it showed a desire not to force his views on the House, but to have them discussed first and reported on by a Committee of Irish Members taken from both sides of the House. In conclusion, he again expressed his satisfaction at the wise course the Government adopted regarding the Committee. He had every confidence the latter would report in favour of some little indulgence to the Company, in the way of an extension of time, to which, he trusted, Government would unhesitatingly consent ; and the result would be to secure to the kingdom great postal convenience, place the Company in a more favourable position than it had stood before, and enable Ireland to develop some of the advantages that ought to result from her geographical position.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he did not agree with those hon. Members who had so lavishly bestowed their thanks on Her Majesty's Government for acceding to the appointment of a Committee. He believed that when the subject was first broached they were prepared to refuse a Committee; but since that time they had observed the temper of the House, and they were not able to refuse it. He hoped Members of the Committee would not think that they were merely trying the issue suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, whether the Postmaster General had treated the company with less or more favour than was usual. There was a grave charge made against Her Majesty's Government, which was that they had been hostile to the Company from the first, that they had given all the underhand opposition in their power to prevent its being carried on satisfactorily for the purpose of discrediting the Government by whom the subsidy was granted; and it was also charged that, in that disposition, the Government had been most ably supported by the Postmaster General, whoever he might be. No matter whether the Postmaster was changed or not, the underlings carried out the wish of Her Majesty's Government in endeavouring to support the assertion that this subsidy was a job on the part of the Government of the Earl of Derby. The present Government had to explain why the subsidy had been sanctioned by Parliament, they had deprived the Company of the fourteen months given to them by the contract for preparing their ships, why they had in an arbitrary and illegal manner taken from them the colonial subsidy of £12,000 a year; and, also, to account for the reasons which induced their own officers to approve of vessels they now allege not to be of sufficient strength for transatlantic voyages, and for which the Company was forced, under the sanction and approval of the Government surveyor, to pay the contractors for. These were matters to which the Committee would have to give its attention, with a view of seeing whether there were facts to sustain those charges. In reference to a question put by him to the Chancellor of the Exchequer at an earlier period of the evening, he might mention that he was in possession of the fact that a gentleman, who was considered the most eminent counsel in Europe on contracts, had given it as his opinion that no such power as that of annulling the contract in the manner he had done was vested in the Postmaster General, and that the act was wholly and totally illegal.

LORD NAAS said, that before the discussion closed, he was anxious of saying a few words on the question. He took the credit—if credit it were—of being the first person who ever wrote a letter to any one connected with the Executive on this subject of transatlantic communication. So long ago as the month of September, 1858, he brought it under the notice of the Government, and stated his opinion that it was a scheme which ought to be supported in every possible way. He had listened with great pain to some of the proceedings of that evening. He was aware of the very great difficulties under which the Company, even from the commencement, had laboured—that they had encountered obstacles such as, perhaps, had never been placed in the way of any other company. When the intention of the Earl of Derby's Government became known, and before the contract was declared, an organized opposition was given to the Company from various quarters, and that opposition had never ceased its operations from that time to that moment. Indeed, it had been visible that night in the House, and he feared that it was not intended that it should cease if the final destruction of the scheme could be accomplished. Nobody could doubt that the establishment of this service had created a greater amount of interest in Ireland than anything had done for a great number of years; at the same time it was a mistake to suppose that the people of Ireland looked upon the establishment of this transatlantic communication as a panacea for all their ills. What they thought was, that the scheme gave practical effect, for the first time, to what they had for many years considered to be one of the great advantages of the geographical position of Ireland. There could be no doubt whatever of the Imperial advantages of this undertaking. It had been stated that evening that no public advantage had as yet been derived from it. That was an unfair statement, because, from circumstances to which he should allude, the Company had never been in a position to realize those objects for which they were established. But, leaving Irish interests out of sight, what advantages did the British public enjoy from a mail contract with America via Galway? The American mail via Liverpool left London at nine o'clock in the evening—generally on a Saturday. The average time of starting from Liverpool was one o'clock the next day. The American mail via Galway left London at the same hour; and the steamer containing the letters would be steaming down Galway Bay at the same time as that at which the mail would be leaving the Mersey; thus the mail by Galway would have about thirty hours' start of the other. That was no mean advantage. But the advantage of the Galway route, in respect to telegraphic communication, could not be overrated. If the Company were allowed to carry on the service, which he believed they were prepared to do in a very short time, they would have again of eight hours in the transmission of a telegram and the receipt of its answer. The telegrams would be sent to St. John's to meet the steamer there, and four days would be saved on the passage home, and, of course, four days more in answering the message. That was an advantage of the greatest possible importance. In discussing the subject it should not be treated altogether as an Irish one. It was said that the contract was originally granted for Irish purposes and for Irish purposes alone. It was no such thing. The benefits offered to the public by this line were Imperial as well as Irish. The question could not be too often asked—What was the real reason why the Company had, to a certain extent, failed to meet their engagements? They were at first placed in a position that hardly any company were ever placed in before. The payment of their contract was distinctly, from the first, made subject to Parliamentary revision, and advantage was immediately taken of that circumstance by the opponents of the scheme. It was said that their contract was dependent on the vote of Parliament, and that the power of Parliament was likely to be exercised against them when the matter came on for discussion. That commenced an agitation, which went on for a considerable period, and led to the appointment of a Committee of that House. And here he must say it was a great pity that at the time the question was first brought before the public the present Government did not take up a decided position, and state whether they meant to stand by the contract or not. Such a course would have been better not only for the Company, but for the public generally and the particular interests in Ireland that were concerned in the matter. Instead of that, however, the Government eagerly accepted the proposal for a Select Committee, the effect of which was to hang up the question for many months, and to paralyze in a great measure the action of the Directors in appealing to the shareholders or the public to support their enterprise. Consequently, from July, 1859, to August, 1860, the business was practically, for all commercial purposes, in abeyance, and the contract ought in reality to be dated, not from April, 1859, but from August, 1860, the time when the decision of the House was finally arrived at, and when, therefore, the Directors were able to say that the question being settled they intended to go on. The Company, being under strict conditions, could not have made such a proposal to the Government, lest advantage of it might have been taken to terminate their contract altogether; but that contract could, in justice, be regarded as unfulfilled only since August, 1860. The original term given for its completion was fourteen months; and if the Government had been determined to deal fairly by the Company they should have taken all the circumstances into consideration, and allowed them fourteen months from August last. It was true that indulgences had, to a certain extent, been granted to the Company, but they were not greater than had been repeatedly granted to other companies in similar cases. There was the instance of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, now so admirably performing the service to the West Indies, for which it received a very large yearly subsidy. When that Company was established in 1840, nearly two years was given them to commence their service. At the conclusion of that period they went to the Government and said they were unable to carry on their contract, and their allowance was raised from 7*s.* to 9*s.* 10*d.* per mile, as well as other indulgences extended to them. The contract was not put up to public competition, but given to a Company which the Government thought willing and equal to carry a great project into effect. The consequence was that a valuable and important service had been created, which, whatever opinions might be entertained as to the amount of the subsidy paid for it, was indispensable to the trade and commerce of the country. Now, the Government had taken a most extraordinary course, even within the last few days, with regard to the question before the House. They had in a sudden and very harsh manner terminated the Galway contract, and yet they had announced their intention to grant a Committee to inquire into the reasons that had induced them to do so. The Prime Minister the other night told them that the decision come to was the decision, not of the Postmaster General alone, but of the Cabinet. If that were so, why did the Government now propose that a question which had been solemnly settled by the whole Cabinet should be re-opened by a Select Committee? Of course those who supported the Galway line could not object to the Committee; but for the Government to agree to it was a clear admission that they had doubts as to the correctness of their decision, and that it had been arrived at without due consideration. Was it possible that a Committee of that House could afford the Government any information of which they were not in full possession when they came to their late determination? He presumed that the Committee's principal duty would be to hear from the Government their defence of the step they had taken; but it would surely be fairer and more creditable if that defence were made in the House, and if they were prepared to stand by their own decision. He wished to know, however, whether the Government meant to hold themselves bound by the judgment of the Committee? If not, the inquiry would come to nothing. In the other alternative, they would take a course never followed by any previous Government. Indeed, the entire proceedings connected with that contract were from beginning to end without Parliamentary precedent. A very general impression prevailed that the present Government had never had any fixed determination on that question, but had from the outset played fast and loose with it, avoiding as much as possible to come to any decision on any single point with reference to it, and desiring to throw the responsibility of continuing or putting an end to the contract on other shoulders than their own. The position in which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had been placed in this matter struck him as very peculiar. The contract was terminated, he thought, on the 15th of May, and on the 24th of May a deputation waited on the Viceroy of Ireland to elicit some expression of his opinion on the subject. Very strong statements were made to his Excellency as to the undesirableness of withdrawing the contract, and the Earl of Carlisle's answer to the deputation was very remarkable. His Excellency said he should most sincerely regret the final disappointment of the hopes which had given birth to that contract, and he afterwards went on to mention that he had not been made acquainted, accurately or in detail, with the arguments advanced on the other side of the question. From that it was plain that the Earl of Carlisle was not made aware of the considerations which had actuated the Government in their decision, and that, moreover, he was no participator whatever in that decision. Now, it was generally supposed that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was a Minister of first-rate importance, responsible to his Sovereign and the public for all matters connected with the interests of the country committed to his charge, and that, for all purposes of administration, he ought to be regarded more in the light of a Secretary of State than any other functionary of the Government on this side of the water. It was strange that on a question so deeply affecting the people of Ireland, the head of the Irish department of the Government should have been kept in total ignorance as to what the decision of the Government was. That was calculated to raise in many minds a grave question as to the necessity of such a functionary as the Lord Lieutenant. People would ask, what was the use of having a Lord Lieutenant in Ireland at all if this was the course taken with regard to him by the Government? He was one of those who had always thought that, whatever objections might be stated to the office of Lord Lieutenant, the system of vicerealty had, on the whole, worked smoothly and well. More than that; he thought it was grateful to the feelings of the Irish people, as they looked to the Lord Lieutenant as a direct representative of their Sovereign, and he did not think that any change in the system should be rashly made; but if such a course of proceeding as the Government had followed in that instance went on, the question, he feared, would assume another form. One of the arguments in favour of the Lord Lieutenancy was, that a nobleman of high position, and who was in close communication with the Government, was led to reside constantly in the country, and he was bound to say that he thought the noble Lord who now held that distinguished office had shown great capacity, great knowledge, and extended experience of the country. The noble Lord had been connected officially with Ireland for twelve or fourteen years, and he could not conceive that one who had been so long in the country could be without knowledge and experience of the feelings of the people. He was not very sanguine as to the results of the appointment of the Committee, but whether it reported in favour of the Galway contract or not, no one who looked at the map could doubt that, one day or other, the people of this country would insist upon some port in Ireland being made the medium of communication with America, and that the Government had acted unwisely in carrying on an unremitting hostility to a scheme that would be beneficial, not to Ireland only, but to the commerce of the whole country.

MR. CARDWELL: I rise to correct a misunderstanding into which my noble Friend who has just spoken has fallen with regard to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. My noble Friend read correctly the words employed by the Lord Lieutenant, but those words by no means bear out the statement that the conclusion at which the Government had arrived on this question was not made known to him. They only state that the grounds on which the department of the Government intrusted with this matter, and afterwards the Government itself, had come to the decision at which they arrived, were not communicated in detail to my noble Friend, and that he was not invited to express his opinion upon it. I have no objection to say that it was not intended such should be the case—it was not intended that my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant should be a party to the decision of the Government. My noble Friend opposite considered that this was not a departmental question, that it was altogether an Imperial question, and not one of a purely Irish character. I concur in all that fell from my noble Friend on this subject. This was an Imperial question, that fell to be decided by the Imperial Government. It was not whether it was due to the geographical position of Ireland that a port of Ireland should be made the port of communication with America. It was not whether the interests of Ireland required that this should be the case. It was not whether the expectations of the Irish people had been or had not been justly raised with regard to such a scheme. It was not even whether the interests of Ireland or of the United Kingdom were to be considered with reference to the establishment of postal communication. But the question was whether the department concerned, and the collective Government of the Queen were not called upon by a regard to their duty, to the House, and the country to terminate the contract with this particular Company? That is the question which it was the duty of the department concerned, and of the Government here to act upon on their own responsibility, and they were not entitled to call upon my noble Friend to share a responsibility which did not belong to him. My noble Friend was not kept in ignorance of what did take place, only the grounds on which the contract was terminated were not communicated to him. I rejoice that this Committee is to be appointed; and if the Report of that Committee and the decision of the Government should result in establishing a communication with America through Ireland, no one will rejoice more heartily than myself.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose to protest against the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It showed that with all his high character he was utterly ignorant of the feelings of the people of Ireland. He thought the representatives of Ireland were deeply indebted to the hon. Member for Galway for the able manner in which he had brought forward this question. It had required all the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to pervert his statement. To say, as the right hon. Gentleman had done, that he should have been content with the appointment of the Committee, without entering upon an explanation of his views, was utterly absurd. What was wanted was that the Committee should enter on the inquiry in the spirit of justice and with a full knowledge of what Ireland demanded; and how could that be gained unless the subject were fully and fairly brought before the House? It was necessary, too, to expose the hostility with which the hon. Member for Montrose and others had, from the beginning, pursued the Company. He did not stand up to support the old Company or its antecedents; but the hon. Member for Montrose had, in some way that he had not thought fit to explain, worked out a totally false statement of the accounts of the Company. The Company had been called a "commercial sham;" but such an epithet not only inflicted an injustice upon the Company, but prejudged that impartial examination of the case which the House had a right to expect of the Committee. He would tell the House that the Company was composed of bona fide shareholders, containing many of the country gentlemen and members of the mercantile community of Ireland, and that it was presided over by a gentleman of great energy, who might count his capital by millions, and who would assuredly carry out whatever he undertook if he could only get fair play. Had Irishmen any reason to be ashamed of the manner in which mercantile affairs were managed in that country? When they heard every day of companies bursting and banks breaking on this side the water, Irishmen could refer with pride to the management of banks, railways, and other undertakings in their own country. Nothing but failure could have been anticipated by the Galway Company from the hostility shown to it. From the beginning threats were held out that the contract would be withdrawn, so that people were afraid to invest their money in the undertaking. It was said by hon. Members on the other side that it was not a political question; yet the strongest political spirit had been shown in discussing this contract. What political object could the Government of the Earl of Derby have proposed to attain by the contract? The majority of Irish Members were adverse to that Government. It was brought on before an election was anticipated. It was not said either at that time or during the election that it was a party job, and it was only when the late Government was thrown out that obloquy was heaped upon them for having granted this contract. The name of Father Daly had been brought into these discussions, and it was said that he had no right to interfere, and was not the representative of Irish interests. But if there were a matter on which a priest might fairly exercise his zeal and influence it was in a matter affecting the moral, social, and physical prosperity of his flock. And, although the noble Viscount at the head of the Government with his incorrigible jollity, had made a joke about his interview with Father Daly, yet he believed that what had occurred at that interview and since had had great weight with the Government in granting the Committee. He only regretted that the hon. Member who had moved for this Committee had restricted the nature of the inquiry. He wished he had brought it on as a substantive Motion, not only for an inquiry into the circumstances under which the contract had been annulled, but declaring that the subsidy ought to be continued until the issue of the inquiry became known. He could not help thinking that the conduct of the Government had been most cruel and unthinking in terminating the contract in so speedy and abrupt a manner, although he was not prepared to defend the manner in which it had been carried out. He denied the assertion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory)

had advocated the continuance of the contract as matter of charity. He felt that he stood in a peculiar condition for the advocacy of the question. He, at least, had no policy to change, and no opinion to alter. His vote on a late occasion would have been the same whether the subsidy were granted or withdrawn. Representing, as he (Colonel Dickson) did, a county containing, according to the Report of the Commissioners, one of the best harbours in the kingdom, he might be supposed to feel some jealousy that Galway had stepped in. No doubt, he should have preferred that Limerick should be selected as the port of departure, but Galway had won the fight, and ought to receive that hearty support to which her exertions entitled her. It was said that upon general principles no subsidy ought to be given to ocean mail steamers. The Government, however, owed some reparation to Ireland for long years of neglect and illtreatment. For these reasons, instead of looking on the subsidy as charity, he regarded it as matter of Imperial policy that it should be granted.

MR. DUNLOP said, that he wished to say a few words, as it had been stated that the opposition to the Galway contract originated first in Liverpool, and then proceeded from Scotland, and particularly from the hon. Member for Montrose and himself, and that it was founded in feelings of local rivalry. Having been Chairman of the Galway Contract Committee, he begged to say that there was not the slightest foundation for this charge of rivalry, as far as he was concerned. The town which he had the honour to represent (Greenock) had no rivalry with Galway. Their only mail packet communication was with Belfast, and it was of a description for which the Irish would never dream of contending, for the service was exceedingly well performed, and the subsidy was nil. They carried the mails without any compensation whatever, for the sake of the collateral advantage they derived from the use of the name "Mail Packets," and from the regularity of service which this imposed. As for his connection with the subsidy, the first time he had anything to do with it was when he was appointed a member of the Packet Service Contract Committee; and subsequently, on Mr. Cobden going to France, he was appointed chairman. In that capacity, though undoubtedly he had a strong opinion on the subject, he could appeal to all the members, and to the noble Lord (Lord Naas) opposite himself, if he had not conducted the proceedings with perfect fairness and impartiality. He thought the Irish Members scarcely did justice to the Government in this matter ; for as chairman of the Committee he had prepared a Report concluding with a recommendation that the money should not be voted by the House, but that conclusion was negatived on a counter Motion made by the Secretary of the Treasury representing the Government. And he ventured to think that if the Government had then allowed the Committee to come to the conclusion which, but for their interposition in favour of the contract, the Committee would have adopted, they would not only have acted more in accordance with what the public service required, but would also have escaped the odium and the risks to which they had recently been exposed, by the necessity thereby imposed on them of doing, by their own act, what, but for them, would have been effected by the act of the Committee. He would not now go into the question of the Galway contract ; but he must say that the noble Lord opposite had confounded together two distinct questions. The propriety of maintaining the station of Galway was quite a separate question from the maintenance of this Company, which had made so many failures. With respect to the effect which the decision of the Government might have upon the political support they received, he trusted that the Government would never condescend to dispose of a question of this kind upon such a consideration, but would rather regard the merits of the case and determine whether or not the contract had been fulfilled.

MR. ENNIS said, that he was in no degree surprised at the decision come to by the Government with reference to the motion so ably and, withal, so temperately submitted to the House by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway ; and that, though that decision was quite in keeping with what he expected from the judgment, good feeling, and sense of what was right of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he begged, nevertheless, to tender his acknowledgments for the concession made to Irish interests in the matter, because it vindicated the course he (Mr. Ennis) had pursued on a recent occasion when he supported the financial propositions of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, in so much, proclaimed the confidence he reposed in the Government of the noble Lord. Indeed, if there were any difference of opinion between him (Mr. Ennis) and his noble friend, it consisted in this, that while the hon. Member was content to resort to the slow process of a Committee to establish the rights of the Galway Company, he would have preferred to take the sense of the House regarding it by a substantive Motion. He was glad, however, to understand that the noble Lord the member for Galway felt satisfied with the mode in which the Committee would discharge the duty about to be confided to them, and that he would abide by that decision. He (Mr. Ennis) had some claim to be allowed to address the House on this subject. The idea of a western port for establishing steam communication with America was not a new one with him. It is several years since, in conjunction with his colleagues, the Directors of the Midland Railway Company of Ireland, he had encouraged the experiment, and although unfortunately the experiment was not crowned with the success it deserved, because perhaps of their inexperience, and the consequent inadequacy of the appliances used on the occasion ; still they remain always attentive to every opportunity that might present itself to admit of a more satisfactory repetition of the attempt. They asked for no subsidy, they put their shoulders to the wheel, relying on the greatness of the object that was to be achieved, and anticipating the advantages that would accrue from it to their own special enterprise and to the country. He was in the recollection of his hon. Friend opposite, the colleague of the noble Lord, in the representation of Galway ; if he (Mr. Ennis) did not at once respond to his invitation for assistance when it was proposed to place the Indian Empire, a steamship of great power on the station, in the view of bridging, so to say, the Atlantic within a short and specified time, and although the voyage was not accomplished within the period contemplated by the arrangement, still the Midland Company conceived that the subsidy had been fairly and equitably earned, and they paid it over accordingly. He was asked by his hon. Friend below him, parenthetically he supposed, what was the amount so paid, as if the animus of the company were to be estimated by the amount of the contribution, but he had no difficulty in stating the amount ; he had done so on a public occasion in Dublin, and there was no secret about it—the sum was £2,000, but it put the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway in Motion, and to it may fairly be attributed the establishment of the company whose misfortunes are the subject of discussion to-night. He would naturally be asked what was there in this that affected the question before the House? He would tell the House. He would put it to the Government whether a private company, having behaved with so much liberality, it became it to treat the Transatlantic Company with so much rigour? The former proceeded upon the principle that they best consulted the interest of their constituents in the Midland Company, by lending their aid to opening out a speedy communication with America, while they were driving a hard bargain where Imperial interests were at stake. He thought that some of the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose were inopportune. He had referred, for instance, to the case of the Hibernia, and stated that she was so ill-built as to become unseaworthy, and easily yielded to the force of a gale of wind which other ships sailing over the same waters felt no inconvenience from. Now, he did not know how that might be, but the law of storms, he might assure the hon. Member, was a most capricious one; there might be a hurricane in one latitude, with perfect calm, without a circle of 100 miles, as his own experience told him was not uncommonly the case; but it did so happen that this ship, so depreciated and despised by the hon. Member, was built upon lines suggested and approved of by the Admiralty, while her capacity and engine power were far in excess of the requirements of the contract. But on her voyage from Southampton to Galway she encountered the storm which swept over Ireland on the 18th and 19th of March, and which will long be remembered as that during which the lamented Captain Boyd, of the Ajax, with several of his crew, lost their lives in the sublime attempt to rescue the sinking crew of a battered ship from death. The Hibernia met with the full force of that gale, and became disabled, and it is to this point in the Company's history that he would direct the attention of the House. Now, there was little use in adverting to antecedent circumstances. There might have been much to forgive and forget both by the contractors and the Post Office; but it appeared to him that whatever might have taken place prior to March last—the 26th—it was from that hour that the Company might date the harshness, and, he would say, the positive injustice with which they had been treated. Well, the Hibernia not being in a fit state to send across the Atlantic, the company offered the Parana in substitution for the service. Her size, engine-power, and approved character as an oceanic steamer fully qualified her for the Post Office; but she was rejected. Why? Because, indeed, the Admiralty surveyors apprehended—were of opinion in the Report—that her speed would be inadequate to the performance of the voyage within the contract time. But this was, after all, a fact to be ascertained. So many revolutions of the engine formed no part of the contract. In fact, it remained only for the Postmaster General to test the capabilities of the ship as to speed, by her performance in the postal service, and inflict his pains and penalties as the result might determine. He (Mr. Ennis) did not find that a regulated rate of speed was inserted in the bond, and however the Post Office authorities might insist upon their pound of flesh, it was nowhere stipulated that they should take one jot of blood. Here, if he were correctly informed, was a great legal wrong done to the Company, and here also was a case where it ought to be shown that there is a power in this country superior to the mistakes or prejudices of office, and that it was the law. He supposed, however, that the Committee about to be appointed would take cognizance of all these things. In that belief he felt that it would be wrong to anticipate any result. It would be an offence to the House to do so. Some hon. Members had hinted difficulties as to the character of the Committee that might be appointed. He felt none on the subject, and would gladly confide the dearest interests he possessed to the arbitrement of a Committee selected by the House of Commons.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, that if the Government had done nothing else, they had, at all events, performed the feat of uniting all the Irish Members in advocating a common object. What they, as well as the Irish people whose interests they represented, complained of was not merely that the Galway contract had been rescinded, but that from the very commencement the Company had not received fair play. In support of that statement he might mention the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 5th of July, 1859, said, in reply to the hon. Member for Montrose, that the Government had not arrived at any conclusion as to whether the contract should or should not, in the interests of the public, be cancelled. He might also observe that the Postmaster General had a few evenings ago declared his chief objection to the contract to be that it had been, contrary to universal practice, granted without competition—a question into which he had no right to enter, inasmuch as it once having been sanctioned by the House of Commons he was bound to deal with it as a thing accomplished. The Government of the Earl of Derby, having found the Company established, had, in his opinion, very naturally given them a subsidy which, it should be borne in mind, was hedged round by every precaution that could be taken in the interest of the public. It would be too hard, he might add, if while Ireland was called upon to pay her full share of taxation she were not to receive her due proportion of the aid which was furnished from the national Exchequer. He thought the course of the Postmaster General was open to the gravest objection. It was not fair in him to insist on the mails being sent to St. John's when such was not the original understanding of the Admiralty. It was better that the Government should change ten times than that the just expectations of the people of Ireland should be disappointed.

Mr. MAGUIRE could not join with the hon. Member for Athlone in thanking the Government for doing that which they had been compelled to do. He could give them no thanks whatever, and he believed that if he were to do so they would consider him a very silly fellow. Everybody knew that the Government had been compelled to eat the leek, and that it was only when they ascertained that the Irish Members would vote against them to a man, and that the same course would be taken by many of their ordinary supporters, that they had consented to the appointment of a Committee. But his chief object in rising was to bear witness to the fact that the entire people of Ireland felt a deep interest in the Galway scheme. Even the inhabitants of Cork, who thought they possessed the best harbour in the United Kingdom, were indignant at the conduct of the Government with respect to the Galway contract. He did not mean to assert that the interests of Ireland depended upon the success of the Galway Company, but he knew that one successful enterprise led to another; he knew that Irishmen were able to conduct their own business; and in the fact that shares to the amount of about £500,000 had been taken in the Galway Company by persons not belonging exclusively to the West of Ireland, not for the purpose of making money, but to develop the resources of the country, he recognized a proof that the project had been received with universal approval, and that it was not that sham which it had been represented to be by the Scotch Radicals. Other companies had partially failed as well as the Galway Company. Sir Samuel Cunard himself was at one time, he believed, obliged to compound, and it was only by associating with other persons that he was ultimately enabled to achieve success. He had no hesitation in saying that it was the doubt and uncertainty created by the vacillation of the Government, and especially by the hostility of the Scotch Members, which paralyzed the Galway Company. The hon. Member for Montrose had all along exhibited a strong feeling of partisanship, and it was on that account, and because they believed his presence in the Committee would taint the whole inquiry, that a large portion of the Irish Members opposed his nomination two years ago. It was to be hoped that none of the Scotch Radical element would be found in the Committee about to be appointed. He objected altogether to the puritanical set on the back Ministerial benches. Let there be five honest John Bulls, fair and impartial English Gentlemen; let this matter be submitted to them, and the people of Ireland would be satisfied with their decision; but for goodness sake let them have no Scotch Radicals on the Committee. Both on this and on any other question the Scotch Radicals did all they could against Ireland. They laid the heaviest taxation upon her, they grudged her every single farthing that was proposed for her benefit, and whenever anything was to be done for her benefit they objected to it. It was said that the hon. Member for Montrose had some special friendship or association with those who were connected with the particular line which had felt rather heavily the rivalry and the probable success of the Galway Company. That might be true or false, but he believed the hon. Member had not only that commercial bias which arose from such sympathies, but a strong national antipathy to the people of Ireland. As a Scotch Radical he believed he had, honestly. There were many Scotch Gentlemen in that House who were at all times disposed to treat Ireland with fairness, but the people of Ireland wished to have nothing to do with the hon. Member for Montrose or the hon. Member for Greenock. Into the merits of the case he did not intend to enter; these would be inquired into by the Committee; this only he would say, that nothing could be more unfair than for one party or another to deal with such a matter with a political bias. He believed that Lord Derby had from the best possible motives given this boon to Ireland, and on right and proper grounds. He did not care from what side benefits came to Ireland, he welcomed them with pleasure and gratitude; but Ireland had suffered so much from both sides, that both parties ought to emulate each other in making up for the past misgovernment of the country. One word as to Mr. Daly. Father Daly asked him to support the Galway contract. He said he had always done so, and always would; but he could not vote against the Government on the particular question then about to be decided. He told him if Mr. Daly had a mitre on his head it could have no influence on him on that question. His mind had been long made up on it. If he could have voted against the Government he would have done so; but he had committed himself body and soul on the paper question; over and over again he had voted for the repeal of the Excise duty; and he believed he was perfectly right in the course he took; therefore, he could not vote against the Government. He hoped he had some character for consistency in that House, and he could not vote against the opinions he had expressed. He, therefore, refrained from voting. He thought that was a very fair course. A strong pressure was put on him to vote against the Government. He would not, but he deeply regretted that he had so committed himself on the paper question as not to have it in his power to express his feelings as an Irishman against the Government for doing what he considered a deep and grievous wrong to the interests of his country. He would advise the Government, if they really wished to conciliate the people of Ireland, to do no further act of hostility against them in this matter, by some of their ready friends or by their unscrupulous underlings. Let them act fairly and manfully, and do right for once.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I am neither a Scotch Radical, nor a shareholder in the Galway Company, nor committed body and soul, I should feel bound to vote in support of the Motion. The hon. Member for Galway, in bringing forward this question, has, I think, entitled himself not only to the thanks of Great Britain in general but of Ireland in particular for the very lucid statement he has made, and for some of the declarations it has been the means of eliciting, not from members of the Government, but from this House of Parliament. It was my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose who said that the surveyors at Liverpool who surveyed the Hibernia passed an opinion that she showed symptoms of weakness. I think if those surveyors had inspected Her Majesty's Government on this question, they would also have been obliged to pronounce an opinion that in granting this Committee so readily the Government have shown symptoms of weakness; at any rate, that their bottom required some strengthening, and that, like that unfortunate ship the Hibernia, they were now rather on their beam ends. I complain of the conduct of the Irish Government on this matter. I keep clear of the particular Company. I take the bold line of it being necessary to cherish and nourish Ireland in some way; but I say the Government have shown symptoms of weakness on this principle. Either they ought not to have terminated the contract in such an excessive hurry—either they have shown ignorance in making it a purely departmental question; or, having come, as an united Cabinet, to a conclusion that it ought to be terminated, they ought not to have turned round and granted this Committee. I say they have rather discredited themselves in my opinion than done themselves good by showing these symptoms of weakness like that noble vessel the Hibernia. So much for the Government. Now for a point to which I should not have reverted but for what fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose. He has taken upon himself—I must say in partial ignorance of the facts, to style this new Company, forgetting there have been two distinct companies, a commercial sham. Does the hon. Gentleman know who is the Chairman of the Company? Let me tell him the Chairman of that Company is one of the first commercial men not only in Ireland, but, I believe, in Great Britain. It is Mr. Malcomson—a gentleman whose acquaintance I have the honour to rejoice in. What is his status in the commercial world? Mr. Malcomson is not only the largest cotton spinner in Ireland, but the greatest proprietor of steam-boats in the United Kingdom. He is the Chairman of the Galway Company. And when my hon. Friend says that the directors are men of straw and the whole thing a commercial sham, I say that it is no such thing. Whatever may be the opinion of my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, I can tell this House that the chairman and directors of the Company are as solvent men as any merchants in Her Majesty's dominions. I think the English Members ought to be guarded against the representations which have been put forward—not by the hon. Member for Montrose, or the Scotch Radicals, for, whatever may be their opinions of Maynooth, upon mercantile questions they have no hatred of Ireland—but by the Irish Government. The question is, how is the Irish Government to be carried on? For the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland to rise and say this is a purely departmental question is not telling us how Ireland should be dealt with. What are the facts of the case? I was astonished to find that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in answer to a deputation, stated he knew nothing whatever of what was going on on the other side of the water, and no one could have been so surprised as his Excellency when he awoke one fine morning and found that the Postmaster General had put an end to the Galway contract. If that is the way in which you carry on the government of Ireland, it is utterly impossible that your Government or any other Government can be popular there. I do not look at this question as a mere question of the Galway contract, but if you are to support the institution of the Lord Lieutenancy you must make it a reality. The reason I have always objected to the continuance of the Lord Lieutenancy is, not that I object to the office of Lord Lieutenant, but that you have made him such a King Log that he is of no use. If I wanted an argument against the Lord Lieutenancy I could not have a stronger one than this case. Here you have a nobleman in the receipt of a paltry sum as Viceroy. I say it is a paltry sum—I do not like to bring in names—the names of royalty—but there is no Court in Ireland—while visits are paid to Scotland—a nobleman gets £20,000 to exercise the office of Viceroy, and you have made him a man of no power, not able to give an opinion, and then the right hon. Gentleman comes down here and tells us this is a departmental question. Without any reference to the Galway contract, this becomes a serious question whether the Lord Lieutenant ought to be kept in the position he now is. It is all very well to talk of justice to Ireland, and to throw out fine phrases in this House, but having a long and intimate acquaintance with Ireland, I say she ought to share in the same benefits which you give to this and the sister country. You complain that she knows very little of you. She only sees you in the most disagreeable form, when the Judges of assize go their circuits, and then she is told she ought to bless herself for the connection. If the Government have done their duty they ought to have looked at this question as one far beyond a mere departmental question. I do not go on to the question of the Galway contract or the objects of this Company, but I say that neither this nor any other Government can shut their eyes to the just wants of Ireland, and, without going into the paper duty question, my support of this or any other Government which may come after it would materially depend upon the way in which they treat the sister kingdom.

MR. CARDWELL: The hon. Gentleman has entirely mistaken me. I did not say that this was a departmental question; on the contrary, that, regarding it as an Imperial question, it had been settled here in the department by which it was begun and by the Government collectively, to whom the responsibility belonged.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, being the individual who signed the Galway contract the House will not, perhaps, think it presumptuous on my part if I make one or two observations before the discussion closes. A year has elapsed and I find the task of defending the policy of that contract not so difficult as a twelvemonth ago it might have seemed. Time, and the truth which time often brings, appear to have influenced public opinion. Little less than a year ago the attention of this House was called to the proposal for another Select Committee on the same subject, but moved in a very different spirit and with a very different object. A year has gone round, and "the engineer is hoist with his own petard." There is a Committee again to be appointed on the Galway contract, but I think the labours of those Gentlemen who will serve on it will be animated by a different meaning from that which influenced those who came to a decision on our recent Committee. Looking at this question generally, what is urged against the policy of this contract? There were many objections originally urged against that policy, but they all seem to have disappeared. The noble Lord the Secretary of State the other night said that no one could for a moment impugn the policy of the contract; and I think myself he would be a bold man who did it. Looking at the relative positions of America and the United Kingdom, I think he would certainly assume a perilous position who would impugn the policy of selecting for establishing a communication between the countries—those two points by which the nearest communication could take place. It was shown to us, that if this service were established at Galway, as between Liverpool and Galway, with respect to reaching America, there would be in favour of Galway a saving of at least thirty hours' voyage, and as regards telegraphic communication, question and answer both considered, there would be an absolute saving of eight days. Even in 1858 that was an important consideration with statesmen; is it less important in 1861? We will then pass on to the next point, the means by which this policy is to be carried out. No one now, according to the authority of the Secretary of State, impugns the policy, but the means by which it was carried into effect are still, though much more faintly, abused. A subsidy, it is said, is a means which is highly to be deprecated and objected to. It is, we are told, the office of private capital, unassisted by the credit of the State, to undertake enterprises of this character. But does private capital undertake enterprises of this nature? What evidence have we that if the Government of 1858 had not interfered any private enterprise with this object would have been established? Is not all the evidence the other way? This is a want which has long been felt. Philosophers and politicians had long recognized its importance, merchants and traders had asserted that it was an object of the first necessity, and for years they had done this, but no step was ever taken by them to accomplish their purpose. There were placed before the Government representations in favour of this communication between Galway and the nearest point of America, signed by all the great capitalists, all the great firms, and Chambers of Commerce in the country. But they did not stir in the matter, and the Government took the responsibility of interfering. They also took means of ascertaining whether there was any prospect of private enterprise, or private capital, unassisted and unsanctioned by the Government, taking it up, and they learnt from all quarters that such supposition was quite illusory. And very naturally so. Had not this country for a long period of years adopted a different policy on a most extensive scale, and sanctioned the interference of the State? Had you not had considerable and extensive services from various ports of England, assisted by subsidies from the Treasury to a very large amount? Were not they proofs that private capital could not efficiently undertake the duty, and in Ireland to effect that which private capital in England shrank from attempting? We ourselves believed that it was of importance for the public welfare and generally for the advantage of Ireland that this communication should be established. But then we are told that we made a great mistake, because, having come to that opinion, we did not put the enterprise up to public competition. That subject was well considered by the Government of the Earl of Derby, and it was the result of their deliberation that nothing could be more unwise, and, indeed, to a certain degree, nothing could be more unjust than to put that service up to competition. We found a Company before us established to a certain extent, and in possession of a colonial contract which gave it a great advantage against any fair and open competition, but at the same time we were assured, and we believed and still believe that, if we had resolved upon establishing that communication between Ireland and America by competition, great companies, with the command of large capital, whose interest it was to prevent any such communication, would have taken advantage of that public machinery of competition, and ultimately would virtually have suppressed the very enterprise we wished to foster. Whether, therefore, we look to the policy of the enterprise, which is no longer impugned, or to the means to which we had recourse, and which I with confidence vindicate, there is no point to which objection can be taken.

But, then, we are told that though the policy might be right, and though the means might not be questioned, yet the conduct of the Company, when once we had granted this contract, was so unsatisfactory and so unequal to the occasion that they have no claim whatever to the consideration of the State, and that the conduct of the Government in the course they have recently taken was not only justified but necessary. But is that the fact? There is no doubt that it was an enterprise of no slight difficulty to establish this communication between Ireland and America. The very difficulty alone justified the interposition of the State, and that interposition was not an accessory but the condition of success. It was the credit and strength which the sanction and assistance of the State gave which allowed the Company, and could alone allow the Company, to succeed. What was the assistance which the State gave after the policy was adopted and the contract signed? I say it was an alternation of neglect and menace. That is the complete history of the relations between the Government and the Galway Company. It was the grant—the cheerful grant of the subsidy which was the foundation of the credit and capital of the Company. There was no other reason which could justify the interference of the State, and chilling and churlish assistance really prevented success. It was worse than chilling and churlish. It was critical and hostile from the beginning. What was the reason of this conduct on the part of the Government? There was a dissolution of Parliament, a change of Administration, and those who were responsible for the policy and who signed the contract left office. What was the cause of the conduct of our successors? I confess I am at a loss to say. Nothing has surprised me more than that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they have acceded to office, should have always felt it one of their first duties to blacken the conduct and character of their predecessors. I should have thought that they might have been contented with their success. Their triumph has generally been obtained on easy terms. Considering the unnatural coalitions which are usually called into existence to expel us from power, the impossible pledges and the impracticable policy to which our successors give their public adhesion, in order that they may sit on those benches, I think they might have been satisfied. No one on this bench, at least, has ever grudged them their triumph, however obtained. With such unequivocal success, they might have spared themselves the task always to blacken the character and conduct of their predecessors. It was the same in 1852. It was the same in 1859. In 1852 we were responsible for the conduct of the Admiralty. We were in office less than a year. The Duke of Northumberland was then First Lord. He found the affairs of the Admiralty in no satisfactory state. There was great alarm in the country, and a great call on the Government to produce the Channel fleet. To the Duke of Northumberland alone, supported, of course, by the entire sympathy of his colleagues, belongs the credit that in less than a year a Channel fleet was created. So far the Government in 1852 might have left office without any attempt on the part of their successful rivals to blacken the conduct of that department. But, on the contrary, a most amiable and accomplished man, much beloved in this House, and by all who knew him, was hunted to death by the noble Lords and right hon. Gentleman opposite. The most exaggerated and miserable charges were brought against him for conduct which all his predecessors had been allowed to pursue with impunity, in order to raise a cry against the Government of the day. In the year 1859 there was only the Galway contract, and I should be a hypocrite and conceal my convictions if I did not say that the licence of public life was stretched to create an unjust odium against the Government. What is the consequence of these illegitimate means to create a false sympathy, and raise an unfounded and unjust odium against their predecessors? If I had really perpetrated that job which I am described in the public prints to have done, and which some in this House have insinuated that I have done, do you think I should have drawn the contract in the form in which it appears on the table now for our consideration? Remember, that until this Galway contract, it was in the power of the Government, on their own authority, to enter into those contracts, and Parliament had no control over them. Who was the first Minister who put in that language which brought these contracts under the supervision of the House of Commons? Who gave this House the power which they exercised last year, and are happily exercising this year, over the terms and conditions of such contracts? Why, it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the Administration of the Earl of Derby. And I say that if I had been influenced by those corrupt motives which have been imputed, should I have put that language into a contract which made it amenable to Parliament, or should I not rather have shrouded the contract in the old language of such engagements, which would have permitted me to have defied the criticism of Parliament? I did nothing of the kind. I sanctioned the remodelling of these contracts because I felt that the Government of which I was a member would not have ratified a contract which they did not believe was for the public welfare, and because I thought that my successor in office, whoever he might be, would be animated by far too exalted and generous sentiments to find time at such a moment to blacken the conduct of his predecessors. After a year has passed, the conspiracy having succeeded for the time, no doubt—where do we find ourselves? We have had, I think, as remarkable a piece of Parliamentary conduct with reference to this contract on the part of Her Majesty's Government as I ever recollect. The Motion of the hon. Member for Galway was, in fact, a vote of censure. It was a proposition that the House should appoint a Committee to consider the announced decision of the Cabinet. If the Committee came to a different decision from the Cabinet the only logical conclusion should have been that the Committee should sit on those benches. Every effort was made on the part of Her Majesty's Government that there should be no mistake or misconception on this point. Their friends, however annoyed by their policy in this respect, charitably intimated—to use the language of the evening—that it was a departmental error. But the Government would not for a moment agree that it was a departmental error. It was a policy upon which Cabinet Councils were proudly summoned, upon which they pompously sat, and the result of which was announced to us with ostentation by the Prime Minister. They had considered the subject. The Postmaster General had nothing to do with it, or had only an infinitesimal portion of responsibility. It was a Cabinet question. The Cabinet had decided, and the noble Lord threw down his glove on the floor of the House. The hon. Member for Galway took it up and gave notice of a Motion that, notwithstanding the decision of the Cabinet, the question should be remitted to the consideration of a Committee. What does that mean? Why, that we are not satisfied with the policy of the Government. We are not content with the decision of the Cabinet. If that is not a question of confidence, what is a question of confidence? It is most charitable on the part of the Government to agree without a division to a vote of want of confidence, as every body desires to keep them in their places. This is the state into which we are brought by the tortuous policy of the Government now and then blackening an opponent, now and then laying a trap to injure a body of public men, now and then disappointing supporters who placed confidence in them, now and then using this contract as an object of defiance by which to punish those who regarded more the interest of their country than the interests of the Government. And it is come to this—to a scene of unprecedented humiliation, remarkable, I must say, this night, for an unrivalled exposition of Irish policy by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman still retains the humble but constitutional title of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. Generally speaking, when principals are not contented with their secretaries they dismiss them, but here we have the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland agreeing in the Cabinet to a policy of the greatest importance to the country, of which his Excellency, as it now turns out, on evidence which no one can question, was kept in entire ignorance. That is a remarkable state of affairs. I am perfectly aware of the objections which have been urged against the office of the Lord Lieutenant, and by none with more liveliness and force than by the hon. and gallant Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne). There may be abuses, but I believe they arise from neglect and non-appreciation of the real character of the office. I do not think that they constitute a sufficient reason why we should abolish a post now of some antiquity, of great distinction and authority, which by good management and proper appreciation on the part of the Home Government might be made to exercise a substantial power and a most beneficial influence in Ireland. But where is the authority of the Lord Lieutenant, after the exposition of his policy which has been given to-night by his Secretary, who has rather aggravated his sins by his explanation? If it had been a mere departmental question—though what that jargon means I cannot comprehend—that was no reason why the Lord Lieutenant should be kept in ignorance of the decision. But, as we are now told, it is an Imperial question, in which Ireland is deeply concerned, and that upon such a question the chief Governor of Ireland should not be consulted, appears to me really monstrous. Well, we shall have a Committee sitting upon a subject which has already received the mature deliberation of Her Majesty's Ministers. I shall await its Report with considerable interest. Meanwhile I may say that these discussions, which have now occupied nearly twelve months, more or less, have not been without result. Whatever may be the policy of this Government, I believe that the policy of England towards Ireland has received from these discussions a new aspect, which I hope may lead to a future that may realize the hopes of the most ardent friends of that country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It can excite no surprise, Sir, on the part of those who have watched the course of administration in this country of late years, that the right hon. Gentleman should express great resentment, much indignation, and somewhat of grief, that the conduct of the successive Governments of which he has been a Member, should invariably, when they have been overthrown by adverse majorities, become the subject of public censure. That can excite no surprise. The wonder is rather that the torrent of indignation which we have heard to-night should so long have been pent up, and should only have burst its bounds upon the present occasion, for the purpose of exciting those cheers which have so loudly followed the sitting down of the right hon. Gentleman. I must say, however, that there was one part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman which did excite astonishment in my mind. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to a melancholy event, deplored by all who had the honour and pleasure of acquaintance with Mr. Stafford, the late Member for Northampton, an event which was totally unconnected with political matters, and was the result purely of physical disease, and I must say, at the hazard of casting a reflection on the medical science of the sister isle, of medical mismanagement. With a taste and feeling to which I shall not advert, the right hon. Gentleman was pleased to say that my hon. Friend—for so I may call him—was hunted to death. I never in the course of my life heard an observation less founded on fact, more impertinent to the question under consideration, or less becoming a person occupying the position of the right hon. Gentleman. I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman in discussing the merits or demerits of the Administration of 1852. I will not even go into a discussion of the conduct of the late Government in regard to the granting of the Galway contract, or the motives, time, and circumstances of that transaction. Much might be said on that subject, but it is a question which has gone by. If there was anything in the granting of that contract which exposed the late Government to criticism, it has been condoned. The matter was referred to a Committee of the House; on whose Report the contract was acknowledged, retained, and carried on. It is made a reproach to the present Government that they referred the matter to a Committee; but, as the contract was to depend on money to be voted by Parliament, as there was great difference of opinion on the expediency and policy of the contract at the time in the House, and as it turned on detailed information, I think it was the duty of the Government to refer the matter to a Select Committee, and not allow it to be discussed merely on the Vote in Committee of Supply. The Company having been acknowledged, and their contract continued, it was our duty to see that they fulfilled the engagements which they had undertaken. They failed on several occasions to fulfil the conditions of the contract, and repeatedly received extensions of time and other indulgencies. A certain time having elapsed, we found that failures were still taking place, and arrived at the opinion that the Company did not contain in itself the elements of faithful and efficient performance of the contract. It, therefore, became our duty, in performance of the obligations we had undertaken, to tell the Company that no further time could be allowed, and that the contract must, therefore, be terminated. We are told that it is an act of weakness, a piece of self-condemnation, to agree to the Committee now moved for. I say it is in exact accordance with the course which we pursued on the former occasion, in regard to maintaining the contract. It is perfectly true that we felt that if we had resisted this proposal we should have been left in a minority. We deemed it ourselves to be a reasonable proposal, and we believed that others shared that opinion. Instead of being an act of weakness, it was the only course which a Government acting without passion or prejudice, and wishing simply that the merits and justice of the case should be ascertained, could pursue. The only person in the House who, I think, should have voted against the proposal is the noble Lord opposite (Lord Naas), who, in his speech, gave what appeared to me strong reasons for such a vote. Then we are told that in acting as we have done, we have slighted the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Why, Sir, I would ask where the contract was made, and who sanctioned it? Was it made in Ireland, or did it receive the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant? We were just now told by the right hon. Gentleman that it was a contract made by the Government of this country upon Imperial considerations, to be paid for out of the Imperial Revenue, and to be sanctioned by Parliament. I say, therefore, that if a question arose as to whether the contract should be continued or not, the same authority by which it was originally made; namely, the Imperial Government was called upon to determine whether it should be continued. This being so, it was not fair to throw upon the Lord Lieutenant a responsibility which did not belong to him, or to take him into council upon a matter of Imperial policy which in no degree formed part of his functions. So far from casting any slight upon the legitimate authority vested in him, I say that we should have been going out of our way if we had remitted to him a question, the decision upon which belonged solely to the Government of this country; and in thus acting we pursued the natural course, the course followed by our predecessors, and the only course which ought to be followed by the Government upon a question of this kind. The Lord Lieutenant, however, was informed of the decision which was taken. The noble Lord himself read a passage, from which it appeared that the Lord Lieutenant knew of our decision, though he said he was not aware of all the detailed reasons upon which that decision was founded. Now, as the decision was not his, it was unnecessary to take him into council and inform him of all the steps by which it was arrived at; it was enough to tell him what the decision was, and, therefore, the answer which he gave was a perfectly obvious and natural one. There is nothing in that transaction, therefore, which in the slightest degree affects the functions or the position of the Lord Lieutenant, and if hon. Gentlemen have no better reason than that for proposing the abolition of the office, I think the ground for making such a proposal exceedingly trivial. Great complaints have been made by Irish Members in the course of this debate that sufficient attention is not paid by the Government to the interests of Ireland; that Ireland is neglected; and that there is hostility on our part towards Ireland. Really, to accuse the Government of hostility to one-third of the United Kingdom implies, I think, less wisdom on the part of those who make the assertion than the accusation imputes to those against whom it is made. Why, Sir, of late years, the whole course of legislation has been for the benefit of Ireland. When you talk of Ireland, I presume you consider it as part of the United Kingdom. I presume we are not discussing Ireland as if it were a colony separated in its interests from the rest of the country, locally situated, and unconnected, except by its allegiance to the Sovereign with this country. I say, then, that every measure which is proposed and carried for the benefit of the country at large is a measure from which Ireland in common with the rest of the United Kingdom derives her share of benefit. All those improvements in commerce and in internal administration of every kind, which have resulted from the labours of Parliament during the last twenty years, are measures from which Ireland has derived as much benefit as England. These advantages are not confined to one part of the United Kingdom. The repeal of Customs' duties, the freedom of commerce—any measures which add to the wealth and prosperity of the United Kingdom—confer equal benefits on Ireland with the rest of the country. No man who compares the state of Ireland now with its state twenty years ago—no man can traverse the country, or can go the slightest distance through it, without seeing the vast improvement which has taken place there. I dare say I shall be told by those who are so much alive to the interests of Ireland that this improvement has been the result of the native energies of the people, of their industry, intelligence, activity, the fertility of the soil, and the natural resources of the country. But will all these elements produce national prosperity unless superintended by a good Government? When a nation is prosperous, when intelligence and industry reap the legitimate reward of their exertions, when the natural resources of a country are developed by the activity of its people—when you see such a result you may confidently assert that that country is well governed. On the other hand, when you see intelligence cramped, industry deprived of its proper reward, a fertile soil lying waste and uncultivated, and great natural resources thrown away and unproductive to man, you may safely predicate the existence there of a bad Government. The greatly increased happiness and prosperity of Ireland of late years show, I think, convincingly that the Government under which such results are brought about is not liable to the imputations made against the present Ministry of being neglectful of the interests and hostile to the welfare of Ireland. I shall not pursue this subject further. I am of opinion that the course proposed by the hon. Member for Galway is a proper one. We are perfectly willing to submit to the Committee the reasons upon which we thought it our duty as guardians of the public purse to announce the termination of the contract. It will be for the Committee to judge whether those reasons are sufficient, or whether any excuses which the Company can offer for the nonperformance of their engagements are such as will justify the Government and Parliament in continuing the subsidy which under the contract the Company are entitled to receive.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had displayed much credulity as to the forgetfulness of the House in the remarks which he had addressed to it. He stated that the Earl of Derby's Government had deliberately considered the question whether the Galway contract should be submitted to competition or not, and, after mature deliberation, had decided in the negative. Now, it would be in the recollection of many hon. Members that a distinct promise was given by the Treasury to an important commercial company at Liverpool that this Irish contract should be submitted to competition, yet, in absolute oblivion of that promise, the contract was given to the Galway Company. The Canadians made a similar complaint against the late Government, who had promised that the subject should be considered with special reference to Canadian interests, but had entirely lost sight of this undertaking. Now, that Government might have had some excuse for want of method and mismanagement, but they had just been told that all that had been done was the result of mature deliberation, though the Earl of Derby himself, in his examination before the Committee, had stated that the omission was unintentional. The right hon. Gentleman said he had been actuated by the highest and purest motives, because he had introduced into the Galway contract a clause providing that the subsidy should be paid out of monies furnished by Parliament. Now, the history of these words was narrated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his evidence before the Committee. The hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stamford Northcote) stated—

“The question having arisen, whether the Government was responsible for the vote for the Paris chapel, I called Mr. Disraeli's attention to the subject and said, ‘You had better take care what you are about, because if Parliament should refuse to vote the money for the contract, you or Lord Derby may be called upon to pay the whole amount yourselves.’ Mr. Disraeli said that that would be highly objectionable. I, therefore, proposed to insert in the contract, ‘out of monies to be provided by Parliament, or something to that effect.’”

The hon. Gentleman whose death had been alluded to, having been a personal friend of his, he must be allowed to say that he was shocked at hearing the right hon. Gentleman have the face to say that he was hunted to death by hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House. What were the facts? Accusations were made against the conduct of the Admiralty with reference to the election of 1852. An impartial and independent Committee of five Members of that House inquired into those statements, and virtually condemned the conduct of the Earl of Derby's Government with regard to those transactions. The right hon. Gentleman complained that attempts were made to blacken the character of himself and his friends. There was no desire to blacken the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite. It was their own conduct in 1852, as proved before the Committee, and the suspicious circumstances connected with this contract, which gave rise to the imputations which had been cast upon the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. These matters had nothing to do with the question before the House, and had only been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman because he thought that he had a good opportunity of making a little capital, and of swaggering about these matters, out of which his friends had not come in the best light. He must say that he regretted that the Committee was to be appointed. There were no facts to be ascertained; they were all in the papers which were already before the House. Notice had been given by the proper authority to put an end to the agreement, and it was at an end. Was the House of Commons prepared to say that if the Company had been harshly or unjustly used they would take the functions of the executive Government into their hands, and resolve that a contract should be entered into with a public company for the conveyance of mails? The adoption of such a course would be very dangerous to the system of government of the country. They had hitherto trusted these matters to the executive Government, and had held them responsible for the proper discharge of their duty, and it would be a most serious thing in the contest of parties if the success of a Ministry was in future to depend upon obtaining in this manner the votes of those who were interested in the prosperity of a particular part of the United Kingdom, or upon consulting pecuniary interests with which the House of Commons had properly nothing to do. He trusted that the result of the investigations of the Committee would be to show that the course which had been taken was a proper one, but if it should not he trusted that there was sufficient independence on both sides of the House to induce them to declare that they would not attempt to make contracts which it was the business of the Government to conclude.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that he had heard the opening remarks of the noble Lord and some of the concluding sentences of the speech of his right hon. Friend with the greatest possible pain and surprise. The noble Lord boasted that he was a friend of the late Mr. Augustus Stafford, and took upon himself to say that the unjust party attacks which were made upon him by hon. Gentlemen opposite had nothing to do with his lamented and untimely death. If the noble Lord had been a friend of Mr. Stafford he would have known that that statement was not founded on fact. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had said that the attacks which were made upon Mr. Stafford were made by an impartial Committee; but his right hon. Friend had sat long enough in that House to know that in times of great political excitement Committees might be betrayed into statements and into judgments which their members in after years deeply regretted. Those who were intimate friends of the late Mr. Stafford knew, and knew too well and too painfully, what effect the decision of that Committee produced upon his highly sensitive and honourable mind. If the noble Lord had in his capacity of friend to Mr. Stafford risen when the attacks were made upon him, and shielded him from them, he should have attributed true friendship to him, but he regretted more than he could say that the noble Lord should have commenced his speech with the remarks which he had made with respect to that admirable, honourable, and excellent man who had passed away. Had it not been for the reference to that subject by the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman, he should not have said a word upon this subject, but after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman he must ask him why he did not divide the House? He gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that he looked upon the conduct of the Government in assenting to the appointment of this Committee as mean and pitiful. If that was his opinion why did not he divide the House against the Motion? The late Administration shrunk from no investigation of the motives which induced them to grant the subsidy, and if the right hon. Gentleman thought that no investigation was required he challenged him to take the opinion of the House. If he admitted that there was a necessity for investigation, then the concluding sentences of his speech were wholly uncalled for, and might have been reserved until the Committee had reported.

MR. HERBERT said, that as the nearest and most intimate friend of the lamented Gentleman whose name had been referred to, he regretted that he should have been present to hear his name bandied across the House. He knew Mr. Stafford well, and, although he sat opposite to him in that House, he sympathized deeply with him in the attacks which were made upon him after he left office. He knew how deeply he felt those attacks. He knew the pain Mr. Stafford suffered from them at the time. He died in his presence, and before his death he heard from his own mouth the full particulars of the treatment he had received, and what he believed were the causes of that treatment. He could not, therefore, stand by during this discussion without stating to the House his belief that the attacks made on Mr. Stafford had nothing whatever to do with his death. He need hardly remind the House that those actions which gained for Mr. Stafford a European reputation, and carried his name into every home of this country, were performed years after the political attacks made on him; when he did those noble deeds Mr. Stafford was in strong health; and he came back from the Crimea to this country, to the satisfaction of his friends, in good health, to enjoy the reputation he had so nobly achieved, and which made all England forget those errors which he himself had publicly acknowledged.

MR. NEWDEGATE said that, except the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, perhaps he knew more of Mr. Stafford, and the circumstances to which allusion had been made, than any Member of the House. He, and an hon. Member now no more, Mr. Drummond, were charged with Mr. Stafford's defence in reference to the charges brought against him, which the right hon. Gentleman correctly said had nothing whatever to do with his death. The circumstances connected with that death were very painful; but they had nothing to do with the charges brought against him. Still, as Mr. Stafford's memory had been alluded to, he would say this—that had he been defended by his friends as he was assailed by his enemies his reputation would have stood very differently from what it did. Mr. Stafford, either from advice he received or from a feeling of delicacy towards other persons, declined the defence that was prepared for him. That defence would have been a defence of recrimination, and if it had been made by Mr. Drummond—as it would have been—and supported by himself (Mr. Newdegate), he was confident, that they could have shown that the acts, which the right hon. Member for Kerry said had gained Mr. Stafford an European notoriety, were not so singular as they were supposed to be. But Mr. Stafford had great delicacy on the subject; he wished no man's character to be blackened in his defence; and this was consistent with his high and honourable character. But he said, "As I have borne, so let me bear the blame; let there be no comparisons made in my defence." Had his defence been duly made, it would, he (Mr. Newdegate) repeated, have shown that others had pursued courses certainly not less exceptional. He would not hear Mr. Stafford's memory reflected on as having done something unprecedented in the history of Parliament. He did nothing more than had been done before, and it would be fortunate if they did not hereafter become aware of practices far darker than those with which Mr. Stafford's name was connected. It would be unbecoming on his part to suffer the House to entertain the belief that regret for what he had done hastened Mr. Stafford's untimely end.

MR. HERBERT said, the hon. Member had fallen into an error in ascribing an "European notoriety" to the charges that had been alluded to. He had stated that Mr. Stafford had gained an European reputation by his noble conduct in the Crimea.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he knew that, though the contract was made in England, no part of the transaction passed without the cognizance of the Earl of Eglinton, who was then Lord Lieutenant, and he (Colonel Dunne) could assure the House that he had taken every precaution and made every inquiry as to the probable success of the Company, which he felt would have succeeded, but for the Committee granted by the present Ministry, which suspended the subsidy. But Lord Eglinton saw that the Irish people had a right to direct communication with America, and recommended to the Government of Lord Derby to assist the undertaking for that purpose. Lord Eglinton exerted himself for the interests of Ireland, and there he was justly popular with all classes in that country. The noble Lord had referred to the good government of Ireland by the Ministry of which he was the head, and boasted of the benefits to Ireland, which resulted to Ireland from that good Government. There was no country less aware of these benefits. Was the income tax a benefit to Ireland? Was the increase of the spirit duties a benefit? Was the paper subsidy an advantage to it—a subsidy that was given on grounds more corrupt than they ascribed to the Galway contract? But he denied the assertion of the slightest corruption in granting that contract for the benefit of Ireland, the late Government had done but an act of justice, and from the moment the present Government came into office they had taken every means to break the contract for the purpose, if they could, of injuring their political opponents. Who was it said that wherever an Irishman set his foot there was an enemy of England? The master of the present Government—the hon. Member for Birmingham? Were the £5,000,000 raised for the defences of this country of any use to Ireland? What had they done for Ireland? Nothing, except raise her taxes to £11,000,000. They were always trying to take something from Ireland, and returning her nothing; that was the reason they were hated. What were the signs of the prosperity of Ireland? Why, her imports and exports had scarcely increased since the Union ; her exports were not more than they were sixty years ago ; and the noble Lord had the audacity to talk of the prosperity of Ireland, and ascribed it to his Government.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. COWPER moved the third reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. LYGON asked for some explanation with regard to it, and moved pro forma the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. COWPER said, the Bill was of a hybrid character, having in its provisions usually contained in a private Bill; it gave power to the Commissioners of Works to purchase the site for the erection of courts for the administration of the law. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had given notice of his intention to introduce a Bill for the transfer of the funds requisite for this purpose, and until that Bill passed into law the measure now before the House would be inoperative. If it were lost by waiting for the money Bill, and had to be renewed another year, the cost of notices and solicitors' fees would have to be repeated.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was reluctant to interfere with the progress of this "hybrid" Bill, but he thought its final stage ought not to be agreed to until the House was in possession at least of the outlines of the measure to be introduced by the Attorney General, on which its operation was said to depend.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government were of opinion that the Bill ought to go forward this Session without any reference to what might become of the Attorney General's proposal. The latter was of such an extensive character that even had it been introduced it was impossible in the state of public business that it could hitherto have received attention.

MR. COWPER ultimately consented to postpone the order for the third reading to the following Monday.

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Third Reading deferred till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, referring to the answer of the noble Earl the President of the Council upon his (the Marquess of Normanby's) Motion the other evening for the production of the Correspondence which had taken place between the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Home Government in reference to the Galway Subsidy, said, that answer had received in Ireland an interpretation different to that which the noble Earl, doubtless, intended should be applied to it. This was obvious from the observations made on the last occasion by his noble Friend, connected with the Company of Galway (Earl of Clancarty). The fact of the case was that when a deputation of noblemen and gentlemen waited upon the Lord Lieutenant in reference to the expediency of continuing the subsidy, his Excellency gave them a distinct pledge that Her Majesty's Government should be fully informed of all the points which they urged. But when he (the Marquess of Normanby) moved for the Correspondence which he supposed the Lord Lieutenant entered into with Her Majesty's Government in pursuance of that pledge, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) denied that there was any such official correspondence in existence, whereupon he (the Marquess of Normanby) expressed his regret that his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had not thought it consistent with his duty to make to Her Majesty's Government an official representation upon the subject, as, from experience, he knew that such was the most convenient and most satisfactory course to adopt. It was not necessary when, as in his own case, there was almost daily confidential correspondence with the Prime Minister, his late friend, Lord Melbourne, with whom he never had a difference of opinion upon any Irish subject. But he also knew that the most important despatches in reference to Irish policy were those which the late Marquess of Wellesley, while Lord Lieutenant, addressed to the Secretary of State when there was, he would not say a difference, but the shadow of a difference, between himself and the Ministers with reference to the policy to be pursued in that country. It was not his practice to allude to what took place elsewhere, but on the present occasion he felt called upon to do so in consequence of the new principle for the government of Ireland enunciated in a recent debate by one of the Ministers of the Crown himself, the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to order. He did not see how the matter referred to by the noble Marquess could in any way be taken as fixing the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he did not pledge himself to the precise expressions used by the Chief Secretary; but the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister of the Crown, and any expression coming from him would limit the functions of the Lord Lieutenant who was his official superior. The right hon. Gentleman was understood to make a declaration to the effect that it was not considered desirable that the Lord Lieutenant should express any opinion upon the subject of the subsidy in question—a declaration the more extraordinary as being made after it was publicly known that a deputation, consisting of gentlemen of all parties in that country, had waited upon his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in reference to the matter, and that he had told them that that was not the first time he had had the matter brought under his consideration, and that he had not waited until then to inform Her Majesty's Government of his opinions and sympathy in reference to it. From his own experience, he (the Marquess of Normanby) must say that if that was the footing upon which the Lord Lieutenant was to be placed it would be impossible for him to efficiently discharge the duties of his responsible office, and the sooner the office was abolished the better. Of all questions, this was certainly the one on which the Government ought to have consulted the Lord Lieutenant. No doubt it was not a purely Irish question; but the object of the Lord Lieutenant's office was to endeavour to cement Irish interests with Imperial policy; and if the doctrine of the Secretary of Ireland prevailed, very few noble Lords would be found in the future willing to undertake the duties of Lord Lieutenant. He would not now enter farther into that question than to say, that when the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, some years since, was preparing a Bill for the abolition of the office, he wrote to Paris to consult him (the Marquess of Normanby) upon the policy of the proposal, when he replied that it would be impossible on account of the numberless changes which it would occasion to carry the measure through as they proposed, but that he farther thought that till the two countries were in many respects more nearly assimilated, nothing could compensate for the advantage which the office of Lord Lieutenant secured of having always present throughout the year a statesman of weight and influence to be consulted on all Irish interests. He wished to know whether the noble Earl adhered to the statement that no official communications had passed between the Government and the Lord Lieutenant with reference to the Galway contract?

EARL GRANVILLE wished to remind the noble Marquess of the answer he had given the other evening. In reply to a Motion then made by the noble Marquess, for the Correspondence which had passed between the Lord Lieutenant and the Government on the subject of the Galway subsidy, he (Earl Granville) stated that there was no official correspondence on the subject. No doubt communications had passed between members of the Government and the Lord Lieutenant; but there were no official communications which could be produced to Parliament. He did not know whether the expressions said to have been used by the Chief Secretary in "another place" were correctly given; but if any importance attached to them, it was most irregular and inconvenient to bring them under the notice of their Lordships in the way the noble Marquess had done. He had, however, not the slightest hesitation in saying that the Government were in constant communication with the Lord Lieutenant, and that they received with great confidence and deference his opinion on all subjects connected with the general policy of Ireland. Very likely the Secretary for Ireland stated in the other House that it was not considered necessary by the Government to consult the Lord Lieutenant in regard to the Galway contract. The question was whether a contract with a Government department, the stipulations of which had not been fulfilled, should be terminated, and that was an Imperial question, and not one to be referred to the Lord Lieutenant. He was informed by his noble Friend the Postmaster General (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that it had never been the practice and had never been thought necessary to communicate with the Irish Government on matters connected with the management of the Irish Post Office. In this instance it would have been placing the Lord Lieutenant in an unfair position, to call upon him for an official communication which might perhaps have rendered him unpopular in Ireland. Such a course would have been very injudicious. He could not believe that the object of the noble Marquess was to sow dissension between the Lord Lieutenant and the Government, or between the Lord Lieutenant and his Secretary, though coming from another person such an intention might have been presumed from the remarks which had been made. He could only say that they were now, he believed, on the best terms, and, no doubt, the wish of the noble Marquess was that those cordial relations should continue.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that on a question of such great public interest, affecting as it did the industry of Ireland, the opinions of the Lord Lieutenant ought not to have been thrown aside and passed over as having no bearing on the question, as they appeared to have been by the Government; for he could not otherwise understand how the noble Earl should have said, when the noble Marquess on a former occasion asked for the production of this Correspondence, that there were no official papers on the subject. He admitted that the question was of Imperial importance—for whatever affected the interests of Ireland affected the interests of the whole kingdom; but that was an additional reason why the Lord Lieutenant should have been consulted on the discontinuance of the subsidy, as his predecessor had been consulted on its establishment. It appeared that when a deputation waited upon the Lord Lieutenant in Dublin on the subject, the noble Earl could only express his sympathy with those who addressed him, and promised to place their views before the Government. To state after this that there was no official correspondence was, in his opinion, to lower the position of the Lord Lieutenant in the eyes of the Irish people, besides subjecting to a severe strain the philosophy and forbearance of the noble Earl himself.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he was not surprised that the noble Earl should have said that the production of the Correspondence would be very inconvenient—

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had not stated that the production of the Correspondence would be inconvenient; he said that there was none of a public nature.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM had certainly understood the noble Lord to say so. It appeared that an extraordinary line was drawn between official and non-official correspondence. He supposed the distinction was, that if the Lord Lieutenant, instead of beginning his letter with "My Lord," began "My dear Lord," "My dear Lord" held that correspondence to be private and confidential, though it might be of vital importance to the whole empire. He deprecated this system, and he deprecated the imputation that the noble Marquess had brought forward this Motion with the object of producing discord among the Members of the Cabinet. If report spoke true there was enough of discord there already. In trying to avoid the production of the correspondence, the noble Earl had endeavoured to mislead the House. He had stated that the whole question was, whether a Company that had failed to perform its contract should continue to receive a subsidy. This he denied. The question was whether Galway should be a packet station or not, and it was indifferent whether the contract was held by one Company or another. It had been said of a former Irish Government that the Lord Lieutenant did all the dancing, the Chief Secretary all the hunting, and the Under Secretary all the correspondence. It was high time to consider how far the Irish Government should be reformed. Was it to be the only thing in the United Kingdom that was not to be reformed? The whole thing was a paradox. The Chief Secretary was a member of the Cabinet, and had to attend to his Parliamentary duties; the Lord Lieutenant remained in Dublin to perform all the popular demonstrations; but he was only nominally the head of the Government—he was no more than the channel of communication between the English Ministry and the authorities of Ireland. Step by step they were taking all power and authority out of the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. They had made him, in fact, a mere electioneering agent. Even now, after the important debates that had taken place on the question, a Minister in the Crown could state that the whole question was whether a Company that had failed in its contract should continue to receive a subsidy. This was not a fair way of putting the question. The question was whether the people of Ireland were to have any benefit from the Union or not—whether Ireland was to be treated as part of the United Kingdom or as a colony?

LORD PORTMAN rose to order. He protested against the noble Earl addressing their Lordships when there was no Question before them. Such a course was attended with great inconvenience to the public service.

LORD BROUGHAM: How does the noble Lord know that the noble Earl on the cross benches does not mean to conclude with a Motion for the repeal of the Union?

EXCISE AND STAMPS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD BROUGHAM hoped that Government would not lose sight of the important petition which he presented a few nights ago, signed by 12,000 persons, praying that in districts where two-thirds of the inhabitants desired it they might have power to prohibit the licensing of houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors within that district. The subject was one of the deepest social and national importance. That eminent philanthropist, Mr. M. D. Hill, declared that in all his attempts to prevent crime, to reform criminals, and to protect property, he found the demon drink starting up to thwart his efforts.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

PROTEST ENTERED, 17th JUNE,

Against the Passing of the Customs' and Inland Revenue Bill.

"Dissentient—

"1st. Because, whilst it is the manifest duty of Parliament to relieve the people from all unnecessary burdens, yet reductions of taxation are justifiable only when consistent with the efficiency of the public service, with the maintenance of public credit, when effected in strict accordance with constitutional principles, and with the independence and freedom of action of both branches of the Legislature.

"2nd. Because these indispensable conditions do not appear to have been sufficiently regarded or carefully adhered to, in the Bill now before the House.

"3rd. Because neither our late experience, nor any statements made in debate, nor any evidence produced in support of this Bill, afford sufficient proof that a surplus exists such as to justify Parliament in sacrificing £2,463,000 of net annual revenue, of which £1,330,000 is produced by the Excise on paper—a duty steadily progressive during many successive years—thereby proving convincingly that neither the amount of the tax, nor yet the law under which it is collected, have arrested production, and whilst prohibitions or the imposition by Foreign States of export duties on the raw material, check a natural fall of price, and the relief which might, otherwise, be given to the consumer.

"4th. Because it is the more unsafe to rely on the existence of an available surplus in the present year, justifying the abandonment of £2,463,000 of net annual revenue, when it is remembered that on the 10th of February, 1860, a surplus then estimated at £454,000 was, on the 15th of July, converted into a deficiency of £1,286,000; and that the excess of expenditure over income has, on the 31st of March, 1861, risen to the alarming amount of £2,558,384—a deficiency which would have been still greater had not (1st) the future receipts of revenue been anticipated by calling up duties on property, malt and hops to the amount of £3,148,000 (2nd) the Revenue been augmented by drafts on the Exchequer balance to the amount of £1,300,000; (3rd) by applying to the public service unexpected repayments of debt from a Foreign Power; and also (4th) by the consequence of the decision of this House in rejecting in 1860 the proposed repeal of the Paper Duties a decision made in the exercise of the undoubted rights and privileges of the House of Lords, and (lastly) the postponement of the payment of a debt of £1,000,000 due on Exchequer bonds.

"5th. Because it appears in a high degree improbable that, during the present year (with a future surplus which the most sanguine have not estimated as exceeding £408,000, or an expenditure of £69,875,000) our financial resources can be restored to that credit which befits our dignity or provides adequately for our national interests, in the present state of the continents of North America and of Europe. We may be driven again to draw on our Exchequer balances, again to postpone the payment of our lawful debts when due, or to pay them with borrowed money; the property and War Taxes may again be continued or augmented, and yet after resorting to these somewhat questionable expedients, services still unprovided for may require increased burdens; the commutation of the Stade Duties, the increased interest on Exchequer bills, which have too long remained at a discount, further sums required for the interest of the loan for our national defences, will all demand the attention of Parliament, and require to be placed upon a more secure foundation than the promised remittances from China, or the still more uncertain anticipations of the state of the weather during the next harvest.

"6th. Because, though it is proposed by the present Bill to repeal £1,133,000 per annum, property tax, and £1,330,000 duties on paper, thus establishing a somewhat plausible equality in the apportionment of relief between direct and indirect taxation, yet this will be found, on reflection, to be an equality, rather apparent than real; the first of these taxes being temporary, the latter permanent, and it hence appearing but too evident that any future national wants will be supplied by an increase and prolongation of the property tax, well described as fraught with 'political dangers leading to a conclusion that the income tax, though an admirable instrument for national purposes upon a great and national emergency, is a dangerous instrument in time of peace.'—[Hansard's Debates, 3rd February, 1859.]

"7th. Because, in addition to the preceding objections to the Bill before us, as arising from the present state of our finance and the inadequacy of the promised surplus of £408,000, objections equally serious, though of a different character, may be urged against the form which the measure assumes, and the mode in which it has been prepared.

"8th. Because the freedom and independence with which the two Houses of Parliament are enabled to perform their respective duties are essential to the dignity of each, and have invariably been appealed to by the highest legal and Parliamentary authorities, as indispensable to the harmonious working of our Constitution.

"9th. Because, though the rules of Parliament which preclude the annexation of distinct and contrasted subjects, as tacks to Bills of aid and supply, have been asserted and enforced by this House, yet it cannot be denied that precedents may be shown in which various financial measures have occasionally been united in one Bill, without the raising of any objection in this House. This will be found exceptional in some cases, as in the consolidation and re-enactment of existing laws, where no change is practically made in the amount of revenue raised; exceptional in others where the enactments embrace many thousand separate cases which could not, without great public inconvenience, be dealt with in distinct Bills. Some of these instances appear to be founded upon the questionable argument of convenience only; some to be highly dangerous in principle; and in all it behoves this House to watch with the utmost vigilance all such measures, and to guard strictly and firmly against a violation of the principle laid down in their Standing Order, 27th April, 1699, reasserted on various subsequent occasions, and now forming an important part of the law and custom of Parliament, and declaring—'That the annexing of any clause or clauses to a Bill of aid or supply, the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the said Bill of aid and supply, is unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the Government.'

"10th. Because the same principle asserted in the Standing Orders of the Lords has received the most unqualified assent of high authorities in the Commons. In 1787 [Hansard's Parliamentary History, p. 508], in relation to the proposal of blending two distinct subjects in one Bill, Mr. Fox stated—'This would not only be a bad precedent for the Commons, but would as absolutely preclude the Lords from free debate, as if the Commons had followed the example of Cromwell, and silenced a necessary and Constitutional branch of the Legislature.' On a subsequent occasion the same high authority spoke 'of the difficulty in which the House of Lords would be placed by the blending of the two objects in one Bill,' adding that—'Instead of affording the Lords reason to complain of the Commons for narrowing their grounds both of debate and of voting, the House ought studiously to avoid giving cause for such complaint.'—[Parliamentary History, 1787.]

"11th. Because it cannot be urged that although a Bill of aid and supply and a Bill for a repeal of a tax both relate to finance, they are, therefore, to be considered as identical in their Parliamentary character, and fitting to be discussed in a combined rather than in a separate form. Practically these Bills are opposite and antagonistic. The one grants, the other takes away; the one adopts and recites the following preamble, which invariably distinguishes Bills of aid and supply from all other legislative proceedings—'We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom, towards making good the supply we have cheerfully granted, do humbly beseech you that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the advice and consent of the Lords and Commons, and by the authority of the same,' &c., &c.

"A Bill for the repeal of duties, on the contrary, neither has, nor logically or reasonably can have, such a preamble. It would evidently be absurd to recite as a grant that which is a diminution of taxation. The Assent of the Crown is also given to a Bill of aid and supply in the ancient form of 'La Reine remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur benevolence, et ainsi le veult.' To a Bill for the repeal of taxation the Royal Assent is given in the simpler but differing words of 'La Reine le veult.'

"12th. Because the usual course taken by successive Ministers and Houses of Parliament has been to deal with the repeals of Taxes in separate Bills, and to send up the Bill for repealing taxation as a distinct measure. Of these precedents the following examples may be referred to:—

In 1802—Property Duty.

1822—Malt Duty.

1824—Salt Duty.

1830—Excise Duty on Beer.

1830       "       "       Leather.

1831       "       "       Printed Cotton.

1831       "       "       Candles.

1833       "       "       Starch.

1833       "       "       Tiles.

1833       "       "       House Tax.

1836—Excise Duty on Stained Paper.

1845       "       "       Glass.

1845       "       "       Auctions.

1850       "       "       Bricks.

1851       "       "       Window Tax.

1853       "       "       Soap.

1855—Newspaper Stamp Duties.

"13th. Because a practice of combining in one Legislative measure various and discordant subjects, more especially when the Bill is one of Aid and Supply, cannot but produce some risk that such Bills may be dealt with as a whole, and possibly rejected in consequence of some partial objection; a result which, though strictly in conformity with the indisputable privileges of this House, may occasionally lead to public inconvenience, and to the danger of an interruption of that good understanding which it is of such importance to preserve unimpaired between the co-ordinate branches of the Legislature.

THE HOMELESS POOR.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of two poor Women, brought up before the Worship Street Police Court on Friday last, who had been found in a state of great destitution on the pavement in front of the Whitechapel Workhouse, having been refused admission by the Master, and to the remarks of Mr. Knox, the Police Magistrate, who is reported to have said that such cases were of constant occurrence; and whether he has caused an inquiry to be made?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had directed the Poor Law Inspector for the Metropolis to communicate with the Magistrate to whom reference had been made, who stated that he had been incorrectly reported. Mr. Knox did not cast any reflection whatever on the workhouses generally, or on the authorities connected with them, but simply referred to one particular workhouse—that of Whitechapel—of which he had on one or two occasions lately had reason to complain. As to the case itself, he believed there was also some inaccuracy in the report. The Superintendent of the casual ward admitted that two women were brought to him on the evening in question, but, as there was no room, he was unable to take them in. As to the statement in the report, that on the policeman taking the women to the workhouse they were there refused admittance without any allegation being made of want of room, the authorities at the workhouse had deponed on oath that the women never were brought there at all, and that they had never seen them. They also stated, that when the police brought cases of that kind to the workhouse they were invariably received, and produced a book, from which it appeared that within the last six weeks they had taken in no fewer than eighteen such cases which had been brought by the police. There was a difficulty in pursuing the investigation further, as the women, who were tramps, on receiving some gratuity from the magistrate went away, and it was impossible to find them.

ARMY—BREVET MAJORITIES.

QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR BULLER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, in reference to the Registered List of Officers of the Bombay Army serving in Bengal who have been recommended for brevet majorities on attaining the rank of regimental Captains, Why those officers of the Bombay Army now serving in the Bombay Presidency, and who have been equally recommended for the same reward, have not also been publicly registered?

SIR CHARLES WOOD was understood to say that, in order to entitle an officer to the distinction in question, it was necessary that he should be recommended by the Commander-in-Chief in India, and that it had been conferred only on two Officers who had been so recommended.

NAVY—IRON-CASED SHIPS.

QUESTION.

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the fact that certain improvements in the construction of iron-clad Ships and in the working of their guns, proposed by Mr. Alfred Hamilton, have been lately under the consideration of the Board of Admiralty for two months, and have been rejected by the Board? And whether there is any objection to lay Copies of the Reports and Correspondence of those Officials who have been charged with the examination of the said improvements before the House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that Mr. Hamilton had made two distinct proposals to the Admiralty—one for raising and lowering guns by machinery, and the other for a peculiar construction of iron-cased ships. Both had been under the consideration of the Admiralty, and in the opinion of the Board, neither was likely to be efficient in Her Majesty's Navy. The Board thought it would be decidedly objectionable to produce the Reports and Correspondence, because, if that were done, it would be impossible to refuse a similar concession in the case of every other inventor whose proposal was rejected by the Government.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he wished to ask the Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to go on with this Bill that night?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was most anxious to have it discussed as early as possible. He should make every endeavour to bring it on.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: At what hour?

MR. CARDWELL: I won't bring it on after twelve o'clock.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General, What course he proposed to adopt with regard to this Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I have not had an opportunity of communicating with Her Majesty's Government upon the results of the Amendments which have been introduced in the House of Lords. I am generally aware that what we sent up to the House of Lords as a complete Measure, has in point of fact been so dealt with, that not a single feature which appeared to me valuable in the Bill—"Order!" "Chair."

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Bill had not come down from the other House.

CRYSTAL PALACE EXHIBITION.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE FORSTER said, he wished—

ed to know, What steps would be taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent a repetition of the degrading exhibition of M. Blondin on Saturday last, so far, at all events, as related to the exposure of a child to imminent danger?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, my attention has been directed to the circumstance to which the hon. Baronet has referred; and I am also aware that it is proposed to repeat the exhibition at the Crystal Palace to-morrow. I have in consequence caused a letter of warning to be written to the Directors of the Crystal Palace, by which, I trust, that the exposure to danger of a child of tender years may be prevented. I have a sanguine hope that the letter which has been written will be efficacious to that extent.

REMOVAL OF THE LAW COURTS. QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to inquire of the hon. and learned Attorney General, Whether, as there has as yet been no statement from the Government upon the subject, though notice has been given on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman to bring in a Bill, he will put it as the first Order for Thursday, and make a statement as to the manner in which the Government propose to carry out their scheme? He would also call the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention to the Preamble of the Bill which the House was invited to pass, and which stands for a third reading. That Preamble contains the declaration that the House approves of the entire scheme which the Attorney General intends to submit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was about three months since he had given notice of a Motion to bring in a Bill on this subject. He had begged and entreated that he might have an opportunity of bringing in that Bill, but the exigencies of the public business had been such that no opportunity had as yet been afforded him. He would mention the matter to his noble Friend at the head of the Government, and he hoped that an opportunity would be given him to bring the Bill in next Thursday. In the meantime the third reading of the Bill which had been referred to had better stand over.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Chelsea and Kensington to form a Borough to return one Member).

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he regretted to say that, owing to the indisposition of the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) who had given notice of his intention to propose a clause conferring one of the seats on the University of London, he was unable to attend. Several persons, however, who took an interest in the matter had requested him (Sir Francis Goldsmid) to move a similar clause. But in consequence of the multiplicity of Amendments of which notice had been given, and of other circumstances, with a statement of which it was not necessary to trouble the Committee, he thought it best not at present to move the Amendment, the object of which was to give a Member to the London University. He would reserve to himself the right of making the statement to which he had referred at any time at which it might appear desirable that it should be made, and if, when the Committee arrived at the end of the Bill—if they did arrive at that point—a seat remained vacant, he would move a short clause giving it to the London University.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that in the absence of the hon. Member for Northampton, he intended to submit the Amendment of which that hon. Member had given notice.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to move the insertion of the town of Burnley, in Lancashire, in the place of Chelsea, which had been struck out.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that his Amendment for the insertion of Cork preceded that of the hon. Member for Finsbury.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. and gallant Member that he was not in the House to take precedence. The hon. Member for Finsbury was now in possession of the Chair.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished to know if he should be in order to moving that the Chairman should report Progress, and ask leave to sit again that day six months?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he understood that the hon. Member for Finsbury had possession of the Committee.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that on Friday evening he asked the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intended to proceed with the Bill, and, if so, what place he intended to substitute in it for Chelsea and Kensington. The answer was, that the Government intended to proceed with the Bill, and that they would state in Committee the substitute which they intended to propose for Chelsea and Kensington. The person who ought to be addressing the Committee was the right hon. Baronet. The House was in Committee, and he asked the Government what place they proposed to enfranchise instead of Chelsea and Kensington, which had been struck out? For his own part, he thought that the Motion to report Progress, or, which would have been better, to proceed to the other orders of the day, would have been a very proper Motion to have adopted. He could not understand Ministers bringing in a Bill of that sort for what they called Reform, though it certainly was a very trumpery measure, and submitting to the striking out of the first clause which gave representation to wealth and population without at once throwing up the measure. The consequence was that the Committee was about to be dragged through the mire of a parcel of propositions which were to be made one after another, without any prospect of arriving at a satisfactory result, and all the time which was so spent would be wasted. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) desired to give a Member to the London University; but if such a proposition had been made he (Mr. T. Duncombe) should certainly have been inclined to move as an Amendment that Burnley should be put in its place. The wealth and population of Burnley entitled it far more than the London University to representation. The London University belonged to the district which he had the honour to represent, and, therefore, his vote would be unpopular; but he wanted to know what were the claims of the London University? It was said that it had the same claims as Oxford and Cambridge. Their right to representation was, however, conferred upon those Universities by charter, and if it was intended that it should possess them, why were not similar rights conferred in a similar manner upon the University of London? In the Reform Bills of 1852, 1854, and 1860, to the introduction of one of which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was a party, Birkenhead and Burnley took precedence of the London University, and why should their position be changed? He called upon the Government to state the name of the place the claims of which they were prepared to support. The murder must be out that evening. He did not like the measure at all. It was a frittering away of the great cause of Reform. He would rather wait for better times, when the House of Commons would be obliged to do what they now refused. That House, though called together for the purpose of Reform, was not likely to pass a Reform Bill, and, therefore, the Government might ask what their duty was. He should say their duty was to bring in a good comprehensive measure of Reform, to ask the House to read it a second time, and, if they refused, to take the sense of the country. The hon. Member concluded by moving the insertion of "Burnley" in the place of "Chelsea and Kensington," which had been struck out of the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had stated upon a former occasion that the Government did not bring in this Bill as a comprehensive measure of Parliamentary Reform, they brought it in as a measure to supply the vacancies in that House, which had been occasioned by two Acts of Parliament, under the operation of which four seats had become vacant. That was the whole extent of their proposal, and they were now quite ready to go through the Bill, taking in succession the different proposals which might be made in the place of that which was negatived on Thursday evening, and to give the best opinion which they could upon each of them. As to this being a pitiful measure, as the hon. Gentleman had implied, he would only remark that if giving an additional Member to the great county division, the West Riding of Yorkshire and another to South Lancashire was a pitiful proceeding, then that word was properly applied to this Bill; but it certainly appeared to him from the Amendments of which notice had been given that there was on the part of different portions of the country no want of solicitude to obtain a representation in that House. The question before the Committee was, whether the seat which the Government had proposed to give to Chelsea and Kensington should be given to the borough of Burnley. There was no doubt that the town of Burnley was a considerable and an increasing place. The reason why the Government did not propose to assign a Member to Burnley was that Burnley was in North Lancashire, upon the border of South Lancashire, and that it was a manufacturing town, its principal industry being the production of cotton goods. The Bill already proposed to give one seat to South Lancashire, another to the West Riding, where much the same kind of manufacturing industry was carried on, and the third seat to Birkenhead; so that had the Government proposed to give the fourth seat to Burnley, they would all have been assigned to a limited district in Lancashire, Cheshire, and the West Riding. Therefore, though he did not dispute that the claim of Burnley to additional representation was entitled to consideration whenever a more extensive scheme was brought before the House, he did not feel justified, under present circumstances, in giving his support to the proposition.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he thought it would have been very advantageous if the House at the outset of the discussion had agreed to the Motion of the noble Lord (Earl Jermyn) for adjourning the further progress of the Bill to that day six months. At present the Government were coy in proposing any fresh Motion, fearing they would suffer a further defeat, which they most certainly would; while hon. Gentlemen with a favourite seat to propose were equally coy in commencing the battle, hoping that when all the other Motions had been disposed of, their's might be accepted as a pis aller. Hon. Members must regret the illness of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, but it certainly was fortunate for the University of London that he was invalided, because, as his Motion was the first to come on, unquestionably he would have been the first to be defeated. The Scotch Members, with the shrewdness which distinguished them, put their heads together and abstained from giving notice of any Amendments which would come on early in the debate, intimating their intention of proposing certain clauses, which they would try to carry after the other Amendments had run their course and been defeated. It was not fair on the part of the Government to leave matters to proceed in this confused manner. To put an end to this state of uncertainty he very much wished that somebody would move to report Progress. Hon. Members behind him suggested that he should do so himself, but as he had a proposition to make he would leave that very popular Motion to them, by way of Amendment, and he should be very happy to vote in its favour. With the consent of the hon. Members for the Queen's County and Dungarvan, he should move that the blank be filled up by inserting "the county of Cork," and if it had not a good case the Motion might as well be negatived and its advocates be put out of pain. He did not see how it was possible to reject the claim which the county of Cork possessed, unless the House adopted the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the other night, that these being English seats, Ireland need not expect any share of increased representation. He had never advocated the repeal of the Union, but if it were once understood that the different portions of the United Kingdom were not to be identical in rights and privileges, he should advocate a complete and actual severance, as far as was consistent with loyalty to the Queen. He based his claim to a third Member for the county of Cork upon figures taken from Thom's Almanack—the most accurate work on this subject which he could find; and if Ireland had any representative in the Cabinet attention would undoubtedly have been directed to the subject. Excluding the city of Cork and the other boroughs already represented, he found that the county of Cork contained of property rated under Schedule A £832,045, 15,716 electors, and a population in the year 1851 of 563,576. The county Down stood next in point of property and number of electors, but was deficient in population. Tipperary was third in wealth and number of electors, and second in population. He had heard it said that Mayo was by some considered to have a stronger claim to increased representation, but a brief comparison would show that this idea was mistaken. Cork contained £832,000 worth of property; Mayo only £224,000; Cork had 15,700 registered electors, while Mayo had only 3,779; the population of the county of Cork was 563,000, while that of Mayo was but 274,000. Again, it was said that Cork, taking into account its borough Members, returned a sufficient share of representatives to that House. In respect of population, valuation, and acreable extent the county of Cork might be regarded as one-tenth of the whole of Ireland; yet the number of Irish representatives was 105, while Cork, including the city and boroughs, had only eight, of which the county had only two. He did not want to take a Member from any other Irish constituency, but he wished to have an additional Member given to the county which he had the honour to represent. He believed that

Cork had a more overwhelming case than could be made for any other county; and, therefore, he hoped his proposal would receive the support of the Irish Members. Then, as regarded the English counties, the county of Lancaster, including its boroughs, had no less than twenty-six Members, and there was a proposal on the paper to give it another. ["Divide, divide!"] If hon. Members wished him to sit down he would do so; but it was not fair to refuse him a hearing after he had been at the trouble of making up his case. He was about to state facts which were already known to himself; and, therefore, if he were not allowed to state them, the loss would not be his but that of hon. Members who refused to listen to him, and who were at present ignorant of that which he wished to tell them. He ought not, perhaps, to accuse the Committee at large of interrupting him; for he believed the buzz of "Divide" came from two or three Members on the back benches. He had gone carefully through the English and Scotch counties; but had not found one of them that could contest with the county of Cork the claim for another Member. Comparing the county of Cork with what were called the "unicorn" counties of England, returning each three Members, he found that it was superior to any one of them in regard to valuation, to number of electors, and population. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would come forward and manfully declare in favour of Cork, and he could assure them that if they did so it would go far to do away with that unfavourable opinion which he had been forced to form of them, especially with regard to their Irish policy. He did not see how the refusal to give Cork an additional Member could be justified, except on the disloyal principle laid down the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that Ireland was a distinct and separate country, and not to be treated as an integral part of the empire. He trusted no one would oppose his proposition on the ground that the county of Cork would return a Catholic to that House. The hon. Member for Westmeath stated it the other night as a fact, that, while Protestant constituencies never returned Catholic Members, Catholic constituencies were often found returning Protestant Members. This fact was strongly borne out by Mr. Massey in his History of the Reign of George III., in which he said that while Dissenters of every kind were elected by the English people, and had no difficulty in finding seats, yet "during the thirty years that followed Catholic Emancipation, not more than two or three Roman Catholics had been sent to Parliament by Protestant constituencies." The county of Cork and its boroughs returned eight Members; and of these eight the Catholics might, if they chose, return seven. Perhaps they could not return a Catholic Member for Bandon. That borough returned a good Tory Protestant of the right sort. The borough of Youghal returned a Liberal Protestant, and Kinsale sent a Liberal Presbyterian. The Catholic borough of Mallow returned an Ultramontane Protestant, and the Catholic constituency of the county of Cork returned as his colleague a Gentleman whom he might also describe as an Ultramontane Protestant. ["Divide!"] He knew that in dilating on the unwillingness of Protestant constituencies to elect Roman Catholic representatives he was uttering unpleasant statements; still, the House of Commons was the fairest audience in the world, and if he had uttered equally unpalatable statements to any audience elsewhere, he should not succeed in getting an audience at all. He also could joke and jest when he chose, but he wanted the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to answer his figures, and to state some better reason why the county of Cork should not have an additional representative. He defied contradiction when he asserted that the Roman Catholics exercised the franchise in a more ultra-liberal manner than Protestant electors. Perhaps no Irish Catholic candidate had ever had sufficient spirit to present himself to an English constituency. If he were rejected for a Roman Catholic constituency he might try some English constituency like Marylebone, in order to see whether there were not some really liberal constituencies in this country. It might be said that Protestants would not elect a Roman Catholic because, although there were liberal Protestants, there were no such persons as liberal Roman Catholics. But many Roman Catholics were kept out of Parliament at that moment because they would not adopt the politics of the Ultramontane party. While there were Protestants too liberal for Irish Protestant constituencies, there were, on the other hand, Roman Catholics who were quite liberal enough to represent English Protestant constituencies. There were Roman Catholics who, although attached to their religious creed, altogether dissented from the Ultramontane policy in Italy. If the Committee would bear with him he would read—[cries of "Oh!"] He was saying what would, perhaps, be unpopular among his constituency, and, if the Committee stopped him, he must not hereafter be charged with concealing his opinions on this subject. He had that morning cut out of a Cork newspaper of Saturday a statement by a writer who would not object to his name being quoted. ["Divide, divide!"] It was difficult to address that House. It had been said that eloquence was rather in the audience than the speaker. He, therefore, defied any Irishman to attempt to be eloquent in that House. As soon as he got under way some hon. Gentleman on the back benches always interrupted him in a rude manner. He wished that hon. Members would not interrupt him until he had done, to use an Irish mode of expression. [Cries of "Agree!"] If hon. Members would not hear him he might as well sit down. The hon. Member concluded by moving to insert "County of Cork," in lieu of the words "Parishes of Chelsea and Kensington in the," which had been struck out.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could not put his Amendment until the other propositions before the Committee were disposed of.

MR. AYRTON said he rose to move that the Chairman should report Progress, because he thought something was due to the House from Her Majesty's Government in order to extricate them from the state of bewilderment in which they were placed by the four propositions which had been submitted to the chair. First, they had the proposition of the hon. Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid); then came the noble Lord, the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield), who shadowed out a proposal, but did not make one. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe) next followed with a statement in favour of the proposal, which he did not intend to have put, but which was accidentally put by the Chair; and, lastly, the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. V. Scully), which could not be put from the Chair. On a former occasion he had suggested that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) should go on with his proposal, but the Government had then desired Progress to be reported, in order that they might consider what course should be adopted. It was generally expected that the Government would come down to-day and make a statement of their intentions in regard to this Bill. The Government submitted to the Committee a distinct proposal for dealing with the four seats, and he should have thought that it was intended to stand as a whole; but as the proposal was negatived in part the Committee was now entitled to ask the Government what step they intended to take for filling up the vacancy thereby created in the plan. In dealing with a Bill which affected the constitutional Government of the whole country, was there to be a scramble for the seat among different Members, while the Government only gave utterance to vague expressions which would not commit them to anything, leaving the House to get out of the difficulty in the best way it could? That was a case with which no private Member could deal properly, and it was the bounden duty of the Government to consider, according to the great principles of justice, what should be the representation of the country. He, therefore, made the Motion for reporting Progress, in order to invite the noble Lord the Prime Minister to inform the Committee what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the four seats, and unless he got some distinct answer he should divide upon the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the difficulty of which the hon. Member complained had not been in any way created by the Government, nor were they responsible for it. The difficulty had arisen out of the course, the unusual nature of which he had pointed out when the Motion was made, of moving to omit certain words in the clause without proposing to substitute other words for them. The consequence was that a blank had been created which different hon. Members proposed to fill up in different ways, and it was necessary that their Motions should be taken in the order of precedence. It was not in the power of the Government to prevent those Motions being made. The Government were perfectly ready to state their views upon each Motion as it was made. The Motion before the House was that the blank should be filled up by "Burnley," and if the hon. Member for Finsbury should press that Motion he (Sir George Lewis) should give his vote against it. With regard to the question of the county Cork, they had virtually divided on that—but if the Motion should be repeated he would be quite prepared to state his views upon it. Whenever the Motion of the noble Lord, the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield), or that of the hon. Member for South Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) should be made the Government would be ready to vote in favour of the proposition for giving a third Member to Middlesex.

MR. DISRAELI said, that after the course which he had taken a week before of persuading his Friends to support the Motion then made to report Progress, he would take the liberty of making one remark. Certainly on that occasion he was under the impression, and he thought the House largely shared in it, that the Government intended generally to consider their position with regard to the clause, so that when the House went into Committee again, they would receive a distinct statement on the subject from the Government. What the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State repeated to night—namely, his complaint as to the manner in which the opposition, the successful opposition, to the proposition of the Government as to the representation of Chelsea was to be regarded—appeared to him not to be sound. The course taken might have been inconvenient to the Government, but no one would pretend that it was unusual or unparliamentary. It was adopted with a due regard to precedent by the Gentleman who made the proposition, and no one questioned the full right of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. It was undoubtedly inconvenient for the Government that the Amendment should have been carried; but the resistance to the proposition on the part of the Government did not denote that the success of the proposition was an event of which they had not in some degree contemplated the probability. But although that success was inconvenient to the Government in the previous week, that was no reason why the Government should not, in the interval, have considered their position, and upon that question of all others—the representation of the people in Parliament—have been prepared with some suggestion which would have served as a guide to the House. If the Government were responsible for anything they were responsible for the policy pursued on that question. They had to consider the due distribution of the representation in the north and in the south, in the urban and in the rural population; they had to consider whether there were distinct interests not represented, or not adequately represented at that moment. These considerations formed the peculiar province of statesmen, and of a Cabinet of statesmen, who, if they did not bring forward large and comprehensive measures, had at least on some of these points taken large and comprehensive views. But if the whole matter was simply to be thrown down into the centre of the House, for any Gentleman, who considered he could bring forward a title for a share in the four seats, to take up, without due reference to the general interests of the community, there would be no end to the inconvenience in reference to public business, and there might be possible injury to the public welfare. He, therefore, intreated the Government to assume the responsibility which belonged to them, and bring before the House some proposition made with their authority. The Government had no right to complain of the manner in which the proposal respecting Chelsea and Kensington was treated by the House. The debate was not of a character, especially on the part of the Government, to convey to the House the conviction that the proposition was one which the Government were anxious to enforce with all the weight of their authority and position; but let them profit by the lesson, let them well consider the subject, and again bring forward a proposal on which he did not say that there should be staked the existence of the Government (which the Government always fancied in danger when advice was given), but with respect to which they might say that they sincerely believed that its acceptance was of importance to the general welfare; and he was bound that the House would give it a fair consideration. If Government were not prepared to pursue that course, then he thought that the best step the Committee could take would be to assent to the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. He did not wish the Committee to come to a conclusion hostile to the Government, but he would suggest that they should name a day for resuming the Committee, when they would submit their proposition to the House, and the House would give it fair and ample discussion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he begged leave to assure the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee that the Government made no complaint of the manner in which the debate was conducted on a former evening. Those four seats having been long vacant, the Government thought it their duty not to let the Session pass without proposing to the House a measure for allotting them. They chose four places which, in their opinion, were fitting to receive these four Members. The House appeared to the Government to concur with them in regard to three of them. With regard to two there was an actual vote; with regard to Birkenhead it seemed to be generally agreed that that was a fit place to receive a Member. The House disagreed with the Government in regard to Chelsea and Kensington. The right hon. Gentleman might have wished that decision should be considered as a decision determining the fate of the Government, but other hon. Members having proposed places in lieu of Chelsea and Kensington, the Government did not wish to impose a heavier responsibility upon those who, however reluctantly, were prepared to assume it. There being now several propositions before the House as to places to which different Members suggested that this single seat should be given, the Government had taken into consideration which of the propositions was on the whole the best suited for adoption by the House, and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had stated that the Government were prepared to support the proposal of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, that a third Member should be given to Middlesex. He hoped that the House would concur with the Government in supporting that proposition, and he trusted that it would not be necessary for the Government to pursue the course indicated by the right hon. Gentleman of adjourning the debate further for the purpose of considering some great and comprehensive measure as to the disposal of one single and solitary seat. Such were the intentions of the Government, and when the hon. Member for Northamptonshire submitted his proposition to the House it should receive their support.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to observe that he had that morning received a communication from his constituents at Burnley, complaining of a statement which had a few evenings before been made by the Secretary for the Home Department to the effect that the population of that town amounted to—he believed it was—only 26,000 persons. That statement must, he felt assured, be the result of some misapprehension on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, for it appeared that the population of Burnley was at least 38,000, and that if a somewhat larger district were taken it would amount to nearer 40,000. He had also been requested to call the attention of Parliament to one or two facts. The borough of Burnley had always stood the first in the list of those boroughs to which in any scheme of Parliamentary Reform, from the first Reform Bill down to the present time, it had been proposed to give a representative. Even in 1832 it was discussed in the Cabinet of the day whether Burnley should not have a Member. The decision was against the town. But in every Reform Bill since introduced Burnley had stood first. In the Bills which the noble Lord the Member for the City of London had introduced since Burnley stood first; it was first in the Bill introduced by the Government of the Earl of Derby; and at the present moment the inhabitants felt that the town ought to have been placed among the four places now selected for a representative. The case now rested in the hands of the hon. Member for Finsbury; but that hon. Gentleman was, he thought, putting it in a somewhat disadvantageous position by taking so early an opportunity of pressing its claims on the attention of the Committee. It would seem that there was to be a regular scramble for the seats to be disposed of by the Bill, and, under those circumstances, those towns would, he believed, stand the best chance the names of which came last on the list. Be that, however, as it might, if the hon. Member for Finsbury went to a division he should give him his support.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Burnley is not yet included in the returns of the census of this year. The numbers I quoted are given correctly from the Return of 1851, 20,828; and Birkenhead, in the same return, is placed the highest, 24,175.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN: That was Burnley Proper. The error, no doubt, had arisen from the population of an adjoining parish to Burnley, but forming part of the borough, having been given separately.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that when on Friday the Committee rejected the claim of the University of London he inquired whether Government intended to support the proposition of giving an extra Member to Middlesex, and if they had replied in the affirmative he would not have moved the insertion of "Burnley." The four vacancies had been created in borough representation, and he thought, therefore, that the seats ought to have been given to the other boroughs. He could not see that Ireland had the least claim; but Chelsea having been negatived it had been proposed to give the seat to the county of Middlesex, and he should withdraw his Motion in favour of Burnley in favour of that proposition.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought no course could be productive of a more useless waste of time than to leave it to hon. Members generally to set up ninepins to be bowled down one after another at discretion. If, therefore, the Government should be a second time beaten in supporting the claims of a particular locality he hoped they would abandon the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the course proposed by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) was the one proposed by his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. In the middle of the debate the hon. Member for Northamptonshire moved to omit certain words, and did not propose to fill up the vacancy with other words particularizing the place he wished to insert. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire would, no doubt, bring on his proposal as to Middlesex as soon as he had the opportunity, but so long as any hon. Member had an Amendment to come earlier it could not be submitted. If the hon. Member for Northamptonshire was allowed to propose the insertion of the words of which he had given notice as to the county of Middlesex, it would form a substantive Amendment. But it was not in the power of Government to overrule the forms of the House.

MR. DISRAELI said, he must beg leave to differ with the right hon. Gentleman. The course proposed was exactly contrary to that taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. If the view of the right hon. Gentleman was right—and he did not dispute it—it showed that the repeated complaints of the Home Secretary as to the conduct of the Committee had no foundation whatever. It seemed that now it was held that the course taken by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire was not an unusual and inconvenient course, but the only course he could adopt.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not understand that his right hon. Friend (Sir George Lewis) had blamed the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. That hon. Gentleman stated the reasons why he thought Chelsea should not have the Member, and he gave some of the reasons why he thought Middlesex should have a third Member. The Government proposed, when he (Mr. Knightley) brought forward a Motion to give a third Member to Middlesex, to support that Motion, their own original proposition which they thought best not having met with the favour of the Committee. Nothing was more regular than the course adopted.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, if ever he understood anything distinctly, it was that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had complained, and, on more than one occasion, of the course taken by the Members of the House. Therefore, he was now very glad to hear the admission of the right hon. Baronet that he concurred in the views of his right hon. Friend. But he agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury that a great deal of valuable time had been lost; and if the noble Lord at the head of the Government had made earlier the communication which the Committee had just heard from him, the whole of the early part of the discussion might have been saved. The first statement was that the Government were prepared to accept any Amendment. It was quite clear hon. Members had, without knowing it, been present at the sitting of a Cabinet Council within the last hour or two, and that upon the Treasury bench the steps which the Government intended to take with respect to the point under discussion had within that time been decided upon. He regretted that the Cabinet had not met and considered the subject a little sooner.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the hon. Member opposite had misrepresented his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The Committee would recollect that his right hon. Friend stated distinctly that it was the intention of the Government to support the proposition of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY expressed his belief that unless the Government pledged themselves, in the event of the proposition of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire being negatived, to withdraw the Bill, the claims of the county of Middlesex would be more regarded than those of Chelsea and Kensington. Whatever proposition were made, there were thirty-seven Scotch Members who would still adhere to their wish to have the Scotch Universities represented.

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted the Committee would permit him to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress, as the object of it had been attained by the statement of the Government that they intended to give a third Member to Middlesex.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he then rose to move that a third Member should be given to Middlesex.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he rose to order. He had an Amendment to propose which appeared on the paper before that of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. The Amendment which he wished to submit to the Committee was the second of those of which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) had given notice—namely, to “leave out from ‘county’ in line 29, to ‘borough’ in line 31, inclusive.” The substantial effect of that Amendment, if adopted, would be to dispose of the claims of the county of Middlesex to a third Member. It was, in fact, a direct negative to the proposition which the Government had announced their intention to support. He did not think that a third Member was a good thing for any county; but, if he had to make a choice, he should prefer the West Riding of Yorkshire to Middlesex. There was another constituency, however, which he thought had stronger claims still—he meant the Scotch Universities. Middlesex was almost part of the Metropolis, and the Committee had already decided that no addition should be made to the number of metropolitan Members.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Stirlingshire would only plunge the Committee into greater confusion than before. It was part of an Amendment of which notice had been given by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, and its adoption would leave the clause without any meaning, unless the hon. Gentleman followed it up by proposing the insertion of words in lieu of those which had been struck out—namely, “parishes of Chelsea and Kensington.”

MR. BLACKBURN said, he thought he had sufficiently distinctly expressed his preference for the Scotch Universities. The hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Stirling) had given notice of an Amendment to insert the Scotch Universities, and he (Mr. Blackburn) wished to clear the way for him.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that so far as he was able to see, the claim of the West Riding to the fourth seat was the strongest; but the House had decided against that. [Cries of “No, no!”] He hoped the House would not be induced to stultify its proceedings, as he thought there was some danger of doing. Next to the claims of the West Riding, there was none so valid as those of the county of Middlesex. He was born in that county, and he had had the honour of sometimes acting as Chairman of its Conservative registration, and, therefore, he felt that he addressed the Committee with a knowledge of the circumstances of that county. He rejoiced most sincerely that Her Majesty's Government had adopted the second best case among the counties of England. He hoped then that his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire would be allowed to proceed with his Motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the hon. Member for Stirlingshire was evidently endeavouring to get rid of the clause altogether. He ought, therefore, to reserve his proposal until they came to the end of clause, and meanwhile the hon. Member for Northamptonshire should be allowed to proceed with his Amendment.

MR. BLACKBURN said, on that understanding he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. KNIGHTLEY assured the Committee he would not detain them more than a very few minutes. The population of Middlesex, including the City of London and the represented boroughs was, according to the last census, £2,205,771; the next largest was the West Riding, and then South Lancashire. They had already given one additional Member to the West Riding and one to South Lancashire; and he thought the claims of Middlesex, on the grounds of population, property, and importance, unquestionably came next. The proposal of the Government was to enfranchise Chelsea and Kensington, but he did not see why those two parishes should have a monopoly of the new Member to the exclusion of the remaining population. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge had suggested that Middlesex should be divided, and that each division should return two Members. He cordially concurred in that suggestion. He thought it much preferable to any other proposal which had been made; but then they must cut their coat according to the amount of cloth they possessed. He ventured to submit his proposition with great deference, but, upon the whole, he thought it a fair compromise between the claims of the northern and southern parts of England on the one hand and of the towns and counties on the other. He should, therefore, move to leave out from "shall" in line 30 to "serve" in line 33; and insert "be entitled to return three Knights of the Shire instead of two."

Amendment proposed, in line 30, to leave out from "shall," to "to," in line 33, and insert the words "be entitled to return three Knights of the Shire instead of two."

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, the figures quoted by the hon. Gentleman included the City of London and the represented boroughs; but he was prepared to show that, excluding London and the represented boroughs, Middlesex had the next claim after the West Riding of Yorkshire. He was free to say that the West Riding had, perhaps, a higher claim; but, after the West Riding, he repeated the county of Middlesex had the strongest claims to additional representation. If they gave two new Members to the West Riding, the whole four would be assigned to the north of England, and it was a fair compromise to give one of them to Middlesex. There were seven counties which returned three Members—Berkshire, with 4,847 electors; Bucks, with 5,774 electors; Cambridgeshire, with 7,157; Dorsetshire, with 6,723; Herefordshire, with 7,722; Herts, with 6,071; and Oxfordshire, with 5,123 electors. Now, Middlesex had 15,328 electors, and North Lancashire only 12,183 electors. There were fifteen counties—Cheshire, Cornwall, Cumberland, Derbyshire, Durham, Essex, Hampshire, Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, Northumberland, Suffolk, Surrey, Sussex, Warwickshire, and Worcestershire—all returning four Members, and with fewer electors than Middlesex. The annual value of property rated under Schedule A, not within the limits of a Parliamentary borough was—in Middlesex £1,616,405; in North Lancashire, £1,269,367; in South Derbyshire, £1,541,024; in Parts of Lindsey, £1,525,925; and in West Kent, £1,356,859. The gross estimated rental not within the limits of a Parliamentary borough was, in North Lancashire £1,304,991, and in Middlesex £1,819,569. The population not within the limits of a Parliamentary borough was, in North Lancashire, 316,804, in Middlesex; 283,256. North Lancashire was larger in population but less than Middlesex in the number of electors, contributions to Schedule A, and gross estimated rental. He took these figures from three Parliamentary Returns, No. 141, February 17, 1859; No. 131, March 1, 1860; and No. 400, June 22, 1860; and he ventured to think they made out a strong claim in favour of an increase to the representation of Middlesex.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON thought it very desirable that the Committee should not come to a decision on the question under an erroneous impression of what was to follow. His hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was mistaken as to the cause of the West Riding of Yorkshire being disposed of. It was quite true that the Motion of the hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. Collins) had been negatived, but that hon. Member had on the paper a notice to move a clause, when the proper time came, to give another vote to the West Riding of Yorkshire. He must in candour say he agreed with the noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) that the claims of Middlesex were strong, and perhaps the best course would have been to divide the West Riding and Middlesex, and to give to each two Members. But that had not been done. He did not take the view of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire, but would oppose every proposition in order to support that of the hon. Member for Knaresborough, in order to give another Member to the West Riding.

MR. COLLINS said, he intended distinctly to raise the question whether the West Riding should or should not be divided. That question had not been decided. The only question which had been decided was that Clause 1 should not be postponed. If the West Riding were divided, one division would have 21,000 electors and another 19,000, while the area of the West Riding was some hundredfold larger than that of Middlesex. Yorkshire stood first on the list for increased representation; and those who agreed with him were entitled to vote against every proposal until a fair measure of justice were meted out to the West Riding.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he must remind the hon. Member for Knaresborough that the first clause had been agreed to, which assigned three Members to the West Riding and three to the Southern Division of Lancashire. That clause assumed that the West Riding, for the purpose of electing three Members, should not be divided; and if the hon. Member proposed that the Riding should be divided, it could only be for the election of a fourth Member, who could only be elected after the present Parliament.

MR. COLLINS: We should be quite prepared to wait that time.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would remind the right hon. Baronet that, though the Committee had arrived at the resolution to which he had referred, and passed the first clause, the hon. Member for Knaresborough would have a legitimate occasion to propose the clause of which he had given notice on bringing up the Report. Although the Committee had agreed, the House had not agreed that the West Riding should not be divided. He, himself, entirely objected to the principle of increasing the representation of counties by plurality of votes. He thought two Members enough to represent any place. In 1859, when he had the honour to bring forward a larger measure for the amendment of the representation of the people, there was a very general feeling in the House in favour of the view, that Members were sent to Parliament not to represent the power, but the opinions of a place, and two Members were sufficient for that purpose. If they once admitted plurality of votes in the representative body he did not see at what point they were to stop. It was very true that precedents were made in 1832, but they were bad precedents. The county he had the honour to represent was one of them. It had three Members, and had been placed in a very false position by that arrangement. He did not agree with respect to the Resolution which the Committee had passed, and he should support on the Report the Motion of the hon. Member for Knaresborough. In the present case he should certainly vote against giving a third Member to Middlesex, although it was not from want of appreciation of its claims and its importance, because had there been any arrangement brought forward to divide and give Middlesex two new Members, he should have been ready to support it.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he disapproved of the unicorn system, though he wanted a third Member for Cork, but then he wanted to divide that county afterwards. He went further than the right hon. Gentleman, and thought one Member sufficient for each place. He rose, however, to call attention to the fact that the county of Cork had a larger number of electors than the county of Middlesex. The Committee, by a previous division, had virtually decided not to give any more Members to Middlesex.

Mr. HUMBERSTON said, he wished to correct a statement which had been made by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield). He had no doubt that the noble Lord was right in saying that the number of electors was somewhat greater in Middlesex than in Cheshire. But the difference in that case was not a wide one; and it should be remembered that while Cheshire had only three boroughs returning Members Middlesex returned sixteen borough Members.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that he had to remind the Committee that Middlesex, which had a population of 2,000,000, was represented by only two Members, and that the labouring classes were being gradually driven out of the Metropolis into the surrounding country. Under these circumstances he believed that the Committee, by adopting the proposal under its consideration, would be giving a Member to the labouring population of the Metropolis; and he knew no claim so strong as that of Middlesex to obtain an addition to the number of its representatives.

Question put, "That the proposed words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 186; Noes 236: Majority 50.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that after the successive operations of which the clause had been the subject, he believed nothing remained but a few unintelligible words. The best course would, therefore, be simply to negative the clause and proceed to the next.

Clause negatived.

Clause 4 (Birkenhead to form a Borough to return One Member),

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We have presented to the House and successively supported what we believed to be the best proposals. I am sorry the House did not agree with the Motion of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire; but, after the vote which has just been given, it is necessary for us to state our views. I think the best course will be for the House to affirm the clause which gives a Member to Birkenhead, and then we shall be quite ready to adopt the suggestion thrown out in the course of the discussion to give four Members to the West Riding of Yorkshire. That is a suggestion on which a great deal may be said, on which, indeed, a great deal has been said, and which has a great deal of merit in itself. The question will be, therefore, whether the West Riding should have four Members divided or undivided. My own opinion is that, perhaps, it would be better to divide it. That proposal, of course, can only be carried out by clauses brought up at the proper time.

Mr. COLLINS said, that when he proposed that four Members should be given to the West Riding of Yorkshire, and that it should be divided, he told the Government that it would be better for them to adopt the suggestion at once. They must feel now that if they had only taken his advice they would have been spared all those troubles into which they had been led. He was confident that when he appealed to the common sense and justice of the Committee the other night he would not appeal in vain, and the result had proved that he was right. As they were all going to be unanimous, however, he would not interrupt the debate further.

Mr. AYRTON said, that the proposal of the noble Lord at the head of the Government rested on a principle totally different from that on which the Bill was introduced. He concurred in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, that if they abandoned the sort of compromise proposed in the name of the Government they ought to proceed on some definite and intelligible principle, such as the division of large constituencies. But there were other districts in England as important as that which the Government seemed to anxious to court, and which it was intended to strengthen exclusively by the Bill. The county of Middlesex contained a body of people who held in a large degree what might be called the fixed property of the country; and they were bound, when they divided the West Riding, to consider whether in common fairness they ought not also to divide the county of Middlesex. He would vote against the clause giving a Member to Birkenhead, with the view of supporting the appropriation of two seats to the West Riding and two seats to Middlesex.

Mr. BLACKBURN said, that he was anxious to propose that one of the four seats should be given to the Scotch Universities. But he believed that in the present temper of the Committee, it would be useless to bring forward any such proposal; and the best course they could follow would be, as it seemed to him, to agree to the rest of the Bill sub silentio, and then for each hon. Member to submit his particular scheme to the House on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Stirlingshire was not going to leave the Scottish Universities in the lurch.

MR. STIRLING said, he was satisfied that he would not be doing justice to the Universities of Scotland in attempting to urge their claims at that moment.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he concurred in the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Blackburn) that it would be better for the cause they espoused to advocate it on the Report. It was also desirable that the Government should have time to reflect on the circumstances of the case. They had made some very sudden proposals, and he feared they did not know whether they were standing on their head or heels. It was well that the Government should have an opportunity of reflecting on the undignified position which they occupied, so that before they arrived at the Report of the proceedings in Committee they might come to their senses, and see the propriety of adopting a juster policy towards the country to which he belonged, which was the only one of the three kingdoms which had to bear the badge of inferiority in not having her Universities represented in the House, while those of England had four Members, and those of Ireland two.

MR. DISRAELI: I would impress upon the Committee that this is a subject of great and enduring importance. It is highly desirable that we should not deal with such a question as if this were a mere private Bill, on which we often arrive at a decision in one Session which we reverse in a subsequent Session. The vote which has just been taken has very much changed the character of this Bill, and it is of the utmost importance that we should consider the consequences of these changes in all their bearings. With regard to the clause immediately before our notice for giving a Member to Birkenhead, I see that there is an Amendment placed on the paper by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State, proposing to alter the boundaries of that borough as they are described in the Bill. I do not want now to go into the merits or demerits of that proposition. But I beg the Committee to remember that the question of Birkenhead has been considered over and over again, and has been considered by more than one Ministry; and, therefore, when a measure is proposed for giving a Member to Birkenhead, the House had a right to suppose that it has been very maturely considered. If the Government have felt suddenly that it is necessary to alter the boundaries of that borough, they ought to have placed before the House ample information as to the data on which that recommendation is made, and we ought not to be called upon hastily to decide on so important a question. When I remember that we are going to give four Members to the north of England, and that the only borough to which one of the four seats is to be appropriated is in so undefined a condition, I really think it is desirable that we should report Progress and allow ourselves an opportunity of further considering this subject. I would rather this proposal came from the Government, and I believe the noble Lord would now do well to take it into his consideration. This has been rather a memorable night in the history of the Bill. The Committee have done a great deal in a short time, and let us now digest what we have done—let us have an opportunity of seeing whether we cannot appropriate these seats in a manner satisfactory to the south as well as to the north of England. I must repeat my belief that on the whole the best arrangement that could be made would be to divide both the West Riding of Yorkshire and the county of Middlesex, and to apportion all the four seats between those two great counties. These are questions, however, which I wish the Committee to consider, and not to settle by any sudden Resolution. The claims of Birkenhead are, no doubt, most respectable; but the Government seem to doubt whether that borough, as at first proposed, would furnish a sufficiently ample constituency to justify them in giving it a Member, or why the change of which the Home Secretary has given notice? Therefore, I think that if there is a little delay, and Her Majesty's Government consider the propriety of dividing the West Riding of Yorkshire and the county of Middlesex, and appropriating the seats to those great, flourishing, and increasing constituencies, they will take a wise course, and one which will be satisfactory to the general community. I will not propose that we should report Progress, or take any other course which might be offensive to the Government. I would rather see the noble Lord take his natural position as leader of the House; but I think that the adoption of that course would be convenient, and not unprofitable.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I think it will be better that the Committee should proceed with the consideration of this clause. If the right hon. Gentleman or any other Member should in Committee propose any changes, they may then be considered, but at present the Government adhere to the clauses which have been carried. And be it remembered that the change which has been made, although there has been more than one division, has affected only one of the seats now in question. With regard to Birkenhead, I gave notice of an Amendment to incorporate with that place a small township to the north of it, which I thought might conveniently form part of the new borough; but since I made that proposal I have understood that the local interests are unfavourable to its incorporation with Birkenhead. This township adjoins the creek upon which Birkenhead is situate, and the gentleman who was sent to examine Birkenhead suggested to me that it might properly be considered as forming part of the borough. For that reason I gave notice of the Amendment which has been referred to. I gave notice of it some time ago, in order to ascertain whether the change would be acceptable, and I have since found that it would not. The population of this township is insignificant, and the question which the right hon. Gentleman has magnified into an important, is really a very unimportant one. The whole population of the chapelry of Birkenhead, according to the last census, amounts to 35,900, or nearly 36,000 persons. There are other townships within the borough which raise the population to 51,105. The small township which I proposed to add, but which I shall not now insist upon adding to the borough, contains a population of only 3,600 persons; therefore, the House will see that this is a matter of very limited importance. I think that any one who looks at a map of the borough will think that there was a prima facie case for annexing this township. However, I shall not press the Motion, and I trust that the Committee will agree to the clause as it stands.

MR. J. TOLLEMACHE said, that the inhabitants of the township of Wallasey entertained strong objections against being included in the Borough of Birkenhead, which they had expressed in a petition to that House, and he thanked the right hon.

Baronet for having so properly and so considerably complied with the wishes of those who were most concerned in the matter. He thought Birkenhead was entitled to a Member. It was quite impossible to consider what would be the population of that thriving place in the next ten years. They must not consider her local interests. The port of Birkenhead was greater than London, and greater than New York, and the docks they were now making would cost £3,000,000. The future Member would have to look to large interests, for there was not a manufacturing town in the north which was not interested in Birkenhead. The population of Liverpool was less by two-thirds than that of Lancashire and Yorkshire, but he would venture to say the duties of the Members for Liverpool were more heavy than those of the Members for the West Riding and Lancashire put together; and he was not sure that the duties of the Members for Liverpool were not more onerous than those of half a dozen metropolitan Members. Under these circumstances he felt that the Government had exercised a wise and sound discretion in giving to Birkenhead a Member.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that the proposal to give a Member to Birkenhead raised the important question of principle whether all these four seats should be given to Lancashire and Yorkshire, which possessed already almost as many Members as Scotland, and whether those two counties should be allowed to raise their preponderating influence in that House from fifty-one to fifty-five Members. If the argument against Middlesex was worth anything, à fortiori it was valid against Yorkshire. He objected to Ireland and Scotland being treated with contempt in a question of such importance, and should certainly move that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would support the Amendment, but upon different grounds. The hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to make out a great Irish grievance, but, in fact, he had made out no case at all, for the hon. and learned Gentleman had lost sight of the fact that the counties of Ireland were fully and amply represented; while, on the other hand, if he had taken the trouble to look at the matter from an imperial point of view, and taken the whole case of the representation into consideration, he would have found how badly the rural districts of England were represented. Every seat given to a borough was an act of deliberate and cold-blooded spoliation. ["Oh, oh!"] He was prepared to prove that statement. Would any one deny that "taxation" and "representation" were convertible terms? If the whole power of taxation were put into the hands of one portion of the community, that portion would use it to relieve themselves of the burden of taxation at the expense of those who were less powerfully represented. The rural districts of England were in the latter position. He begged every rural representative to consider that in voting in favour of increased urban representation he was virtually assisting in placing those whom he represented in a worse position than they were at present.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped he might be allowed to say one or two words. If population, the number of houses, and the amount of property were taken as the conditions that commanded increased representation, the counties of England were entitled to 130 additional seats. As to the claims of Ireland, he could only say that he wished that the counties of England were as fully represented as those of Ireland; taking into account the number of the population and the amount of property. Ireland could found no claim to additional seats, except upon the ground of population. Her case was infinitely weaker than that of Scotland. By population and by property, taken as a test of the intelligence of the people, Scotland was entitled to twelve seats; but, as he had said, the English counties by the same rule were entitled to 130. He did not, however, desire to see anything like a perfect equality of representation in that House between the boroughs and counties so long as the House of Lords existed; but he thought the counties deserved some consideration. The noble Lord the Member for the City in his Bill of 1854—which was on the whole the best Reform Bill which he (Mr. Newdegate) had known introduced—proposed to allot to the counties of England no less than forty-six seats. He trusted that in future they should hear no more of the claims of Ireland and Scotland, whilst the claims of the English counties remained unsatisfied to the extent which he had mentioned. He had voted for an additional Member being given to Middlesex; but he thought in justice that county should have two seats allotted to it. His opinion was, that so long as they had enormous masses of population represented in the aggregate by two Members only for each of these large constituencies, the elections would be controlled by knots of men acting with a power which rendered such representation analogous to that of close boroughs. Let the Committee consider the difficulty of communicating with vast masses of people. No ordinary man could address more than about 4,000 people by his own voice, and twelve was the number of a jury, probably because it was found that that was the greatest number of persons who could conveniently communicate by conversation. The reason against enlarging the number of Members of that House was because the numbers of the House would be too large for the purposes of debate. Unless these enormous constituencies were divided true public opinion would often be overborne in them, therefore, he agreed in the proposition for dividing Yorkshire. As two of the disposable seats came from St. Albans, a borough near the Metropolis, he thought that in justice those seats should be given to the metropolitan county of Middlesex. There was a strong Conservative element in Middlesex, and it was but fair that that spirit should be represented. Without intending the slightest disrespect to the metropolitan Members, he was confident that they would find assistance in such an additional representation for the metropolitan county. In his own case he knew that the Members for the large boroughs in his county could perform certain duties to which he was unequal, whilst he, in like manner, could perform duties of which they were incapable. Let the Committee remember the combinations of working men, and the organization by which they were governed—often both unreasonable and tyrannical, but the existence of these combinations proved the Committee ought to give them legitimate representation, such as they would do by giving additional Members to Middlesex; that course would produce satisfaction which could not be produced by other means.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that considering the difficulty there was with the present press of business in fixing a certain day when the Bill could come on, there could be no course more inconvenient, or indeed, more unreasonable, than to report Progress at so early an hour. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would consent to go on with the Bill to the end.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he had given notice of a Motion in reference to Cork, though he had not been fortunate enough to catch the Chairman's eye. He could not promise that the House should hear no more of the claims of Ireland, for there were no interests so badly represented in that House as Irish interests. The number of Irish Members were so out of proportion to the rest of the House that they had no chance; and, no matter where an English Member sat, he was always ready to cheer anything against Ireland. Ireland had got nothing from that House, and he hoped that Irish Members, for the future, would not be deterred by any amount of vituperation from combining, and would refuse to go into the lobby for any party question—no matter what it might be—which did not lead to her advantage. On comparing the representation of the various countries he found that Scotland had one Member to 53,000 persons, while Ireland had one to 63,000, and that in Scotland there was a Member to every 1,700 electors, and in Ireland there was one to every 1,704. Then as to the property of the country he denied that that was a fair test. The wealth of Ireland had been drawn for centuries into this country, for £11,000,000 of taxes were raised in that country but only £4,000,000 were spent in it; and, in addition, a large amount of the rent of absentees was drawn to this country.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he thought the Government ought to state exactly what course they proposed to adopt, in what way Yorkshire was to be divided, and whether the clauses for that purpose would be introduced in Committee, or upon the Report.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, what he proposed was that the remaining clauses should be proceeded with, and then that the ordinary course should be taken of reporting the Bill. Three seats had been disposed of, and on the Report it was proposed to bring up a new clause, dividing the West Riding, which it was not competent to do in Committee. The alteration in the mode of election in the West Riding, he should add, could only take place at the next general election. If but one seat were added the election might take place during the present Parliament, but the necessity of dividing the constituency would preclude the two new seats from being filled up till a dissolution took place.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he felt so strongly the difficulty in which the Committee was placed, after the votes which had been taken, that he believed the best course which the Government could adopt would be to withdraw the Bill. If they wished to proceed with the measure they ought to take time for reflection, instead of being guided by the last vote. Either the Government had a principle or they had not. If they had, he supposed it was that population and rateable value should be regarded in the distribution of the seats, and that on that principle they had acted in proposing first to give a Member to Chelsea and Kensington, and then to Middlesex. That principle, however, had been twice upset. If they were to go on scrambling through the different propositions, he believed the only course which he could safely take was to imitate the action of the Scotch Members, and to vote steadily against every proposition, in the hope that ultimately Middlesex might come to the top again. He protested against the principle that four seats were to be given to the North. Certainly, if the right hon. Gentleman consulted the wishes of his own supporters, he would withdraw the Bill, which dealt with a subject that ought not to be trifled with.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he could not admit that the Government had trifled with the subject. They had distinctly pointed out the places to which, in their opinion, seats might with propriety be given; and, having done so, the most respectful course to the House was to allow hon. Gentlemen to urge their views, and then for the Government to deliver their opinions, instead of making any attempt previously to dictate to the House. But it was by no means to be inferred that they had not fully considered the subject. The Government stated that they would vote in favour of another Member for Middlesex, but the Committee decided against that proposition. While that issue remained uncertain it was not competent for the Government to say what course they would take; but as soon as the House had pronounced its decision, his noble Friend rose and stated what the Government was prepared to do. He did not see how it was possible to take a more clear and straightforward course. It was now said they ought to adjourn the debate and report Progress. Well, the Government did not ask for time. If they felt any doubt or hesitation it would be natural that they should ask for delay, and under the circumstances it would probably be conceded by the Committee. But they did not ask for it; they were quite ready to proceed with the Bill, and they asked the Committee to give a Member to Birkenhead, a proposal which formed part of the original scheme. With regard to the fourth Member, he understood that hon. Gentlemen opposite were favourable to a division of the West Riding. In the Bill of last year the Government proposed to give four Members to the West Riding. Everybody must see that it was a proposition which had strong arguments in its favour; and, therefore, as they entertained no objection to it, they were ready to adopt the proposal. But the only way in which it was possible to ongraft the clause requisite for that purpose on the Bill was in the manner which he proposed; and if they reported Progress to all eternity they would be no nearer either to giving four Members to the West Riding or to submitting the question for the decision of the House. He hoped the Committee would not lose time in debating what they should do, but would proceed at once to consider the question of giving a Member to Birkenhead.

Mr. HARDY said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that, after an immensity of discussion, the House had now got into the right line, and that the Government had adopted a proposition which would receive the concurrence of the country at large. The West Riding had always shown itself an independent constituency, and the representatives which it returned had always truly reflected the political feeling of the time. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was in error in thinking that the West Riding would be purely a manufacturing constituency; as one went westward it became much more agricultural in its character. It had in it, moreover, a great number of what were called small statesmen—probably the most independent class in the community. It was to them that Wilberforce and Brougham in great part owed their election. With all respect for the Irish and Scotch Members, he had viewed the question before them from the first as an English question, and were a different course pursued it might afford a dangerous precedent, for at some future time one of their little boroughs might get into trouble, and English Members might conspire to rob them of the seat. Not denying that at some future time the good service done to the cause of education might entitle the Scotch Universities to representation, he believed fewer jealousies would be created by the division of the West Riding as proposed.

Mr. JACKSON contended that of the four borough seats which the House had to dispose of, the borough interest had a right to at least one. During the last few years the sum on which the income tax was levied had increased by about £20,000,000, of which the land only claimed £1,000,000, while house property claimed £8,000,000, mines and minerals £3,000,000, and manufactures £2,000,000; the rest being made up of miscellaneous incomes, a strong reason for continuing to boroughs the five seats. Birkenhead would have a very peculiar constituency. It would start with 5,500 voters, of whom the bulk would claim in respect of houses of £30 a year and upwards. It would represent a very varied interest, and would altogether be one of the most respectable constituencies in the kingdom.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he could not conceive any place more entitled to representation than Birkenhead, but he must protest against the assumption that because the four seats at the disposal of the House were English seats they could only be distributed to English constituencies. Such a doctrine could not be adopted by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary or those who were concerned with him in the Reform Bill of 1832. Therefore, after the claim of Birkenhead had been disposed of, he should be prepared to submit the claim of the Universities of Scotland before either the West Riding or Middlesex for one of the vacant seats.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was quite true that by the Reform Bill additional seats were given to Scotland and Ireland, but he did not think it followed from that circumstance that whenever there was any distribution of seats the sister kingdoms must be included with England. In the present case, the four seats which the House had to dispose of were English seats, and he did not see that a case had been made out for giving any of them to Scotland or Ireland.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he wished to know whether the noble Lord meant to convey that until the Scotch Members succeeded in demoralizing one of their constituencies—which he did not think it would be possible to do—they were to have no claim for a representation of the two Scotch Universities? Did the noble Lord advise them to make the attempt in order to establish a title to such a representation?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I did not mean that.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought the Committee ought at once to know whether the Bill was to be considered a Government measure. The Government began by opposing the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and in that opposition they were beaten by a very large majority—over 100. That evening they acceded to his second Amendment, and the result was that success left him, and he and they were beaten. They at first opposed the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Knarborough (Mr. Collins), but now they tendered him their assistance, but he should recommend the hon. and learned Member to take care, for their assistance might be as fatal to him as it had been to the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. He did not think the Government were consulting their own dignity in the course which they were taking in respect to the Bill.

Motion negatived.

Question put, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 26: Majority 137.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining Clauses.

On Question that the Bill as amended be reported,

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he could not see the fairness of the suggestion which had been made for giving all the four Members to one part of England; and he, therefore, gave notice that at the next stage of the Bill he should bring before the House the case of the University of London unless, meanwhile, the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) recovered, so as to be able to take the question into his much abler hands.

MR. BLACKBURN suggested that the Bill should be reprinted as amended, and that the Government should give notice of the clause for dividing the West Riding.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to call attention to the extreme difficulty of dealing with these questions on the Report, and to suggest the recommitment of the Bill.

MR. STIRLING said, he wished to give notice that on the Report he should take the opportunity of stating the case of the Scotch Universities. It would probably be for the convenience of the House that the discussion upon the Scotch Universities and London Universities should be taken together; and, therefore, when he had seen the notice of the hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Goldsmid) he would endeayour so to frame his own Motion that the discussion should be so taken.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was not usual to recommit a Bill unless extensive alterations were proposed. The change proposed was only on a single point; and it would be, therefore, competent for hon. Gentlemen to submit their Amendment upon the Motion for the division of the West Riding.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to give notice that, if the plan of dividing the West Riding were adopted, he should propose to strike out Lancashire and substitute for it the division of Middlesex.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he should take the same opportunity of urging again the claims of the county of Cork.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 186.]

COUNTY SURVEYORS, &c. (IRELAND), BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had no charge to bring against the Government for introducing the Bill, inasmuch as they had, perhaps, been misled by numerous petitions and representations forwarded to them on the part of the grand juries. Its object was to increase the remuneration given to county surveyors in Ireland and to grant to them superannuation allowances, but the principle involved in it would go much further, as it would equally apply to all officers paid out of the county rates. In the county of Cork alone there were at least 500 officers who on the same grounds as county surveyors would be entitled to an increase of remuneration, and in the whole of Ireland there could not be fewer than 5,000. To prove that this was not a needless alarm he need only point to the fact that among the Amendments to the Bill of which notice appeared on the paper was one by the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) to add to the salaries of and grant superannuations to the secretaries of grand juries. He confessed he did not see how their claim could be resisted if the principle of the Bill was sanctioned. The salaries of the surveyors were to be increased to £600 a year; that was to be the maximum.

But when a maximum salary was fixed, it was apt, practically, to become the minimum. Some of the surveyors, who made themselves disagreeable, politically or otherwise, might be cut down to £300; but those who went hunting with members of the grand jury—and they would hunt oftener when they had £600 a year than when they had £300—would get the maximum salary. They would not discharge their duties the better for the increase. The fact was there was a number of young men in Ireland who had nothing to do, and their first proceeding was to get an office with a small salary; the next was to get the salary increased; the next to get a superannuation allowance attached to it; and then to prove that the office was utterly useless, and ought to be abolished. He had known cases where that had been done. No doubt the Bill had originated in goodnature. But there were several sorts of goodnature. One was to put your hand into your own pocket and pay £100 in charity, and say nothing about it; another sort was to put your hand into your own pocket and pay the £100, and put it in all the newspapers. That was a higher order of goodnature. Another was to put your hand into your neighbour's pocket, pay it out of that, and then advertise it as your own charity. And this was very much what the Bill proposed to do. It was brought in by English officials, who had no property in Ireland to pay the increased taxes arising from it. Instead of increasing the salaries of the present county surveyors, he thought it would be a better plan to add to the number of the surveyors at a less salary and divide their districts. There should be a smaller division of districts, and a graduated scale of payment. The claims of the officers of the Poor Law Board for superannuation were made on grounds that would apply equally well to Irish Members of Parliament. It was said they were overworked, that they had no time for social duties, that their patience was tasked to the utmost, that they must satisfy everybody, and that they could not look forward to any promotion or provision—precisely the case of the Irish Members. The principle of giving superannuation to local officers ought to be carefully considered by the House. Some returns had been ordered which would prove the great increase that had of late been made in the amounts of the county rates paid in Ireland. Those returns had not been laid upon the table, and he wished to know the reason of the delay. With respect to the Bill he thought the principles which it contained were most objectionable, and before they were adopted the subject ought to be fully inquired into before a Select Committee.

Mr. GEORGE said, he rose to support the Motion of his hon. Friend, and to attest that he had heard a strong desire expressed that the Bill should not be proceeded with. It proposed at one blow to double the salaries of the county surveyors; for, as this Bill had been framed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell), it was at the option of the grand jurors, without regard to the cesspayers, to accomplish this. He trusted that now the public feeling of the people of Ireland was known upon the Bill the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the measure.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that considering the nature of the duties which the county surveyors had to perform, and the responsibility thrown upon them, their present salaries were quite inadequate. The salary was nominally £300 a year, but when travelling expenses were deducted, frequently no more than £200 remained, and the private business of these officers was not uncommonly merely nominal. How could it be expected that competent men could be got at such a salary to discharge the duties of these officers? If inadequate salaries were given the duties of the office would devolve upon an inferior set of individuals, who, on account of the smallness of their remuneration, would be tempted to accept bribes. He would also remind those who opposed the measure that it was merely permissive, and not compulsory, and that it, therefore, involved no addition to the burdens of the ratepayers, except upon their own action with a view to the duties of the office of county surveyor being more efficiently performed. It merely carried out the recommendations of the Committee by which the subject was investigated three or four years ago, and he was surprised at the opposition with which it had been met.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN thought that the Bill did not proceed in the right direction. If the salaries were not sufficient let them be increased, but he objected to the power which appeared to be given by the Bill to the county surveyors, of delegating to inferior persons duties for which first class officers were paid. With regard to superannuations, he wished to know why that particular class—the county surveyors—were to have superannuations, to the exclusion of all other officers; and he, likewise, desired to be informed if any estimate had been made out of the increased charge which the Bill would impose on the counties. The Bill excluded the ratepayers from all control, and although the subject required legislation, he thought the Bill had better be postponed for the present year, and next year legislation might take place on the subject after full inquiry.

MR. HERBERT said, he felt he had a right to claim the vote of the hon. Member for Cork in favour of the Bill, as he formed one of the large majority of the Irish Members who had addressed the Chief Secretary as advocates of some such measure as this. The measure carried out all the recommendations of the Committee of 1857. He (Mr. H. Herbert) considered that any postponement of this Bill would be an act of great injustice to a large body of men whose hopes had been encouraged by the professions of hon. Members on both sides of the House in their favour.

COLONEL DUNNE said, before they proceeded further with the Bill they ought to know what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the many Amendments that were to be proposed in Committee. The measure and the proposed Amendments on it not only extended the principle of superannuation to all county surveyors, but also to all their assistants, and they were numerous. In that respect he did not think it was applicable to the condition of Ireland. He thought that the assistants ought not to be included in this provision. It should be recollected that all these offices were Government appointments. It was scarcely fair, then, to call upon the country to pay them those large salaries, and afterwards superannuations. He hoped the Government would declare their intentions before they entered any further into the matter.

MR. BUTT said, the intentions of the Government with respect to the Bill were to be gathered from the Bill itself. The Bill had three objects in view—to increase the salaries of the county surveyors, to increase the salaries of their assistants, and to provide for them superannuation allowances. It was permissive in its character, and he could not understand how his hon. and gallant Friend, who had always been the advocate of local government, opposed the Bill, which was intended to allow counties to manage their own affairs. He had himself endeavoured to reform the grand jury laws; and in consequence he had received various letters stating that no reform could be accomplished unless the county surveyors and their assistants were elevated in their position. A Committee sat on the subject some years ago, who unanimously recommended that the salaries of the county surveyors and their assistants should be increased, and that the grand juries should have the power of granting them superannuation. That was the recommendation of a Committee which almost wholly consisted of Irish country gentlemen. These surveyors, in fact, had charge over a large sum of county expenditure, and to increase their salaries, therefore, would be the truest economy. So it was with the question of superannuation. The superannuation of an inefficient surveyor would be saved in the efficient management of a successor in the course of two or three years. He, therefore, gave his cordial support to the Bill.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he addressed the House on that question, not as an Irish Member, but as an Irish cesspayer, and he could assure the House that the cesspayer of Ireland had a great objection to pay rates for any such purpose as that contemplated by the present Bill. If it were true, as stated, that a large majority of the Irish Members had urged the Government to introduce this Bill, he despaired of the course of the cesspayer in Ireland. In Tipperary the county taxation had increased 20 per cent during the last ten years, and if Parliament were to pass the present Bill, every salaried officer in Ireland would apply to have his salary doubled. He objected particularly to the superannuation clause, and was astonished to see from the paper that the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had given notice of an Amendment to make that clause retrospective. Let them not call it merely a permissive Bill. They all knew the readiness with which Irishmen put their hands to paper, and he feared that they would be persuaded under the Bill to put their hands to many a job. Why, by the 7th Clause, it was provided that, after ten years' service, a county surveyor could claim superannuation, and, it as was to be retrospective, men who had long since retired would be entitled to claim superannuation. He hoped the Bill would be thrown out; but, if the Irish Members were determined to raise the salaries of county surveyors, let them, at all events, wait until the grand jury laws were put on a sounder and more healthy footing. The appointment of these county surveyors should not be left in the Castle of Dublin. There was great danger that the surveyors would be appointed, not for their scientific attainments, but for their political services.

MR. CARDWELL: There would be the test of examination.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Competition—examination! Surely the right hon. Gentleman was not so primitive as to imagine that there was any reality in that test. The county surveyors should be appointed by those who paid them. Until they reformed the whole system of county surveyors, he would not give permissive power to expend upon them one sixpence additional, either in the shape of salary or superannuation.

MR. HASSARD said, he thought if they gave adequate salaries to the county surveyors they might expect them to devote their whole time to the performance of their important duties which were now, in many cases, delegated to subordinates. No doubt, as had been stated, those officers were appointed by the Government, but their salaries were fixed by the grand juries, who also had the power of dismissal. He gave his hearty approbation to the Motion for going into Committee.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he would admit that he had given his consent to the main provision of the Bill so far as regarded the permissive increase of salaries of county surveyors; but he could not approve combining with it the principle of superannuation, which would open the flood-gates to petitions, memorials, and all kinds of private solicitations. It was not real merit that generally carried the day in these appointments. It was the appeal ad misericordiam—the having a sickly wife and eight children—that usually prevailed. He saw grave reasons for acting with extreme caution, and he should oppose going into Committee.

MR. CARDWELL observed, that while the Bill had met with more opposition than he expected, he might on the other hand, appeal to the valuable support it had received, as a proof, in answer to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. George), that it was not introduced in defiance of the feelings of the Irish people, nor without sufficient inquiry as to what their wishes might be. He only wished that when solemn deputations called on the Irish Government to give effect to the recommendations of a Select Committee, they would ascertain what those recommendations were. Out of those who had to-night opposed the Bill, he had to reckon the hon. Member for the city of Dublin (Sir Edward Grogan), whose constituents were not affected by it; his noble Friend who spoke last, who recommended such a measure; and the hon. Member for Wexford, who was a Member of a Government pledged to introduce a like Bill. By an amendment of the law in 1834, county surveyors, selected after examination by competent persons, were entrusted with the management of large sums of money, amounting to £400,000 or £500,000, to be expended in the maintenance of roads in Ireland. In 1857 a Select Committee was appointed to consider the case of those surveyors. On that Committee were the right hon. Member for Canterbury (Sir William Somerville), at one time Secretary for Ireland, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Naas), and the right hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert), who had also been Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Committee examined the subject very carefully, and reported unanimously in favour of an increase of salary and in favour of a system of superannuation, with a power for the grand juries to require the exclusive services of those officers. A memorial, signed by between thirty and forty Irish Members, had been presented, requesting the Government to carry out those recommendations, which was all that this Bill was intended to effect. It did not propose a compulsory increase of salary nor a compulsory amount of superannuation, but it merely said to those who administered the fiscal affairs of the country, that if they had a large sum of money to expend, and they thought it expedient to spend a trifling sum more in its supervision and control, believing that economy and advantage would result from it, they should have the power to incur that expense. It also gave power to dispense with a valuable servant at a time of life when they ought no longer to retain him in his place, by superannuating him. It was said this Bill would make patronage for the Government. It was true that the appointments in the first place were made by the Lord Lieutenant from a List; the result of an examination; and in the order in which the names stood on that List; but the amount of pay was fixed by the grand jury, and the grand jury had the power of dismissing the officer. The Government did not jump to the conclusion that the feeling of the country was in favour of the Bill. It was printed at the close of last Session, and although it was largely circulated no petition had been presented against it. As to the intentions of the Government, they would adhere to the provisions contained in the Bill, but they would not pledge themselves blindly to object to any suggestions or Amendments in Committee.

MR. MONSELL said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the enormous extent to which the system of raising salaries and providing superannuations of these county surveyors might be carried under the present Bill. He denied that this power of superannuation, if given, would be permissive. If given, they might be sure it would be used, and the power of resistance on the part of the grand juries was so small that they must grant the allowance if asked to do so. What he wanted to know was to what extent would this power be used? There was a strong case, he thought, to raise the salaries of some of the county surveyors, and after a certain number of years they might give a certain amount of superannuation to those surveyors who had been underpaid. If the salaries were raised for the future they would be able to provide for themselves against the evil day. He would support that part of the Bill which contemplated raising salaries, but he objected altogether to recognizing the principle of superannuating every officer who was paid out of the county rates, without having some estimate of what the taxation would be to the cess-payers.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he should support the Bill, because he believed it to be just and expedient that every man ought to be paid for his labour according to his merits. The county surveyors were, undoubtedly, underpaid. He knew that in the county of Cork they could not afford to travel over the whole of their districts on account of the expense, and the consequence was that the grand jury had to rely in a great measure on the reports of subordinates. He was satisfied that it would be true economy to give the surveyors adequate salaries, and he held that they were as much entitled to superannuation as the civil servants of the Government.

GENERAL UPTON remarked that they should give grand juries the power of employing first class surveyors, and that they should be enabled to pay them liberally.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE said, the principle of the Bill was to give power to the grand juries to pay men better who they knew were at present underpaid. He did not believe grand juries would abuse the powers placed in their hands, and the provision that the increase of salary should be sanctioned by two grand juries was a sufficient safeguard against jobbing.

MR. W. R. O. GORE said, he objected to superannuations, and to raising salaries, but if it were required he would give the present surveyors assistance in the performance of the duties of their office.

LORD FERMOY said, over £1,000,000 a year was paid for county cess in Ireland, and he thought that they should be just to the poor farmers who paid it before they were generous to the county surveyors. They had good roads in Ireland at present, and there was no ground for saying that the business of the surveyors was not well done, or that there was any difficulty in getting good surveyors at the present rate of pay. There was no lack of candidates whenever a surveyor's office was vacant, and there were many other public officers, such as the medical officers of Unions, who had prior claims to the county surveyors. Taxation and representation ought to be convertible terms. It was not so in the Bill, and that, in his opinion, was one of the principal objections to the Bill. The universal feeling in Ireland was against the Bill. It was only making bad worse. He would, therefore, move that the House go into Committee that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, one would imagine from the observations that had been made that the proposal was one for the increase of local taxation. It was nothing of the kind. The measure was the result of much investigation on the part of a Committee composed principally of Irish Members. He did not consider the grand jury system perfect; but he had not such an unfavourable opinion of them as to object to give them the slight power which the Bill proposed to confer on them.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he was in favour of the original Motion, considering the Bill would have a beneficial operation; but he was opposed to the system of superannuation in toto.

MR. CONOLLY said, the discussion was a mere battle between the centralized authorities and the local interests of Ireland. He should support the latter, and considered there was no necessity either for the increase of salary or for the superannuation proposed. There was no ground whatever for the Bill.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 59: Majority 93.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (Grand Jury at Summer Assizes held after passing of Act may on Application of County Surveyor resolve that his Salary be increased).

MR. LONGFIELD moved an Amendment providing that previously to an alteration being agreed to by the Grand Jury it should have been adopted by a majority of the magistrates and ratepayers at Sessions.

Amendment proposed, in line 7, after the word "put," to insert the words—

"Provided that the previous sanction of the presentment sessions of the county at large to any such increase of salary shall have been granted on application to be made in the same manner as is necessary for works exceeding in expense one hundred pounds on the county at large."

MR. CARDWELL said, he must object to the Amendment, on the ground that the words would take away the control over the county surveyors which the existing statute gave to the grand jury, and transfer it to the Presentment Sessions.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided: Ayes 54; Noes 61: Majority 7.

MR. CARDWELL said, that, recognizing what appeared to be the wish of the minority, he would undertake to frame a provision to the effect that before the second grand jury could confirm any increase of salary the subject should be submitted to a Presentment Sessions.

MR. BRADY moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 71: Majority 47.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would propose an Amendment in the clause, providing that no appointment should be made under the Bill by a majority of less than two-thirds of the grand jury.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE: Will the hon. Member tell us what number would constitute two-thirds of twenty-three?

Amendment negatived.

MR. HENNESSY proposed the insertion of a provision for increasing the salaries of the secretaries of the grand juries. The increase in the number of sessions held annually in the Irish counties had added considerably to the labours of these officers, and the grand juries had petitioned for power to raise their salaries.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Bill did not apply to the case of these officers.

Motion negatived.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to move a proviso to the effect that whenever the maximum salary was given to a county surveyor no allowance should be made for an assistant.

Amendment proposed, to add, at the end of the Clause, the words,

"Provided always, That when the salary granted to a County Surveyor shall amount to the maximum specified in the Schedule, it shall not be lawful for the Grand Jury to grant any salary for an Assistant Surveyor."

MR. CARDWELL opposed the Amendment.

MR. CONOLLY moved that the Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 59: Majority 38.

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. COGAN moved that the Committee report Progress.

MR. CARDWELL suggested that they should finish the clause.

MR. COGAN withdrew his Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that though the Bill might not contain all that some people might wish to find still it would be a most valuable measure. He expressed his earnest hope, and, indeed, his confident expectation, that, whatever difference of opinion might exist on the subject, the Amendments which had been made in the Bill would be accepted by the other House.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I also hope that a Bill upon this important subject, so long desired by the great body of the commercial community, may pass into law in the present year. This Bill undoubtedly has received very considerable attention on the part of Members of the House of Commons, and I think it will be admitted by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, although he may not approve all the Amendments which were made in the Select Committee, that that Committee devoted the most earnest attention to the details of the measure, and that no clause and no Amendment was decided upon by them hastily and without due consideration. The Bill has come back from the Select Committee with considerable alterations, but without any interference with what I look upon as its main principles. Those principles I take to be, in the first place, the amalgamation of bankruptcy and insolvency; in the next place, the question—much discussed elsewhere, but not disputed in the Committee—of doing away generally with the distinction between traders and non-traders; and, thirdly, though I cannot help thinking this a measure of doubtful policy—the extension of bankruptcy jurisdiction to County Courts. In all these three material points the Bill has come back from the Committee without alteration. Undoubtedly, as I said, there are many points on which it has received alterations and, as I think, Amendments. In the first place the Committee objected to that which appeared to them a very unnecessary and useless expenditure—the appointment of a Chief Judge. That proposal was struck out by the Committee; as were also some provisions with regard to the relative duties of the official and creditors' assignees, and other provisions which were calculated to lead to much additional expense—such as the employment of shorthandwriters. In some few minor points other Amendments were introduced, and, with regard to all the Amendments, I think I may say that they were made by a considerable majority, and, in some cases, without even a division of voices in the Committee. Now, I cannot but hope that the consideration which the Bill has thus received from a Committee so constituted may not be without weight with the Members of the other House. When the Bill came back from the Select Committee the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), on the part of the Government, professed his readiness to accept the Amendments of the Committee, and did not raise any question with regard to those Amendments—though it is true that a clause of great importance was in this House inserted in the Bill, preventing the retrospective operation of the law upon non-traders, who are now for the first time made subject to the bankruptcy law. But it is said that in regard to the Bill as it now stands ominous words have dropped from a Member of the other House, which make me somewhat apprehensive of the reception which these Amendments may meet with there. Now, as this is a Government Bill, and as the Government have accepted in this House every Amendment made by the Select Committee, I think I am entitled to ask whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to use the influence which undoubtedly they possess with their colleagues in the other House, and to secure their support and acceptance of the Amendments which have been introduced in this House? I should not ask this question if the Bill were not introduced by the Government and upon the responsibility of the Government, and if I did not hope that the Government had made up their minds, having accepted the Amendments here, to support them in the other House. If, however, the noble Earl is not able to give me this assurance, I hope he will state that the objections of the House of Commons to any of these Amendments shall be sent up to this House in time to give us an opportunity for the full consideration of any such changes. I have looked at the state of business in the other House, and though there appears to be a considerable number of Bills in progress there are not many of them which will be likely to lead to protracted discussion; and, therefore, it is of the more importance that questions upon which you have felt it necessary to introduce important Amendments in the Bill should, if again altered in the other House, be brought up here in time to allow of ample consideration. I am quite sure there are many of your Lordships who felt a strong objection to abolish the distinction now existing between traders and non-traders; they acceded to that proposal, however, although they felt it was an experiment of doubtful policy, being mainly influenced by the clause which deprived that portion of the Bill of any retrospective effect. That being so, I do not think it would be fair to this House, if, after the Government have allowed the Bill to pass here without an objection, it should be suffered to remain a considerable time in the House of Commons, and then be returned to us at a period when your Lordships' House is but thinly attended, and when the Government may think they can carry any Amendments. I do not wish to anticipate that that it is the intention of the Government; but I hope the noble Earl will be able to say that the Government will accept the Bill as it stands, and will recommend the acceptance of it by the House of Commons, so as thereby to terminate this discussion by the passing of a measure which in the main will, I believe, be very acceptable to all classes of the mercantile community, though there may be a difference of opinion with regard to some of its provisions.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that what the noble Earl had stated in reference to the proceedings of the Select Committee were in the main accurate—the Amendments certainly were not agreed to until after much difference of opinion and long discussion. But he (Earl Granville) was not at all converted from his original opinion that in no one way would there be any great advantage in referring the Bill to a Select Committee. By discussing the measure in the House their Lordships would have enjoyed all the advantages derived from its consideration before a Select Committee, with this further and great advantage—namely, that the public would have been made aware of the arguments which were urged on either side. In point of order, too, there would have been the additional advantage, that whereas in the Select Committee four or five noble Lords were sometimes stating their views at once, here only one noble Lord would have spoken at a time. He admitted fully that the Committee had paid an earnest and anxious attention to the Bill according to their respective views of its provisions, and he admitted also as to most of the divisions which had taken place that they were not purely party divisions, but that noble Lords on the same side of the House voted in different ways, and that on the whole the Committee dealt with the Bill in a spirit of impartiality and fairness. He did not think it necessary to go through the different points on which alterations had been introduced. The noble Earl had asked him for so many assurances with regard to the Bill that he could not remember them all.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I only asked for one assurance, and in the alternative for one other.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl had asked him to assure the House that the Government would adopt the Bill as it now stood, and would press its acceptance upon the House of Commons, and if any alterations were made in the other House that the Bill should be sent back to this House at an early period. Now, it was quite impossible for him to give such an assurance. The noble Earl said that the Government had accepted the alterations made in this House. They had certainly accepted them to this extent—that they had not abandoned the Bill owing to their having been made. When a Bill of this sort was referred to a Select Committee, although it was perfectly competent for any one to re-open the questions decided upon by that Committee, it was the general practice to accept their decision with regard to the details. There was a majority in the Committee in favour of the Amendments which were adopted, and when the Bill came again before the House there seemed to be the same majority there, so that it would have been idle to endeavour to reverse that decision. No one could be more anxious than the Government were that a Bill should be passed in the course of the present Session on this important question:—with regard, however, to the assurance which he had been asked for he could not say more than that the Government would carefully consider the altered state of the Bill; that they would accept it if they deemed it for the public advantage to do so, and that if alterations in it were made by the House of Commons they would endeavour to send it back to this House as quickly as was consistent with the due course of public business.

LORD OVERSTONE: My Lords, I am desirous to say a few words on the present occasion, because I concurred in almost every alteration made by the Committee in the Bill, which in its further progress I earnestly hope will have the real and cordial support of the Government. I am the more anxious to express my feelings with regard to this Bill, because previous to the reference of the Bill to the Select Committee the duty was imposed on me of presenting several petitions, signed by many influential parties connected with the mercantile and trading world, not only in this Metropolis, but in various parts of the kingdom; all these parties expressing some apprehensions more or less distinct of the danger to which the Bill would be subjected from alteration in the Select Committee. But, having attended that Committee regularly, and watched its proceedings with great attention and anxiety, I am bound to say thus publicly, that in my opinion the members of that Committee, to whatever political party they belonged, discussed the Bill with perfect good faith, and with the determination to apply themselves diligently to correct many real defects and render it a practical and really valuable measure. I agree with the noble Earl (Earl Granville) in regretting in some respects that the discussion in the Committee was not taken in a more public manner; had that been so the public would have been made more fully aware of the strong, and I think, unanswerable reasons on which the decision of the Committee was founded. It appeared to the Committee that the creation of a new Judge was unnecessary; that it would only substitute an inferior tribunal of appeal for a better one now existing; that it would create a new officer with a large salary, whose appointment would not be attended by any adequate results; and that, after the first impression of novelty had worn off, the appointment would assume the appearance of what is called a job. The rejection of this new judgeship was, therefore, most wisely and judiciously decided upon; indeed, it received more general approval in the Committee than any other alteration. There are some other modifications, but those I will not now discuss. I will simply say that, in my opinion, by the changes made by the Select Committee, the measure has been materially improved; and, from what I have been able to ascertain of the feeling of the country on the subject, I may venture to say that a large proportion of the community are prepared to accept the Bill in its present form as a satisfactory measure, from which they may expect to derive many, if not all, of the beneficial results they are anxious to obtain; and if the Bill should miscarry in the other House of Parliament, through want of faithful support from the Government, I think it will be a great calamity, and will cause very general disappointment.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he was aware that his opinion in the law did not deserve much weight with their Lordships, but he had attended the meetings of the Committee very regularly, and although he had entered it under the impression that the Bill was perfect, he had come out convinced that, by some of the alterations adopted, it had been greatly improved. He regretted to observe the disposition of the Government to depart from the recommendation of the Committee to dispense with the Chief Judge. He had every wish to support the Government on this point; but having listened to the matter fairly, he must say that not the shadow of an argument was adduced in favour of creating such an officer. It was not simply a majority of the Committee that so decided; there was, in fact, a real unanimity upon the subject; and he thought it was one of those things in reference to which the House of Commons would hardly venture to say that they were prepared to be more extravagant than the House of Lords. True, the Commons had been dealing rather extravagantly of late with the public money; but, seeing that not even the law Lords—to say nothing of the lay Lords—had an argument to advance in favour of the new judgeship, he thought it would be an outrageous act if the House of Commons were to attempt to restore the clause. He hoped, at least, the Government would not lend their aid to such an act on the part of the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that his silence must not necessarily be considered as an acquiescence in what had just fallen from his two noble Friends, for he conscientiously believed that by doing away with the Chief Judgeship the Bill was mutilated and deteriorated. He was sorry that the arguments which he had used had made such small impression upon the Committee, but his opinion was that there were functions assigned to the Chief Judge which could not be supplied by any other means; that the Bill would not work beneficially without an increase of judicial power, and that there was much reason to regret that that portion of the Bill had been struck out. He believed it was no part of the noble Earl's intention to move the destruction of the Chief Judgeship. Indeed, the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) took the merit to himself that neither he nor his Friends had proposed the Motion which had so mutilated the Bill, and, in all probability, if it were not for a Motion emanating from a totally different quarter, but for which he had sincere respect, the Chief Judge would have passed triumphantly through the Select Committee. The noble Earl had asked him, before voting against the chief judgeship, whether he was prepared to say that the Government would not go on with the Bill if that Motion were carried; and he (the Lord Chancellor) replied, with perfect sincerity, that he was not prepared for such a Motion being made; that he had no authority from the Government for stating that they would not go on; but he believed that without the Chief Judge the Bill would not work beneficially, and there was great reason to doubt its success. That opinion he still retained; and he believed that it would be a very great improvement of the Bill if the Chief Judge were restored. He repeated, however, what he had stated on a former occasion, that he was satisfied the Committee had acted fairly and conscientiously, and with the single aim of making the measure as perfect as possible.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that he had taken pains to point out to the Committee all the functions which the new Chief Judge would have to perform, both in substitution for the present Courts of Appeal and de novo, and certainly all that he was required to do de novo was infinitesimally small. There was no opposition to the abolition of the judgeship in the sense of a division. His noble and learned friend had stated to the Committee very nearly what he had just said; but he did not then give more reasons for the appointment than he had given now. After investigating the question narrowly, he had himself come to the conclusion that there was no necessity for such a functionary, and the Committee were of the same opinion. On other alterations proposed there were divisions, but on this there was none. He was very glad that this short discussion had taken place; he hoped it would remove an impression he was sorry to see had taken root in some quarters—that their Lordships had a sort of normal function of opposing what the rest of the community wished and desired. He was sure that those who witnessed the course taken by the Committee would admit that it could not have come to any other conclusion than that there was nothing of a party character in the Committee's discussions. With regard to the Assignees' clauses, it had been made a question how far the mercantile interest ought to preponderate; but this ought not to guide the decision. He thought it far from desirable that three-fourths of the creditors should decide what the other fourth were to do. It was because this was thought a dangerous provision that the Committee introduced the only substantial alteration in principle in the Bill. It was this—that the management and collection of the funds of the creditors should be placed, or rather remain, in the hands of the official assignees, and should not be in the hands of the creditors' assignees. He considered that it was a most beneficial change to make in the Bill, to entrust the administration of the estate to a person who had no interest in concealing anything, and who would expose alike the delinquencies of the creditor and of the debtor. This was the only alteration in substance that had been made by the Committee, for the chief judgeship was a question of the machinery only. There had been a great fallacy prevalent in treating the creditors of an estate as though they were a corporation, whereas, in fact, each had his own individual interests. Why should a creditor for £100 be told that he must leave another creditor, whose debt was £300, to decide in what way the liquidation should take place? He believed that the old system was the best, and that it was for the public interest that there should be some independent functionary to see that justice was done. The alteration which had been introduced by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) thirty years ago, whereby official assignees were substituted for creditors' assignees, had produced most beneficial results, one of which was the recovery of a sum of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000, which, after lying idle for years, was divided among the creditors who were entitled to it. He, therefore, trusted that when the Bill was returned to the other House it would not be supposed there that their Lordships had been merely intending to obstruct a Bill which would be beneficial to the mercantile community; but that it would be agreed that they had been endeavouring to render it as fit as possible for the objects which it was designed to carry out.

LORD WENSLEYDALE bore testimony to the unwearied attention that had been devoted by the Select Committee to the consideration of this Bill. He had concurred in the alteration that had been made by striking out the Chief Judge, for the thought that the arguments of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) were quite insufficient, and that never before had there been a proposal to create so unnecessary an office. The business which that functionary would have had to dispose of would be only that which the Vice-Chancellor formerly, and now the Lords Justices had to deal with, and he found that the bankruptcy appeals in Chancery only occupied an average of fifteen days a year. It was monstrous to suppose that to dispose of that business a Judge was required of equal rank and with higher salary than the common law Judges, whose whole time was devoted to the performance of public duties.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly, with the Amendments; further Amendments made.

On Question that the Bill do pass,

LORD BROUGHAM rose to confirm the statement of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) as to the great and beneficial change that had been made in taking the management of estates out of the hands of creditors' assignees and transferring them to official assignees. When he proposed that alteration thirty years ago he was assured by a member of the banking firm of Smith, Payne, & Co., that that house would lose between £3,000 and £4,000 a year by the change, being the amount of interest upon sums of money belonging to various estates which lay idle and unprofitable—as far as the creditors were concerned—in their hands. At the time he referred to a sum of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 was recovered by the official assignees which had been neglected by the creditors' assignees, and dividends were paid; in some cases the debts were fully satisfied and the bankruptcies annulled. The Bill as it now stood contained some very valuable principles, and would, he hoped, be deemed acceptable by the other House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it might be supposed from that conversation that this Bill as it originally stood wholly dispensed with the official assignees. That, however, was an entire mistake. Great benefits had resulted from the labours of the official assignees, but those benefits would be preserved and made even more effectual by this measure. It was the almost unanimous desire of the commercial world that there should be a creditor's assignee appointed by those who had an interest in the debtor's estate, and also superintended by them, and that he should be carefully watched over by the official assignee, who in turn should, likewise, be carefully watched over by the creditors' assignee. As originally framed, the provisions of the Bill in this respect would, he believed, have worked most advantageously.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL BILL.

COMMITTEE (ON RECOMMITMENT).

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on Recommitment) read.

Moved—That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, their Lordships were about to deal with a great and honourable charity, which was not a fit subject for party discussion, and he now appealed with confidence to the House to rescue that charity from the condition in which it had hitherto stood. Greenwich Hospital had long been used for purposes of Government jobbery by all parties, and it was high time that such a state of things should be put an end to; but this Bill would perpetuate all these evils. The institution was one of such national value and importance that the country generally must feel a deep interest in its proper and efficient management. Its funds, which were very large in amount, were derived from various sources. It had about £3,500,000 sterling invested in Government securities; it had also large landed estates in the north of England; it had mines besides; and a fund of about £500,000 taken from the wages of British seamen. This honoured charity was not a charity only—it had a double claim to public consideration—because it at once offered to seamen a reward for distinguished services and an honourable retreat in which to spend the years which remained to them after an active career. In 1829 the Hospital was found to have been so mismanaged that Parliament interfered with some strong measures to check the evil. The funds had been used by the Government of the day for purposes which it was difficult to define, and the Ministers suddenly became so alarmed that a Bill of Indemnity was brought in to protect them from the legal consequences of their acts. An enactment was also passed re-constituting the government of the Hospital on principles sound enough in themselves, but which had led to serious mischief from the manner in which they had been applied. From 1829 down to 1842 the Governors and managers of the institution were political officers who vacated their appointments with the Ministry of the day. In 1841 Sir Robert Peel attempted, without coming to Parliament for the purpose, to remedy the evil by appointing a Commission to inquire into the management of the Hospital. In that he was assisted by Sir James Graham, who, in the evidence which he gave before the Commission on the subject, said that, as far as his experience went, the checks insituted in 1829 with regard to the safe custody of the monies had proved inefficient; and he spoke of the great misfortune that arose from the circumstances that the governorships were filled up on political considerations, and that the Governors were permitted to have seats in Parliament. The spirit of the Act of 1829 was, no doubt, perfectly pure; but as administered by the Government of the day was corrupt in the extreme. The remedy proposed by the Commission of 1842 was the appointment of naval officers as Commissioners and trustees who were to have the management of the estates and funds of the Hospital, but were to have no part in the management and internal discipline, which was placed under a permanent managing body; and the Commissioners were not to have seats in Parliament. This arrangement had, however, broken down. What was wanted in the present condition of the Hospital was a better system of internal management, and detailed discipline, together with the faithful carrying out of the Act of 1829. He now came to the Bill before the House, and he would ask whether it was likely that it would rescue the Hospital from the position which he had described when it was considered that the measure would hand over the management of the funds, estates, and patronage of the establishment to the Board of Admiralty? The whole management of this great national charity was handed over more than ever to the jurisdiction and administration of the Lords of the Admiralty for the time being, thus rendering its government a political matter, instead of being, as it ought to be, vested in the Crown, or in Commissioners appointed by the Crown, independent of all exercise of political power whatever. What he would recommend was very simple. He would say that the Crown, naturally having the power, should be authorized by Parliament to appoint a body of independent gentlemen to be Commissioners and trustees, perhaps three in number, to hold the estates and properties of the Hospital; adding, if they liked, two Ministers of the Crown. These Commissioners should be thoroughly independent of any control whatever, and should not be permitted to have seats in Parliament. They should be the managers of the estates and properties belonging to the Hospital, there being also a receiver and a banker; the Admiralty should then come in to deal with the property for the benefit of the Hospital, its whole appointments, details, and discipline being handed over to them. He would, however, separate as much as he could the government of the estates from the political control of any party, except with the consent of Parliament. He hoped their Lordships would deal with this Bill in such a manner as they thought would best secure the interests of the Hospital. He held a strong opinion on the subject, and he must enforce that opinion by a division. For the purpose of raising the question he should move that the Bill be recommitted this day week, in order that the Bill might be amended in the form he proposed.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Week.")

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that when he understood the noble Earl intended to oppose this Bill, he was curious to learn on what grounds he meant to do so, for it was strictly founded on the Report of the Commission—its whole scope and object was to place the estates and management of Greenwich Hospital on a better and more satisfactory footing, in order that the funds should be applied more effectually to the benefit of the inmates. On the former occasion he stated strong reasons why the Amendment was rejected. He then, from statistics of good authority, compared the cost of the pensioners in the Hôtel des Invalides with those in Greenwich Hospital. The cost of maintaining a pensioner at the Hôtel des Invalides in France was £31 16s.; the cost of a pensioner at Greenwich Hospital amounted to £59 6s.—almost double. The cost as to food and care was very much the same in both; the great difference arose on the cost for discipline, administration, and the care of the sick. In France the cost per head for these purposes was £5 5s. ; in Greenwich Hospital it was £28 18s. This alone showed that some change was required. With regard to the management the proposal of the noble Earl was that the Crown should appoint two or three independent gentlemen, and that they should have the management of the Hospital. That was the very thing the Government proposed to do—they proposed that a Rear Admiral should be appointed for five years, removable at the end of that term; that a Medical Commissioner connected with the navy should be appointed, also removable at the end of five years; and that one civil Commissioner, to act as an accountant, should also be appointed. The appointment of civil Commissioners to be of a more permanent character. This was quite in accordance with the suggestion of Sir James Graham, who said he saw no necessity for more than one Civil Commissioner. There would be no patronage beyond what was now exercised by the Admiralty in the appointments connected with the Hospital and the dockyards. The noble Earl objected to the Commissioners having seats in Parliament. He (the Duke of Somerset) quite agreed that there should not be political appointments, and when he proposed that the Commissioners should be a naval officer, a medical man, and an accountant, he never anticipated their going into Parliament. With regard to the livings belonging to the Hospital, the Act of George IV. appointed the First Lord of the Admiralty patron. It was provided that they should be filled by chaplains in the navy, and chaplains would be appointed to them hereafter. The nominations to the upper school at Greenwich used to be with the Lords of the Admiralty, and one of the first things he did on coming into office was to give up that patronage, placing the matter in the hands of a very competent body. Examinations were to take place, and candidates were to be selected, according to regulations which were to be laid before Parliament. It had been said the accounts of the Greenwich Hospital estates were not brought under the Audit Office. There was a clause in the Bill which provided for an effective audit, and, as that clause had been drawn up with the assistance of the Accountant General of the Navy, and of Mr. Anderson of the Treasury, he had no doubt it would answer its purpose in every respect. The monies were to be paid into the Bank of England, the accounts were to be rendered from time to time to the Admiralty, and were to be submitted to the Commissioners for auditing the public accounts. With regard to the general purposes of the Bill, his object was, in the first place, to increase the advantages of the Hospital to seamen. He had already raised the allowance of a certain class of pensioners, and done many other things which he was able to do without an Act of Parliament. But a new Act was required to put the whole establishment on a better footing than heretofore. The existing system of management had not worked well, and he had no doubt that the plan proposed in the Bill would be found a great improvement. He proposed, among other changes, that the subordinate offices connected with the Hospital should be filled by persons appointed for the efficiency of their services, and not from motives of benevolence. More money would then be available for the real objects of the charity. The Bill was founded upon the Report of the Commissioners, though he had thought it inexpedient to adopt the whole of their recommendations. One of their proposals which he had rejected was that arrangements should be made for the accommodation within the Hospital of the wives and families of pensioners. Upon several other points he had not adopted the recommendations of the Commissioners; but he had followed their Report wherever he had found it practicable to do so. He believed that the plan for bringing in fresh men every five years would give life and activity to the management of the Hospital. The present Governor was to be retained, but his administrative duties would be transferred to the new Commissioners. He might still, however, exercise a useful supervision, and communicate with the Admiralty from time to time. The noble Duke concluded by stating his readiness to insert a clause, prohibiting the Commissioners from sitting in Parliament, and to give a careful consideration to any other Amendment which the noble Earl might see fit to propose.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was some time since he read the recommendations of the Commissioners in respect to the pensioners of Greenwich Hospital; but so far as his recollection went the alterations recommended did not require an Act of Parliament. They could be introduced by the Governor himself. Undoubtedly there had been for a long while serious mismanagement of the affairs of the Hospital, which could not be remedied without an Act of Parliament. With regard to the last named officer, it appeared to him (the Earl of Derby) to be a singular course to pursue, and contrary to the practice of modern times, to leave the Governor in his high and honourable office, and to deprive him of all interference in the management of the institution.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that that was a recommendation of the Commissioners.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it might be so; nevertheless it was contrary to practice to make these appointments mere honorary offices, and to prevent the head of the Department from interfering in the management. But his main object was to call attention to the circumstance that the noble Duke had not drawn a distinction between two subjects totally different—namely, the Hospital and the arrangements connected with it, and the management of the estates which provided funds for the Hospital. He quite agreed with the noble Duke that the management of the Hospital might be conducted by Commissioners acting under the control of the Admiralty, and removable at a certain period of time; but he could not conceive any arrangement so absolutely destructive of good administration as one by which the agent managing an estate should be removed at the end of five years.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET explained that the estates had been managed for a great many years by a receiver who had brought them to a high degree of improvement; and he never thought of removing him from office. But no person was immortal, and it might be necessary that another should be appointed. The receiver, however, would have to render his accounts as before to the Commissioners, and they would be audited by the Audit Office.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the explanation of the noble Duke seemed to be that the Commissioners would have the nominal management, but they would have nothing to do with the estates in the hands of the receiver. It appeared to him that the management of the estates should be wholly distinct from the management of the Hospital. Then with regard to the livings, the noble Duke said they had been under the control of the Admiralty for a long period, and that it was desirable that they should so remain. Now he (the Earl of Derby) thought it much better that the advowsons should be sold and the proceeds carried to the credit of the charity.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE thought he was quite right in the course he had taken, but would not divide the House upon his proposition. He would remind the noble Duke that according to the charters of 1775 and 1809, it was provided that the management of the Hospital should be under the control of officers who had lost a limb or had been otherwise disabled in active service. And now the noble Duke was preparing a scheme which was precisely contrary to the intentions of the founders.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn;

Then the Original Motion was agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 12 (Continuation of Office of Governor),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH considered that the office of Governor of Greenwich Hospital should be conferred on the ground of great public services; and he objected to making it an honorary employment. It might be honorary, but it was not honourable to place an old officer in such a situation, giving him nothing but money and a house furnished, and depriving him of all power. He proposed to leave out the words at the end of the 12th Clause, "and shall not take any active part in the management of the Hospital."

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that if the Governor were to take any active part it would unhinge the whole management, and it was, therefore, thought advisable to appoint an officer in whom the Admiralty had confidence, and who could give them an independent opinion, but without conferring on him a power which would clash with that of the Commissioners.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that might be avoided if the Government would adopt the suggestion of his noble and gallant Friend, and give the Governor the internal management of the Hospital and that of the estate to the Commissioners.

Amendment negatived.

Clause was then agreed to without a division.

Amendment made; the Report thereof to be received on Friday next.

MILITIA.—ADDRESS FOR RETURN.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE moved an Address for a Return of the Establishment, Effective Strength, and Numbers present at the Training of Militia regiments in 1860; and a similar return for the present year. What he wished to ascertain was how the regiments had come out this year, numerically speaking, as compared with last year?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, his noble Friend the Secretary for War, who had been obliged to leave the House owing to other engagements, had commissioned him to say that the Militia had come up during the present year in greater numbers, and had displayed greater efficiency, than was the case last year. Perhaps the noble Viscount would not move the return at the present moment. His noble Friend had ordered a comparative return to be prepared giving the precise information which was desired, and it was a great source of satisfaction to his noble Friend and the Government that this return would show increased numbers and efficiency on the part of the Militia in the present year.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Friday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Tuesday, June 18, 1861.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL AND HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE [SALARIES, &c.].
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
MR. MILNER GIBSON moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee upon this subject,
House in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he found that the Government proposed to create two new Members of the Indian Council at a salary of £8,000 a year each, whose nomination was to be placed in the hands of the Secretary for India in this country, and also to invest the Indian Secretary with the power of appointing fourteen additional Judges. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) objected both to the contemplated extension of the patronage of the Indian Secretary, and the addition to the expenditure of India, and he should upon a future occasion oppose those proposals.

Resolved,
“ That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of the Revenues of India, of the Salaries of the ordinary Members of the Council of the Governor General, and of the Salaries, Retiring Pensions, and Expenses of the Judges of the High Court of Judicature of the several Presidencies, in pursuance [of the provisions of any Acts of the present Session relating to the Council of the Governor General, and the establishing High Courts of Judicature in India.”

House resumed.
Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

HARBOURS BILL.—COMMITTEE.
Order for Committee read;
Motion made, and Question proposed,
“ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”
MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to call attention to the great difference between the Bill upon which the House was now asked to go into Committee, and the one which passed a second reading about six weeks or two months ago. The Bill proposed to grant loans for making of harbours. To that he had no objection. Neither had he any objection to the proposal to abolish passing tolls. Indeed, he hoped the Amendment of which notice had been given by a hon. Gentleman, to refer that part of the Bill to a Select Committee, would be withdrawn. Passing tolls had already been examined into by Select Committees, and they had been condemned by both sides of the House. Then the Bill proposed to abolish tolls for charitable purposes and differential dues. To these proposals he had no objection. But what he did object to was the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade intended to deal with this part of the question. And here the difference arose between the Bill then before them and that which had been read a second time. By the first Bill it was proposed that dues levied by charitable corporations should cease and determine from the time when the Bill came into operation. As the Bill then stood, it was proposed that these tolls should not cease till the 1st of January, 1872, and the Government took power to make an Order in Council to extend them even beyond that time. Again, by the first Bill the differential dues were to cease on the 1st of January, 1862, and the parties were to have compensation for five years. By the new Bill they were to have compensation for ten years. Then he objected to the way in which it was proposed to deal with Rams-gate Harbour. The first proposal was to vest it in the Trinity House; now it was to be placed under the Board of Trade. He had no objection to that if the Board of Trade was to be in the nature of a trustee; but he did object to the powers given in Clauses 32 and 42, by which, as it seemed to him, the Board of Trade would have power to sell the harbour to any private company, though it had been decided by Committees of that House over and over again that no power of selling harbours should exist. But the main point to which he wished to call attention was the following:—Previous to 1826, when we entered into treaties with foreign nations with regard to the admission of foreign shipping, there were certain incorporated bodies who were allowed to levy differential dues on foreign shipping. The amount of dues then levied on foreign ships amounted to £10,000, and we had since paid for compensation to those bodies very large sums of money for the loss of the dues. In Hull there were three bodies who had a right to levy these dues. In 1826 the dues amounted to £5,000; last year the dues on foreign ships were £24,000—for the House would observe that after our change of policy with foreign nations, the amount of foreign shipping that came into our ports was very much increased. By the first Bill the Government proposed to deal very liberally with Hull, and to pay to it £120,000 as compensation. But Hull had already been compensated out of the public Exchequer to the amount of £473,000; so that in all Hull would have received £590,000. The town of Hull was not satisfied with this arrangement. They had demanded, and, so far as the Government was concerned, succeeded in obtaining £240,000, which, added to the sums they had already received, would give them compensation to the amount of £713,000. Now, he wished to know how it came that a Bill had been laid on their table by which Hull was to receive £120,000, and that now they had before them another Bill which increased that sum to £240,000? He hoped this was not done under the threat that the parties locally interested would do their best to throw out the Bill if their demands were not complied with. Then take the case of Newcastle:—In 1826 the Corporation of Newcastle received from differential tolls on foreign shipping £1,100; last year they received £10,400 for foreign shipping. They had received in all as compensation £126,000, the greater part of which had gone to pave the streets of Newcastle. The Trinity-house of Newcastle in 1826 received £350 for the pilotage of foreign vessels; but in 1860 it received £8,600. These two bodies in Newcastle had received in all £240,000 since 1826. By the original Bill £95,000 was proposed to be given to them as compensation; but by the new Bill no less a sum than £195,000 was to be given, in addition to the £240,000 which Newcastle had already received. He wanted to have an explanation of this change. Liverpool was down for a respectable sum in the shape of pilotage. They had paid the Liverpool pilots since 1826 somewhere about £172,000. By the original Bill they would have had to pay them in round numbers £45,000 more; and that was a liberal settlement, considering they had already received £172,000. But the Liverpool pilots, he was sorry to say, were no more satisfied than the Hull and Newcastle Corporations appeared to be; and they demanded, and it was proposed by Bill No. 2 to give them, £90,000, for which the public derived no benefit. The pilot boats were held in shares, and the sum drawn from the Exchequer was divided amongst the owners. The consequence was that a pilot boat worth about £2,000 sold for £8,000, and paid an interest of somewhere about 9 per cent. He must complain that the Liverpool pilots should have the right to come to the House every year and ask for £9,000, for which they gave no equivalent; and that when a sum of £45,000 was offered to them, they would not be satisfied, but came down and got a pledge that they should get £90,000. He also must complain that the President of the Board of Trade should have got a Bill read a second time, with propositions giving to certain parties £250,000 by way of compensation, and that now he should produce a totally different Bill, giving compensation to the same parties to no less an amount than £500,000. He should be prepared in Committee to make such Amendments as would remove the objections he had stated.

MR. THOMPSON said, that the proposal in the Bill to give loans to harbours which could give security, was a mockery in so far as those harbours were concerned which could not give security. Taking the case of Whitby, its present revenue was about £5,800, of which £5,300 were derived from passing tolls, and if those were taken off, as proposed by the Bill, the place would be left with only £500 to maintain its harbour. What was there in that to afford security? Nor would the harbour retrieve itself by levying dues on imports and exports. The utmost that could be expected from such a source was £1,100 or £1,200 a year, which would be totally insufficient for any purposes of providing harbours of refuge. That would be the result of the application of the Bill to the case of Whitby, which, as a harbour of refuge, had saved 3,700 ships in six years. It became them, therefore, to consider whether they were to have any harbours of refuge or not. Were they prepared to give up the principle of selection of the best places for these harbours of refuge, and, by adopting the Bill, simply give such places the power of raising a loan for the purpose? He was not favourable to passing tolls, but until a proper substitute had been provided he did not think that Whitby should be deprived of the privilege of levying them. For these reasons he should move that the Bill be referred for consideration to a Select Committee.

* Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee," instead thereof.

MR. DEEDES seconded the Amendment.

MR. CAYLEY said, he thought that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Thompson) had clearly shown that compensation should be given in the case of Whitby, if the passing tolls that now existed there were abolished. These tolls were granted to Whitby, not by charter, but by Act of Parliament, in perpetuity. He trusted, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, would reconsider the case of Whitby in that spirit in which he had dealt with the cases of Hull, Newcastle, and Liverpool.

MR. DEEDES said, he had seconded the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, because he could see no other course open by which the interests of the parties which would be affected by the Bill could be submitted to fair consideration. As to Whitby, he thought it was one of those cases in which the House might fairly step in and protect its privileges.

The measure would interfere with private interests to an extent which required the most careful consideration on the part of the House; and he had to observe that the labours of the proposed Committee need not extend over a very lengthened period, and need not prevent the House from passing the measure before the close of the present Session. He specially objected to the new clauses in the Bill for the management of Dover Harbour, and he thought the commissioners of that harbour were fairly entitled to be heard in the matter. Parliament had sanctioned the payment of passing tolls at Dover, for the purpose of maintaining the harbour, and it, likewise, sanctioned the borrowing of money on the security of those tolls, for the purpose of carrying out various kinds of improvements. The case of Dover was shortly this: the harbour commissioners, on the faith of Acts of Parliament, had borrowed from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners a certain sum for carrying out extensions and repairs in connection with the harbour. The Bill proposed provided from the 1st January, 1862, to abolish passing tolls, which were the security for the payment of the money borrowed, without in any way providing for the extinction of the debt. A sum of £5,600 was paid yearly to the Exchequer Loan Commissions, in the shape of principal and interest, and he did not see what means the Board would have to pay that sum in future years if the tolls were abolished. He affirmed that the Gentlemen who proposed to deal in that way with Dover, ignored the very first principle which they ought to adopt—that of paying their debts. He was a commissioner of Dover Harbour, but he disclaimed having any interest whatever in the matter beyond that of protecting those rights which he had been elected to defend. If, therefore, the hon. Member for Whitby went to a division, he would support him in sending the Bill before a Select Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he naturally looked at the matter in this light—whether the Bill which was intended for the benefit of the shipping interest would impose an undue rate of charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and thus upon the greater portion of Her Majesty's subjects. He agreed entirely with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Sunderland on that point. The harbour of Hull, for instance, had already received, in the shape of differential dues, what would amount to eighty or ninety years' purchase. The 29 Geo. III., to which the Trinity House of Hull referred in their petition, recited an intention simply of indemnifying, but instead of that, it had given what would really compensate the parties several times over, and had paid not only on the amount of shipping which then frequented the harbour, but on the increased amount which was attracted by the provisions of the Act itself. It was just as if, upon a proposal to free Waterloo Bridge, they should pay, not upon the number of passengers who now passed, but upon the increased number that would pass when there was no toll to pay. That was a mistake on the part of the Government of the time, and he could only say that the different bodies interested were very fortunate in obtaining what they did. He hoped, if the Bill were to go to a Select Committee, the Board of Trade and the public would be free to contend that the compensation should be reduced to a much smaller amount, and that they were not in any way bound by the proposals of the Bill.

MR. CAVE: The remarks of the hon. Baronet entirely vindicated the course proposed by the hon. Member for Whitby to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, for a Committee of the Whole House was not the best tribunal by which to try the rights of private individuals. He would take the hon. Baronet's (Sir Francis Goldsmid's) arguments, therefore, as affording the strongest ground in behalf of a considerable private interest, which was very inadequately represented by him (Mr. Cave); he meant the shareholders in Shoreham harbour. The hon. Baronet admitted that those differential dues were secured in perpetuity under the Act, though he said it was done in a bungling manner—that it was not intended to be done, and that, therefore, it ought to cease. The hon. Baronet belonged to the legal profession, and surely he should have known better than that; for even if there were a blunder in the original bargain, at any rate those who ought to suffer were not the innocent parties who had purchased the property on the faith of the provisions of an Act of Parliament. No doubt private interests must give way to public, but he could not see that it was good public policy to deal too harshly with private interests. He had now to complain that, since the Bill had been altered, the injustice of which his constituents were most sensible had been greatly magnified and enlarged; because the right hon. Gentleman, the author of the Bill, laid down as a principle in the original measure that private interests ought to receive double the compensation which was received by public. All public companies were now to receive the same compensation with private parties—namely, ten years. In the course of the speech with which the right hon. Gentleman introduced his Bill, he impliedly stated that twenty years' purchase was about the proper compensation for those interests. The difference between public and private interests was not laid down by the right hon. Gentleman for the first time; it formed a prominent element in the debate on the Bill of 1856 for abolishing differential dues and Passing Tolls. In that debate it was stated over and over again, and Mr. Hallam was quoted to the effect, that private interests ought to be regarded in a different point of view. Moreover, the principle had been acted upon in various instances, especially in the case of sinecures, as in some notorious cases, fresh in the memory of the House, present holders received the full amount of these payments, which, as a matter of public policy, ought never to have been guaranteed to them. No longer ago than the present year the Committee on which he (Mr. Cave) had served, held the Government to their improvident bargain in the case of the Red Sea Telegraph Company. He trusted, then, the House would adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Whitby, to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. MOFFATT thought the alterations which had been smuggled into the Bill were such as could not fail to excite the jealousy of the House as guardians of the public purse, and he condemned that part of the Bill which would enable the Board of Trade to dispose of Ramsgate harbour, it might be to some private railway company. He should be disposed, without further explanation, to support the Motion.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought the hon. Member (Mr. Lindsay) did not on that occasion hold opinions which were favourable to British shipping. He had been doing his best, with great ingenuity and ability, but he must say without success, to convince the people of the country that it was better for money to come out of the hands of Englishmen than out of the hands of foreigners. If the money had been productive of no benefit to the country, why, in the name of common sense, should it not come out of the pocket of the foreigner? He thought it most unwise to attempt to deal with rights which had been secured by the most stringent provisions which the country could provide.

SIR JOHN JOHNSTONE said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would be able to afford such explanations with respect to the Bill that it would not be necessary to refer it to a Select Committee. For his part, he did not wish to do anything which would endanger its passing in the course of the present Session; but he could not help thinking that under the measure as it stood no sufficient means would be left of maintaining many of our smaller tidal harbours.

MR. KENDALL supported the proposal for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that he thought they would have done more wisely to have gone into Committee and discussed the clauses. He had heard no argument against the general policy of the Bill, and any argument used had reference to particular clauses. He saw nothing in the Bill to alarm them with respect to Ramsgate harbour. But the sale of public harbours to private companies was by no means a new thing. He very well remembered Folkestone before it was sold to the Corporation, and a more dead alive place he never saw, except Dover. Now it was made a flourishing port, and a large sum of money had been expended upon it. Lowestoft was another instance of the same thing; and he was sure that Parliament would take care that neither Ramsgate nor Dover were handed over to any company without good guarantees being taken for their proper management. He deprecated strongly the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. NICOL said, he wished to defend the inhabitants of Dover from the reflections cast upon them by the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes). The fact was the port was suffering from the management of the Commissioners, of whom the hon. Member for East Kent was one. The people of Dover wanted to take their own affairs into their own hands. He objected to the Bill being sent to a Select Committee.

MR. MILNER GIBSON observed, that it would have been very much easier for him to give explanations on the various points of detail which had been referred to as they arose on the various clauses in Committee, but he would endeavour to state the reasons which had induced the Government to make some alterations in this Bill. Those alterations were by no means so extensive as had been represented. So far as the facilities for raising money for improvements in harbours were concerned the provisions had only slightly changed for the better to make the working of the system more efficient. The abolition of passing tolls remained unchanged. It was true that the dues levied by charitable corporations were to be continued for ten years instead of five; but, practically, there was little difference between that proposal and the first. It was found that they had to deal not only with all existing pensions, but with persons who had acquired a right to have pensions, and it was thought the most judicious course to allow the dues for charitable purposes to last for a period sufficient to meet the case of all vested interests. It was, therefore, thought desirable to leave the dues on shipping for charitable purposes for a period of ten years. With regard to the extension of the period to ten years in the case of dues levied by incorporated bodies in certain towns, he admitted that the Government had agreed to that as a compromise. It was true that the original compact entered into by Parliament to give to certain persons a growing income from the Consolidated Fund as compensation for the loss of the differential dues they had to forego was an improvident engagement for the public; but the engagement was entered into, and the process of doing it away was one attended with very great difficulty. In endeavouring to come to an arrangement he had thought it right to extend the period to ten instead of five years. It was true that more was given in the way of compensation than it was originally intended to give; but it should be recollected that the existing claim upon the Consolidated Fund was a perpetual one, founded upon an Act of Parliament, an Act to which there was no termination. The sum claimed as compensation would also increase year by year. It was essentially a growing claim; and, therefore, he thought it a good settlement of the question to name a time at which that claim would cease altogether; and it was satisfactory to be able to say that the assent of all the parties interested had been obtained to the arrangement. He denied that there was any change in the principle of the Bill, for he could not regard the substitution of ten for five years as any change of principle. He would oppose the Bill being sent to a Select Committee, as it would practically defeat the measure. With regard to Whitby it had not been dealt with so harshly as the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Thompson) was inclined to think. It was true they proposed to take away the passing tolls, which amounted to something like £4,000 or £5,000 a year; but they provided under the Bill an income which the Whitby people themselves estimated at £1,100 a year, while at the same time they would relieve that harbour of a debt of £32,770. Passing ships, which did not propose to enter the harbour, ought not to be called upon to support Whitby Harbour. The Government contended that it was not just that passing vessels should be preyed upon by those local interests. A promise was given to the shipping interest, that when exposed to the unrestricted competition of the foreigner—seeing, too, the competition at home by railways and other modes of carriage—it should be relieved from all unnecessary and unjust burdens, and should not be placed at a disadvantage when compared with other carriers. If the House desired to see the coasting trade of England flourish, and together with that her general maritime trade, they could do no better than relieve the shipping interest of those burdens. As for Whitby, it was no harbour of refuge. In fine weather a ship might be got in, but a man would be insane who in a south-west gale, the only formidable one there, would try to get a ship inside its piers. As to the Amendments of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Dover, they had been brought forward by that Gentleman on the part of his constituents, who proposed to constitute a new Board, and to transfer to it the privileges now vested in the warden and assistants. The people of Dover had a great interest in the management of their own port, and there were railway and other bodies which were directly interested in its good management. It was, therefore, the duty of the Government to consider whether the existing Board was as good a Board as one would be which contained within it members of the corporation and others, and after due reflection they came to the conclusion that the Amendments proposed by the hon. Member deserved support. The present trustees professed to be unable to manage Dover harbour after the passing tolls were abolished. They contended they had a debt to pay, and that the harbour would fall into a neglected state. But the new Board were prepared to take Dover harbour with its burdens and contingencies, and they asked for nothing from the State. Believing, then, that there was property at Dover sufficient to pay the debt, and to yield a considerable income besides, the Government must decline to accede to the proposals of the hon. Member for Kent. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) had correctly stated the effect of the clause as regarded Ramsgate harbour. The harbour having been transferred to the Government, it was thought desirable that the Government should be free to give certain powers to any corporate body, but that could not be done without the entire sanction of Parliament. The Government had received proposals from a railway company, which he thought very advantageous, but they told the company that they could not give them any exclusive powers, and that if they ran a tramway along the pier any other company might make use of it. They had no intention, nor would any Government think of such a thing, to grant Ramsgate harbour to any company without securing that as a harbour of refuge and a commercial port. Ramsgate would be to the shipping interest all that Ramsgate had ever been. Their only object would be to make Ramsgate additionally useful to the public, and also to save the public from any charges which might come upon the Consolidated Fund. He had explained all the points that had been raised, and would simply ask the House to negative the Amendment of the hon. Member for Whitby.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES said, that he was himself a member of the Dover Harbour Commission, and he maintained that there had been no neglect of duty on the part of himself and of his colleagues. All he asked was that that subject should undergo a thorough investigation; and he felt assured that such an investigation would only tend to justify the conduct of the Dover Commissioners. He should support the proposal for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

LORD LOVAINE expressed his approval of those changes in the Bill which went to increase the amount of compensation to those parties whose rights it would specially affect. He believed that without those changes the measure would never pass through that House, and even if it should do so, he felt perfectly certain that it would be rejected in the other House. He was opposed to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, it was a mistake to suppose that all the charters by which the dues proposed to be abolished were granted had been given for the purpose of discouraging foreign shipping. The port which he had the honour to represent (Newcastle) had always been an enlightened place, and it certainly had never been actuated by such narrow views.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought the discussion which had taken place had been mainly caused by the Government having mixed up so many subjects in one Bill. However, he approved of the Bill as it stood, with the exception as to the proposal to hand over Ramsgate harbour to a private company.

MR. THOMPSON said, that in deference to the wishes of the House, he should withdraw his Motion, reserving to himself the right of proposing clauses in Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Advances of Money to Harbour Authorities),

MR. BEECROFT moved the following Amendment:—

“Page 3, line 18, after ‘Assistant Secretaries, add ‘but any place recommended as a site for a harbour of refuge by Her Majesty’s Commissioners on harbours of refuge, in their Report dated the third day of March, 1859, shall have a prior claim on the money at the disposal of the said Loan Commissioners, in preference to any harbour or place not so recommended.’”

The hon. Gentleman said, in proposing this addition to the clause, I may state to the Committee that the mercantile classes are strongly of opinion that no time should be lost in the construction of national life harbours. They take a warm and deep interest in this most important question, in proof of which I may observe that I have this day presented to the House a petition from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, from which I will, with the permission of the Committee, read one or two short extracts—

“Your petitioners would humbly represent that, whilst there are certain objects contemplated in the Bill which have their warm approval, they regret to find that the provisions of the Bill which have reference to the loaning of money by the Government for harbour purposes, do not extend to the granting of such aid for the construction of harbours of refuge at several places or sites on the coasts of England, pointed out and recommended by Her Majesty’s Commissioners in their Report on Harbours of Refuge, dated the 3rd day of March, 1859. They are of opinion that the grievous loss of life and property which annually occurs on the coasts of England, more especially on the north-east coast in the vicinity of Flamborough Head, in consequence of the want of harbours of refuge, is a matter of grave national importance and responsibility, and one that claims the serious and early attention of your honourable House. They, therefore, respectfully submit that not only the interests of our shipping and commerce, but likewise the higher claims of humanity fully justify an immediate grant of loans by Government towards the construction of harbours of refuge, and that such grant should take priority of any application or grant of loans for any other harbour purposes whatever. Your petitioners would respectfully beg to draw your attention to the peculiar necessity existing for a grand national harbour of refuge at Filey Bay on the north-east coast, the construction of which was strongly recommended by Her Majesty’s Commissioners in their Report before mentioned.”

In February, 1860, a very large and influential deputation had an interview with the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty’s Government, and strongly urged that no further delay should be permitted to take place, in the commencement of those highly important and humane works recommended by the Royal Commissioners in their Report, dated the 3rd of March, 1859. That Report concluded with the following appropriate and feeling appeal:—

“We now commend the good work, submitted to our inquiry, to your Majesty’s most gracious protection, in the firm conviction that if fairly carried out in the spirit of our recommendations, it will prove not the least noble of the many works of benevolence which will illustrate the history of your Majesty’s reign.”

The noble Lord said, that he quite agreed with the views entertained by the deputation, but that the state of the finances of the country were such as to prevent the Government granting public money for the construction of additional harbours of refuge. May I ask if the finances of the country are now in a better state than they were then? Certainly not; in that case we must fall back upon the loan, which I should like to see very much increased. The question before us is simply this, are funds to be provided in one shape or other for the construction of harbours of refuge, which all admit to be works of paramount and special necessity? We spend millions of money in building ships of war, and although we know above one thousand valuable lives are annually lost by shipwreck, and from the same cause the destruction of at least one million and a half of property is annually involved, yet we adopt no means to lessen the evil and to prevent as much as possible such national calamities. This must be, to say the least of it, suicidal policy. Under such circumstances I ask how are we to man our fleet in time of war? The line of the north-east coast of England from the Fern Islands to Flamborough Head, a sea distance of 100 miles, is that within which the scenes of shipwreck and loss of life are annually most numerous and distressing. Among this length of coast passes 45 per cent of the whole coasting trade of England and 32 per cent of her entire trade, coasting and foreign together. On this dangerous sea-board, England's great nursery for seamen, the Royal Commissioners have selected the mouth of the River Tyne, Hartlepool Bay and Filey Bay, as the most eligible sites for life and refuge harbours. Filey is admirably situated for such a purpose. It is peculiarly adapted by nature for the construction of a harbour of refuge. Nature having already done five-sixths of the work, and provided an ample store of materials close at hand; stone of suitable quality for a breakwater being in the cliffs immediately adjoining. There is ample depth of water for vessels of any size, up to the largest class of ships in Her Majesty's Navy. The holding ground is but rarely equalled and cannot be surpassed. There is entire freedom from banks and shoals; and absence of all tendency to deposit; and an abundant supply of fresh water of excellent quality. In a strategic point of view, a harbour here would in time of war be of immense service. A squadron of men-of-war stationed here could watch the Baltic, and cover the whole coast from the Forth to the Wash. Harbours of refuge should also be commenced immediately at Hartlepool Bay, and at the mouth of the Tyne, for I maintain it is a positive disgrace to this great country, that the whole coast from the Humber to the Frith of Forth is entirely unprotected, there not being a single harbour capable of admitting vessels at low water. Although I have endeavoured to condense my remarks in as few words as possible, I still hope that I have said enough to convince the Committee that the question of national life harbours is one that ought to have our immediate and earnest consideration. I, therefore, leave with confidence to the decision of the Committee the proposal which I have ventured to bring before it.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he must object to any limit being placed on the discretion of the Government in the matter. It appeared to him that it would not be good policy to do so. It must be remembered that the object of the loans was to assist small harbours as well as large, and even fishing harbours, so that they might be improved and made places of protection for life and property. Government ought, therefore, to have full discretion. The hon. Member should bear in mind that the fact of any particular place having been recommended by the Commissioners could not fail to have weight when an application was made on its behalf for a loan. He thought that would be quite sufficient.

MR. BEECROFT said, that he was content to rely upon the promise of the right hon. Gentleman, and withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HODGSON said, he wished to move the insertion of certain words in the clause, the object of which was to make the rate of interest payable upon any sum advanced to the harbour authorities uniform. They were enabled by the Bill to borrow to the extent of £100,000 at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, but upon any sum in excess of that amount they would have to pay a larger amount of interest.

MR. FENWICK said, he must oppose the Amendment; it might enable some of the large public bodies to get more than their due share of the public funds.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he should support the clause, the principle of which was right.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the clause did not limit the amount any harbour authority might obtain for the improvement of the harbour, but it merely provided that upon any sum in excess of £100,000 there should be a higher rate of interest, not to exceed 5 per cent, paid. There should be a check against any one great body, such as the Mersey Board, coming forward and swallowing up the whole of the money which Parliament should place at the disposal of the Commissioners for any one year.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PAULL said, he proposed to insert in the clause the words "or that with the sanction of Parliament may become leviable." The harbour authorities were only able to borrow money for the purpose of constructing new works at the time when they were empowered to levy rates. Any harbour authorities that might hereafter be constituted would be prevented, unless the Amendment which he proposed was adopted, from availing themselves of the provisions of the Bill until a certain portion of the proposed new works had been completed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that harbour authorities were allowed to borrow money when they had the right to levy tolls which were taken as security. The Amendment contemplated a prospective right of security, which it might be very unwise to sanction.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the case of the hon. Gentleman was, that it might be very desirable that persons should have the liberty of borrowing money with the view of carrying works to such a state as they would be in a position to levy the tolls. But that was a proposal of a doubtful nature, and it was expected of all public boards that they should never commit the public funds in doubtful cases. He did not think it desirable that the Committee should agree to the Amendment.

MR. PAULL said, he would withdraw his Amendment, reserving to himself however the right to bring forward the question again.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Abolition of Passing Tolls),

MR. THOMPSON said, he proposed to insert words for the purpose of continuing the rates and tolls levied in respect to the harbours of Dover and Whitby until the 1st January, 1867.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he must decline to accede to the Amendment.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 and 6 also agreed to.

House resumed; Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday at Twelve of the clock.

THE CHANNEL FLEET.—QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended that the Channel Fleet should enter Lough Foyle in their cruise of observation along the Northern Coast of Ireland; and whether, consistently with the convenience of the Service, such visit, which would be esteemed most gratifying, and is desired by the citizens of Londonderry, can be accomplished?

VOL. CLXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was afraid he could not give any assurance that the Channel Fleet would visit Lough Foyle. It was very gratifying, however, to the Admiralty to know that the inhabitants of that neighbourhood were very anxious for the presence of the fleet, and the more so because, as he regretted to have to state, the Admiralty had received remonstrances from some other parts of the United Kingdom against a similar visit. He should add that he did not think it was to the credit of those places that they should have objected to the presence of the fleet.

CAPTURE OF THE SHIP NIGHTINGALE.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If it is true that the United States Steamer Saratoga had captured, near the Congo River, the ship Nightingale, of Liverpool; whether the ship had 960 Slaves on board, and was ready to carry 1,600 Slaves; and, provided such are the facts, to ask when the ship last cleared from Liverpool, and for what part; and what was the nature of her cargo, and whether her owners reside in Liverpool, and are amenable to the Law?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had caused inquiries to be made of the Customs' authorities at Liverpool, from which he found that the ship Nightingale had cleared out from Liverpool for St. Thomas's on the 24th of November, 1860. He was informed that she was a United States vessel, bound for St. Thomas's and the West Coast of Africa; but neither the Admiralty nor the Foreign Office had received any official account of her capture.

BREECH-LOADING RIFLES.—QUESTION.

MR. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Why Terry's Breech-loading Rifles, ordered for the use of the 18th Hussars, have not been delivered?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that some alteration had been found necessary in the bands of Terry's Breech-loading Rifles, and that as soon as it had been effected they would be issued for the use of the 18th Hussars.

FATE OF THE SHIP CAMILLA. QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any inquiries were made regarding the reported wreck of Her Majesty's Ship Camilla (Commander Colville) in the Japanese waters in September, 1860, and the result of the inquiries?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Admiralty had received three reports from Admiral Hope, which left no sort of doubt as to the fate of that unfortunate vessel. All the information they had received upon the subject had been sent to the public journals, in order that every person who was interested in the fate of the ship might be supplied with the earliest possible intelligence upon the subject. That which placed the loss of the Camilla beyond all doubt was the fact that a few days after she had sailed for Yeddo an Indian Government steamer was sent in search of her; the whole of the coast was narrowly examined; the Native princes were requested to state whether they could afford any information with respect to her; and yet all these measures he regretted to say were attended with no success. The first report of Admiral Hope placed the matter, in the opinion of the Admiralty, beyond all doubt. There was a subsequent report that the topmast of a vessel had been seen in that sea, and the Admiralty were disposed to think that it must have been a remnant of the Camilla. Another circumstance which tended to confirm the belief of the loss of that vessel was the fact that a Foreign man of war had been lost near the same place during the dreadful typhoon which raged along the coast.

INDIAN PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether interest is paid by the Calcutta Treasury on the Prize Money paid into it; whether any interest is paid on Jewels and other Booty before it is realized; and whether, in future, when booty is taken in India, which it is anticipated will be Prize, Officers in command of Corps are to send in at once the nominal roll, without waiting for the Royal Warrant declaring such Booty to be Prize?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that interest was paid on prize money in the Treasury at Calcutta at the rate of 5 per cent. No interest was paid on jewels or property not in the state of money. He could not say when the payment of interest on the money would cease, or whether interest would be paid on jewels, &c., when realized. No notice had been given of those questions, and it was impossible for him to answer in detail questions of this kind without the opportunity of informing himself. With regard to the preparation of prize rolls, Officers in India had been desired as regarded the present prize to prepare them some time ago, and directions had been given that for the future prize rolls should be made out without waiting for the declaration of prize.

CONSUL AT PESTH.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as the British Government have no Consul or Consular Agent at Pesth, they are not, since the withdrawal of Mr. Dunlop, deprived of any source of official information from that city; and whether, for the improvement of our commercial relations, as well as to obtain trustworthy information from that country, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint such Consul?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say that the information of which the hon. Member spoke would no doubt be useful; but he was not aware that we had any commercial relations with Pesth which rendered it necessary to have a Consul there.

CRYSTAL PALACE EXHIBITION.—REPLY.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, an hon. Gentleman had asked him yesterday a question in regard to the ascent of M. Blondin at the Crystal Palace with his young child, in reply to which he stated that a letter had been addressed by his direction to the managers of the Crystal Palace Company. To that letter he had since received an answer from the secretary to the Company, dated June 18th, stating that, in obedience to the wishes of the Secretary of State, M. Blondin would not repeat the performance to which attention had been called.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN.

ADDRESS MOVED.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU rose to move—

"1. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to take such measures as may be necessary to prevent any foreign interference with the ancient hereditary rights of Succession in the Kingdom of Denmark and the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein.

"2. Address for Copies of Royal Danish Note, addressed to the Foreign Cabinets, to invite them to a Conference at London, for the purpose of regulating the Succession, September, 1851 (alluded to in the Report of the Commission of the Danish Diet).

"Of Protocol of London of the 2nd day of August, 1850 (alluded to in Correspondence on Schleswig Holstein, p. 127, and in the Report to the Danish Diet):

"Of Negotiations relating to the Protocol of London:

"Of 'Report of the Commission of the Danish Diet upon the Succession' (alluded to in the Papers Relative to the Succession, p. 6):

"Of 'Report of Committee, presented to the German Diet on the 17th day of January, 1861' (alluded to in the Correspondence on Schleswig Holstein, p. 133):

"Of 'Protest of Prince Frederick, 1859' (alluded to in the Correspondence on Schleswig Holstein, p. 82):

"And, of 'Despatches of the 6th day of December, 1851' (referred to in the Correspondence on Schleswig Holstein, p. 58)."

It is with great diffidence that I presume to address the House upon the subject of Schleswig Holstein. The fact is, I had no idea at first that the question was of such moment as, on mature reflection, I have found it to be. It is, indeed, a matter not only of most urgent, but of daily-increasing importance. There are, in the first place, many grievances which form a just cause of complaint. Then, again, Baron Schleinitz, in alluding to a despatch of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, dated October 27, said that "the right of resistance was a remedy for all political grievances," thereby holding out a threat as to ulterior measures; and Mr. Ward, writing from Leipzig, also said that the question menaced the peace of Europe. The House is, doubtless, aware that a federal execution is pending in Holstein, and will take place on August 6. This matter is, therefore, of great importance in a material point of view, as threatening the peace of Europe and the commercial interests of this country. But it is also of greater importance in a higher point of view. For I hope to show that all this arises from one illegal act: from the rights of a nation having been tampered with, and its fundamental laws swept away. The papers laid on the table prove that in the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, police regulations prevail as severe as any that existed in Sicily or Naples; all public meetings are forbidden, the press itself is gagged, and even the right to petition is denied. It appears from Mr. Ward's letter that a system of terrorism and oppression is employed against the German population of the Duchies, for the purpose of compelling them to consent to the abridgment of their Constitutional rights. I refer to the "Correspondence on Schleswig Holstein" (p. 29), where Mr. Ward, after saying that those who signed the Address to the King were subjected to persecution from the police, and that 300 from the town of Schleswig alone were imprisoned, continues in these words—

"A system of intimidation and terrorism would appear to be carried on against the German population of the Duchy, for the purpose of forcing them to submit to an abridgment of the constitutional rights which have been guaranteed equally to the German and Danish nationalities within the Duchy by the King Duke."

The very use of the name "Schleswig Holstein" is an offence; and every institution bearing it has been suppressed, including the Bible Society, Art Union, Natural History Society, and Antiquarian Society, and even the Altona Almanack. This is proved from the papers laid upon the table of the House. But M. Raasloff, in his pamphlet, gives many other instances also. Danish officials who do not understand German have replaced the natives of the Duchies in the courts of law and in ecclesiastical establishments. Further, the Danish language has to be used in the courts of law, in the churches, and schools, even in places where nothing but German is understood. Now, one of the benefits of the Reformation was that the services of the Church were thenceforth performed in the vernacular dialect. Yet the King of Denmark does away with this advantage by causing the services to be performed in a language which is not understood. Two German inhabitants had combined to employ a German tutor; they were immediately subjected to all sorts of indignities and oppression, until the tutor was discharged. M. Raasloff, the Royal Commissioner, mentions this fact; he also gives (Question of Languages, p. 32) another instance of the oppression which is carried on—

"One Herr Berkahn, a landed proprietor in Southern Anglia, engaged a governess from the city of Schleswig, a place which, even in the short exposition above mentioned, is acknowledged to belong to a purely German district. It was not until after the greatest difficulty, and upon the express condition of learning Danish immediately, that the governess was at all allowed to enter upon the duties of her situation, and obtained a provisional permission to reside with Herr Berkahn. On the occasion of the next visitation by the clerical authorities, Herr Berkahn was commanded to appear before the dean, bringing the children and governess with him; and then the local official said, 'This is not a question of equality of rights. Unless the governess is dismissed by the 1st of November, you will be heavily fined.'

Even the German books which are supplied to the elementary schools are purposely written in bad German, give incorrect historical and geographical information, and contain immoral sentiments, which must pollute the minds of the children who use them. This seems perfectly incredible; yet it rests on the testimony of the Royal Commissioner himself, who says—

"Nor has the Danisation of the elementary schools, in the purely German districts, been omitted in the chain of 'logical consequences.' . . . A glance at the German Reading Book (edited by the Royal Ministry for the Duchy of Schleswig) . . . will show that, instead of being a guide to the correct knowledge of the language, German children even may be actually made to forget the rules of their mother tongue by the false teaching of an authorized production. . . . The Rev. Dr. Thiess, notwithstanding his Danish sympathies, said that the book was throughout as unchristian and immoral as it was un-German."

Nay, even in the lunatic asylum at Schleswig, which contains ten times as many German patients as Danes, the German board of directors, doctor, and chaplain, have all been removed and replaced by Danes. Thus the patients are cut off from all confidential communication with their attendants, which is more necessary for lunatics than for any others. All this is not a passing injury, but a constant source of irritation. Need I allude to the deception practised by the Prime Minister of Denmark, who has cheated the foreign Governments and deceived his own Diet? Listen to what the Royal Commissioner himself says upon that point, in a pamphlet called My Reply, which has been translated into French from the original language. He says—

"Above all it may be observed what an amount of duplicity has prevailed throughout this whole transaction from beginning to end; so much so that the President of the Council assumes a different pretence when he speaks to me, the Royal Commissioner, from that which he puts on when he addresses foreign Courts. This puts me in a very false and difficult position. But this position becomes no longer tenable when he keeps me in ignorance of the language which he has held to foreign Courts."

In fact, the question seems to travel in a vicious round of great snares and mean decep-

tions; the Duchies are duped by the one, while by the other they are irritated. But why is all this oppression practised? What is the object? The object of all these measures, all these deceptions, and all these persecutions is to incorporate the Duchies, or, as it is called by an euphemism, to promote the "Integrity of the Monarchy." One of the Danish clergy appointed by the Government, Danish by birth, Danish in sympathies, Danish in associations, had said, when speaking in defence of this system, and yet blaming it as too weak to attain its object, "Yet, after ten years of repression, the German element is still predominant." M. Grundtvig, the incarnation of the Eyder-Danish party, explained, in the newspaper Fædrelandet, what were the views of that party—

"Schleswig shall be incorporated with Denmark; Holstein shall be cut off from Germany, and shall thus be rendered neutral."

The whole country is aware that this is the object. In the year 1838 the Diet of Schleswig Holstein adopted an address to the King, complaining that the whole aim and purport of the Administration had been to separate Schleswig from Holstein, and incorporate the former with Denmark. They said that "they would never submit to annexation;" that "the pressure was perfectly intolerable;" and they reminded the King that "tranquillity had always reigned until this attempt to incorporate began." On the 7th of April last, the Diet at Itzehoe adopted an address, in which they complained that "the preceding Diet had never assented to the Law of Succession of 1853—that it had been submitted to the acceptance of the Danish Diet, but that the assent of the Duchies had never been asked." They refer the cause of all the bitterness and discontent on the part of the people of Schleswig Holstein to the Succession which was forced upon them by the Treaty of 1852, and the Law of Succession which was passed in consequence of that treaty. To this Mr. Ward also bears testimony. He writes, September 27, 1860—

"There is in the Duchies a large party who are dissatisfied with the Rule of Succession fixed in 1853, and who would, if they could, still give the ducal crown to a prince of the House of Augustenburg."

And Lord Bloomfield, in reporting the debate in the Prussian House of Representatives, tells us that one speaker said—

"It was for no Power a more sacred duty to speaking a decisive word on the side of right and justice in the matter than for England, whose policy from 1848 to 1852 had so materially conduced to the misery under which Schleswig Holstein at present groaned."

And that another speaker

"Specially called attention to the action of the Great Powers from 1848 to 1852, showing how the status quo, fraught as it was with the seeds of perpetual disquiet, had been brought about by the overpowering influence of Russia."

Therefore, on the one hand, the oppressive measures of the King arise from a desire to incorporate the Duchies, which is the ostensible object of the treaty; while, on the other hand, the bitterness of the Duchies is traced by themselves to the Succession forced upon them by the treaty. What I undertake to prove is that the union of the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein has existed from the most ancient times; but that along with this there has been a continued intrigue to incorporate those Duchies with the kingdom of Denmark; in fact, to promote the "integrity of the monarchy." A reference to the Annual Register shows that five hundred years ago the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein were intimately connected. In the time of our Edward VI., Christian I. was elected King of Denmark; and about eleven years afterwards he became the hereditary reigning Duke of Schleswig and Holstein, on the express stipulation that he would swear to observe the Constitution of Waldemar. To this constitution every reigning Duke, from A.D. 1326 to this day, has had to swear; in that oath he swears to preserve the union, the local self-government, and the separate national existence of the States of Schleswig and Holstein. The first oath is that he would preserve Schleswig and Holstein undivided; and another is that no Danish or foreign officers shall be employed in the Duchies. The successors of this King were reigning Dukes of the Duchies as well as Kings of Denmark, because these hereditary Dukes were elected by the Danes as their Kings; for Denmark was an elective monarchy. The Treaty of Roskilde formally recognized Schleswig as a sovereign and independent State in 1658. In the year 1663 Frederick III. effected a coup d'état, and converted the kingdom of Denmark from an elective to an hereditary sovereignty. He promulgated a Law of Succession, making the Crown hereditary in both males and females, but did not interfere with the law of Succession which obtained in the Duchies, according to which females could not succeed to the Ducal Crown. Thus there came to be a different Lex Regia in Denmark and in the Duchies. The connection between Denmark and the Duchies is, in fact, precisely similar to that which, before the accession of Her Majesty, existed between Hanover and this country. In Hanover the Salic Law prevails just as it did in the Duchies. England went to the Crown of Hanover because we elected the House of Hanover to our throne, just as Denmark went to the Duchies. But here is the difference: when the Queen ascended the throne, we, rather than break the fundamental law of Hanover which excluded females from the crown, surrendered not only the Kingdom of Hanover itself, but also the additions which had, at the peace of 1815, been made to it as a compensation for the exertions which England had made in the wars against Napoleon. In the case of the Duchies, however, the law had been prospectively broken, and was going to be infringed for the sake of preventing the separation of the Duchies from Denmark. What should we have said if, thirty years ago, Plenipotentiaries had sat down and had arranged that our Crown should not go to our beloved Queen, but to the Duke of Mecklenburg, and had never even asked our consent? This would have been a precisely similar case. In the year 1846, Christian VIII., breaking the oath of Waldemar, extended the Law of Succession of Denmark to the Duchies, abolishing the Salic Law which had previously existed there. The Landgravine of Hesse would otherwise now be the heir to the Throne of Denmark, and the Duke of Augustenburg would be the future reigning Duke in Schleswig Holstein. Thus he first openly attempted this nefarious system of annexation, under the guise of the integrity of the monarchy. But how did this come about? For many years before that, secret agencies had been at work in Denmark, inciting the people to seek for the incorporation of the Duchies with the Kingdom. Thus, in the manifesto of the Stadholderate of the Duchies (p. 6) it is stated that—

"The Danish press and the political clubs, ever since 1830, have proposed the Danification of Schleswig. The provincial States of Denmark in 1844 followed the mark, and went a step further; they requested a Royal Declaration to this purpose: 'that the whole monarchy was an indivisible heirloom.' . . . Propositions were made at St. Petersburg in 1838, and embodied in the Letters Patent of 1846, which had the integrity of the collective monarchy in view."

Now, things do not occur of themselves; some power, though unseen—some energy, though it may be hidden, is always at work. It is only thoughtless people who look upon human affairs without seeking for the causes which produce them. In 1843 the son of the Landgravine of Hesse, and heir-presumptive to the Crown of Denmark, married the daughter of the Emperor Nicholas, who from that moment began to negotiate for his succession to the Duchies. The Morning Chronicle, then the organ of the Foreign Office, called attention, in 1844, to this fact—

“ Prince Frederick William (of Hesse) is married to a daughter of the Emperor Nicholas, who has already shown his zeal for the interests of his son-in-law by negotiating for him the succession of the Duchies of Holstein, which, in the ordinary course of events, would fall to the ducal family of Holstein Augustenburg, and not to the Prince of Hesse. . . . The Law of Succession of Holstein is different from that for Denmark, &c. . . . But Russia is believed to have precluded this result (the separation of the Duchies from Denmark), by having induced the Duke of Augustenburg and his family to cede their rights of succession in consideration of a large pecuniary indemnity. Thus Denmark and the Duchies are to be preserved as an entire inheritance for Prince Frederick William and his heirs, by means of Russian gold, and family ties will give Russia a natural and preponderating influence in that monarchy, which holds the keys of the Baltic, the Sound, and the Belt. . . . We know too much of the far-seeing policy of Russia to regard this with indifference.”

It must be borne in mind that the attempt, in this instance, was to make the Crown of the entire monarchy and Duchies descend in the cognatic or female line, under pretence of maintaining the “integrity of the monarchy.” A year after this marriage the Emperor’s daughter died, so the negotiations were given up; the Emperor was no longer desirous to procure the entire monarchy for Prince Frederick William. In 1846 the Duc de Cases was sent on a secret mission to Copenhagen, and the result was the publication of the Letters Patent of Christian VIII., extending the Lex Regia of Denmark to the Duchies, under the name of “preserving the integrity of the monarchy.” Thiers is the authority for this. The facts of the case were these: Louis Philippe was then engaged in negotiating the Spanish marriages, and he was most anxious, as he had lost our countenance, to buy the support of Russia. The Times stated that, “in order to conciliate the favour of Russia he was willing to sacrifice everything, from Cracow to Constantinople.” He, at the instance of the Russian Ambassador, sent his embassy to Denmark, which resulted in the publication of the Letters Patent to which I have before alluded. The Duchies protested against these letters, and the German Confederation issued a decree calling on the King of Denmark to revoke these Letters Patent. In another letter, of September 8, 1846, the King strove to explain away the statements contained in the former letters, and promised that no measures should be taken to destroy the Union of Schleswig and Holstein. Then he inaugurated the attempt to effect by administrative amalgamation that which he had failed to accomplish by arbitrary power. Since then the Danish motto has been “Denmark to the Eyder;” since then these repressive measures on the German element in Schleswig have been resorted to. In 1848, January 28, the present King came to the throne, and swore that “nothing should be done to alter the existing Union of Schleswig and Holstein.” On the 18th of March, the States of the Duchies held a meeting at Rendsburg, and determined to send a deputation to the King to represent their case. The deputation consisted of Count Reventlow and others. It left Kiel on the 21st of March. But on the 20th, the news of this meeting had reached Copenhagen. Of course, they had heard of what had occurred in Paris; the mob became much excited; the Eyder Danish party flew to arms; placards were posted up, declaring that “the wish and the will of the Danish people is that Schleswig must be separated from Holstein, and must be incorporated as a province of Denmark.” They besieged the King in his palace, and insisted on his accepting their programme. The Monarch gave way; the Moltke Ministry resigned, and favourites of the mob were received into confidence, men who were pledged to incorporate the Duchies by sword and bayonet: Messrs. Tcherning and Monrad, known enemies of the Duchies. The news of this émeute reached Kiel on the 23rd; a Provisional Government was instantly appointed, because the King was at the beck and bid of a Copenhagen mob, and the Duchies did not wish to be under the feet of a Danish mob, but desired to uphold their laws. The objects of the Duchies should be kept clearly in view. In the manifesto they say, July 22, 1850—

“ Right and duty of Resistance.—The forcible breach of a fundamental law is a political crime which both nature and reason either enjoin, or at least will permit us, to ward off by every means warranted in self-defence. For us the people of Schleswig-Holstein, not only the right, but the duty of resistance is expressly laid down in our constitutional laws of 1460; where it is stated that 'if ever any one within this country, or out of it, should infringe upon the articles therein contained, then shall we be pledged to oppose him; and each and every man shall be bounden to tender his faithful assistance in protecting the said letter and treaty in all and every clause.' In exercise of this right, in fulfilment of that duty, the Duchies are in arms against this recent attack of Denmark."

And again (p. 11)—

"We deliberately insist on this fact, that we are struggling for our rights, for the rights of the people of Schleswig-Holstein, and for a state of things by law established. We would call upon the Powers of Europe to consider that the circumstances of the time reflect on our struggle the character of a struggle for the interests of public order and for established rights."

Thus the Duchies, though suffering from oppression greater than had prevailed in Naples or Sicily, did not, like those kingdoms, cast off their hereditary Monarch, but expressed their determination to uphold the fundamental laws of the State, and to protect the King against the mob by which he was governed. The noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs had said, that nations which felt themselves aggrieved, or which were dissatisfied with their governments, were justified in getting rid of them and appointing what government they chose. Why had not the Duchies this right conceded to them, when they never rebelled against their King, but desired only to defend their laws? In Naples we refused to interfere in support of law; in the Duchies we did interfere to break the law. In 1849 the armies of Prussia went to the States of Schleswig-Holstein to support the Duchies in their rightful claim, and an autograph letter was written by the King to the Duke of Augustenberg, enjoining him by every means in his power to maintain the rights of his country, and promising that he should receive material support from Prussia. But when the reaction set in after 1848, the Manteuffel Ministry, which is sneered at, despised, and hated by the people of Germany as Russian in its tendency, was appointed. Then the policy of Prussia underwent a change. A treaty of peace was promoted by the Manteuffel Ministry, to which a secret article was appended. That treaty has been laid on the Table of this House, but the secret article included in it has not been produced. This article provided that the King of Prussia should support the propositions of the King of Denmark for altering the succession and for preserving the integrity of the monarchy. Whether the allegations regarding the influences by which the Manteuffel Ministry were affected were true or not, it is impossible for me to say; but across the original draft of the document to which I refer, and which I hold in my hand, there is written "Meyendorff" (the Russian Ambassador) "has had the settling of all these items." This explains the sudden change which took place in the Prussian policy. In 1849 Prussian troops were sent to the Duchies with the avowed object of supporting their just claims; the Russian fleet appeared off the coast; and in 1850 the Prussian troops were withdrawn with the secret intention of abandoning the Duchies to their fate. The Treaty of Peace of 1850 was enclosed in a Despatch from Lord Westmoreland, in which he said:—

"I cannot close this Despatch without stating that Baron Meyendorff, the Russian Minister, has been unremitting in his exertions to bring about the termination of this negotiation, and that fortified by the declarations which have lately emanated from his Government he has greatly contributed to that result."

In 1851 the King of Denmark, still entertaining those projects of annexation with regard to the Duchies, sent Sponnek, his Minister of Finance, to Vienna, to propose that Holstein should be formally separated from the German Confederation and annexed to Denmark. Prince Schwarzenberg, however, sneered at the proposal. In 1852 the King solemnly promised that he would do nothing towards incorporating Schleswig with the kingdom. Of this promise he was reminded in a Despatch by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who seemed, he must say, to have acted a fair part latterly in these transactions. Lord John Russell wrote, December 8, 1860—

"There can be no doubt, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, that these promises constitute an engagement which his Danish Majesty is bound in honour to fulfil. He is bound not to incorporate Schleswig with Denmark."

And Mr. Paget writes (p. 58)—

"The only positive engagement entered into by Denmark towards Austria and Prussia was, that it would not incorporate Schleswig, or do anything which would tend towards that end." [See the Despatches to the Danish Envoys at Berlin and Vienna, December 6th, 1851.]

It has, therefore, been shown that the object of the Duchies was not to sever their connection with the person of their Sovereign, but to defend their laws from being crushed by a mob. The war began by an attempt to incorporate the Duchies: peace was concluded by the treachery of the Allies in forcing the Duchies again under the Danish yoke. This sore is still running; for the intrigues and measures of repression to promote this incorporation are still being continued. Frederick VI. and Christian VIII. desired to centralize the Government; but "let I dare not wait upon I would." This King, carried away on the shoulders of the Eyder Danish party, "bends up each corporal agent" to this feat, and tries to enforce what his predecessors desired. This policy of incorporation came to a head in the Treaty of London of May 8, 1852. It is not a treaty; because, if seven parties put their names to a contract for an object which is not lawful the agreement is not binding, and the proceeding is rather of the nature of a conspiracy than a contract. Imagine a contract to dispose of a settled property away from the next heir to some very distant relation. This is exactly the case with the Treaty of London. The Germans have never acknowledged it as a treaty to this day. They call it the Protocol of London; and the Prince who will come in under that treaty they call the Protocol Prince. Austria and Prussia signed it; but the Diet has never authorized them to do so, and, consequently, their signatures to that treaty are invalid. I have been informed on the best authority—though unfortunately I may not produce that authority to the House—that Prussia is most desirous to break the treaty, and do away with it. I believe that Austria would be willing to do the same. There is, besides, our signature with those of France and Russia to the Treaty of May 8, 1852; but since that time we have both been at war with Russia; and it is well established that a war between two Powers puts an end to every treaty between them, and that no previously existing treaty holds good except it be renewed after the war. Thus it is that the Treaty of Peace between Prussia and Denmark contains a renewal of all previous treaties. I will presently show that the policy of this treaty was not chosen by us, but had been forced upon us; and since then many eminent statesmen have expressed their thorough dislike to it. If this were a question of the succession to a peerage it would demand the strictest investigation; and command the greatest attention. Yet this is much more; it involves the succession to a Crown of Europe. Now, if it were right for us to do this, it follows that it would be equally right for other nations to treat us in a similar manner. And what will the treaty do? The Treaty of 1852 has not yet come into operation. It is still in abeyance, and will not take effect till the death of the present King. Now, in the first place, it acknowledges as permanent this nightmare "integrity of the monarchy," and then supersedes the law of the land by altering the succession. And, according to its provisions, when the present King dies, the succession, instead of going to the next heir, is to jump over nineteen heirs, until it comes to one who is only three before the Emperor of Russia. The treaty will cut out the whole of the female line; and it determines that no son of the future King, Christian, shall be allowed to succeed except a son by the Princess Louise of Hesse. It will thrust aside all other children he may have. But never has any explanation of this extraordinary treaty, nor any information concerning it, been given to Parliament. Yet this is the first time, with one exception, that England ever entered into a treaty of succession. We did so in the case of the Treaty of Utrecht, but in no previous instance. This Treaty of London is one of great moment; it purports, moreover, to do for constitutional states that which they should do for themselves; and it regards a constitutional King as an absolute monarch; and yet it has never been explained to the House; we know absolutely nothing about what led to it. The first information which we had of it was conveyed by an article in The Times of the 11th of May, 1852—three days after the treaty itself was signed. In that article allusion was made to the negotiations which, during a period of many years, had preceded the final arrangement; it speaks of the principles of the treaty having been laid down in the Protocol of London, saying, "When at length Lord Palmerston was induced to lay down these principles in the Protocol of London." It says also that "the announcement of the London Protocol, which Prussia refused to sign," was received in Germany with scorn and resentment." Now, are Ministers responsible to the House of Commons, or is this an oligarchy? If they are responsible why should this mystified article in a daily newspaper be all that is given to enable us to judge of their conduct? If we are to have a share in the Government, we should have the necessary information for governing; if we are to deliberate, we should know the facts of the case which we are called on to judge; if Government be responsible, we should know about the Acts which we are called upon to endorse or to condemn. Now every one imagined that the Treaty of London had been founded on the Protocol of Warsaw, of June 5, 1851. For, on the 20th of March, 1851, Lord Palmerston made use of these observations—

“A good deal had passed with regard to these points—that is to say, in regard to the succession to the Crown of Denmark, and as connected with that, in regard to the arrangements for the order of succession in Schleswig and Holstein. But Her Majesty's Government had studiously and systematically held themselves aloof from taking any share in these negotiations.”

Now, in the Report of the Danish Diet I find an allusion to the Protocol of London, which is said to have been signed on the 2nd of August, 1850, or nine months before the noble Lord said “Her Majesty's Government had studiously and systematically held themselves aloof from taking any share in these negotiations.” But why should the noble Lord have denied that Her Majesty's Government had had anything to do with these negotiations? Why should he keep this London Protocol such a secret? The words of the noble Lord would make one think that he was ashamed of that protocol. Why say that they had “studiously and systematically kept themselves aloof from all negotiations?” In the armistice between Prussia and Denmark, dated July 2, 1850, which has been laid upon the Table of this House. Article 4 says—

“Doubts have been raised as to the succession.”

By whom have these doubts been raised? And at p. 4 I find that thanks are returned to the English Cabinet for the “active part” they took. Again, M. Hall says, at p. 127 of the correspondence, that

“The principle of the integrity of the monarchy was loudly proclaimed in the London Protocol.”

But why, then, make such a strict secret of that protocol? The “Project of the Protocol of London” is dated June 2, 1850; it was signed August 2 in the same year. The first article is as follows:—

“The unanimous desire of the said Powers is that the state of the possessions actually united under the Crown of Denmark shall be maintained in its integrity.”

I should have supposed from the statements of the noble Viscount (Lord Palmerston) that these negotiations must have been carried on behind his back. But it appears from the original notes of that protocol, which I hold in my hand, that the noble Viscount must have taken part in them; because I find in one place, “Variation rejected by Lord Palmerston,” and in another, “Variation not yet discussed with Lord Palmerston.” I cannot, therefore, understand why the noble Viscount stated that “Her Majesty's Government had studiously and systematically kept aloof from these negotiations.” There is a note at the foot in the same handwriting—

“On July 8, Drouyn de Lhuys had an audience of the Queen.”

This shows that there was another conference on that day. In another copy there are no crosses to the names of the Prussian and Austrian Ambassadors in the list of those present. Perhaps, as the Prussian Plenipotentiary refused to sign, the Austrian also absented himself. Here, then, is proof that the negotiations for this protocol were commenced not later than June 2, 1850; the peace at Berlin, with the Secret Article relating to the succession, was signed at Berlin, on July 2. There was another conference in London on July 3, and the protocol was signed on August 2. But for what reason was this kept so secret, and even denied? I have been told that this protocol was presented to the Cabinet by the noble Viscount, but that it met with disapproval from them, and that they refused to agree to it. The Government were then in difficulties. The Pacifico business was going on. The Ministry had been outvoted in the other House of Parliament on a Motion of want of confidence by a majority of 37. This happened on June 17, 1850. M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the French Ambassador, had been recalled; and Count Nesselrode had written what the present Chancellor of the Exchequer called a “public lesson” to the noble Viscount. I trust I may be allowed to refer to what was said in that debate by two such eminent supporters of the noble Viscount as the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Member for Rochdale. Mr. Gladstone (June 27, 1850). on the Pacifico debate, read what he called a "public lesson," which was written by Count Nesselrode to Lord Palmerston, and used these words—

"It is not only with France that we have had to deal: what is the lesson which Count Nesselrode has read to us? . . . This lesson, so read to you without reply, is a lesson from the mouth of the Autocrat of all the Russians." [3 Hansard cxii., 580-81.]

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed a prescience of the true state of the case, yet the acute insight of the hon. Member for Rochdale was greater.

"Read, I ask you, the extraordinary language used by Count Nesselrode to Lord Palmerston, and then read the answer of the latter, and see how different is the tone adopted by him (Lord Palmerston) to a country which is powerful, compared with that he makes use of to one that is weak. . . . A hectoring epistle from Count Nesselrode, to which the noble Viscount sent a very meek and lamb-like reply. . . . First you submit to rebuke from Russia, and next you are humiliated before France." [Ibid, 664-67.]

And then he uses these pregnant words—

"I believe the noble Lord is of an active turn of mind—that he likes these protocols and conventions." [Ibid, 673.]

This arrow, sent at a venture, must have wounded the noble Viscount's conscience sorely. He continues—

"He made a speech against Austria, I remember, on one occasion, but he did not breathe a syllable against Russia. The only allusion he made to Russia was in the nature of an apology, uttered in a sense that seemed to justify the part taken by Russia." [Ibid, 673.]

Well, then, as I have said, the Cabinet appears to have disapproved of this protocol; but then there was the Pacifico difficulty; a vote of want of confidence in the Lords; the French Ambassador recalled; a "hectoring epistle" from St. Petersburg; the Russian Ambassador demanding his passports. But what, then, induced the British Cabinet to sign the treaty? The Weser Zeitung, of April, 1853, answered the question as follows:—

"Count Reventlow, the active Minister of Denmark in London, had long been preparing the first London Protocol, in which the integrity of the Danish Monarchy was pointed out as a thing to be wished. Russia was seconding, England was temporizing, and Prussia at that time kept so far aloof that the Chevalier Bunsen, on August 1, 1850, even handed a note of protest to Lord Palmerston. Russia availed herself of the confusion brought about in the Piræus by Lord Palmerston, and of the favour shown by him to M. Pacifico, to instruct to M. Brunnow to demand his passport.

Lord Robert Montagu

Lord Palmerston, apparently surprised, asked whether there were not any means of adjusting the difference? 'To be sure,' was the reply; 'the signature of the London Protocol.'"

The protocol was actually signed three weeks afterwards. But perhaps the best authority on the subject is M. von Gagern, the President of the German Parliament, who, in his Protest, published at Mannheim in 1852, said—

"Denmark, Russia, and France had from 1846 [when Christian VIII. published his Letters Patent] been active in urging the institution of the Collective Monarchy. In the spring of 1850 a favourable conjuncture had arisen, which Russia was the first to perceive; first, in the unfortunate division of the German Powers; secondly, in the disgust of the British Ministry at the long delay of the negotiations for peace at Berlin; and last, not least, in the personal embarrassment of Lord Palmerston, whose Ministerial position had been endangered. . . . Some diplomatic success to assuage the Tories, and an apparent reconciliation with Russia, were under such circumstances what Lord Palmerston could not do without, if he wanted to remain at the helm. The accession of England to that protocol was the first desideratum, and Lord Palmerston, under the circumstances, had declared himself ready to sign."

These authorities seem to assert that the noble Viscount, for the sake of retaining office for one year had consented to sign a protocol of which his Cabinet disapproved, had interfered in the affairs of a foreign nation, had committed an act of injustice, had altered the succession, had swept away the fundamental laws of the State, and had entailed eleven years of misery upon the Duchies. Thus, it appears, he submitted for the sake of office, to make us become the tools of another Power. Calm deliberation obliged his Cabinet to refuse; personal inconvenience induced them to yield. Out of this protocol grew the Protocol of Warsaw and the Treaty of 1852 as necessary consequences. 1852 is a memorable year; then the treaty was signed; and a letter from our Sovereign was read at the Table of this House, informing the House that the noble Viscount was "wanting in sincerity to the Crown," and was in the habit of deceiving Her. Thus, the protocol and the treaty were conceived in subjection, and were executed in duplicity. They were signed, not from approval, but for the exigencies of a Minister. I now turn to the Protocol of Warsaw, June 5, 1851. It is founded on "the importance of maintaining the Danish Monarchy in its integrity." It then says—

"The rights of inheritance devolve upon Prince Christian in virtue of the renunciations of the Landgravine of Hesse, of her son Prince Frederick, and of her daughter Princess Mary."

Then afterwards it says the King,

"Wishing, on his part, to complete the titles resulting from these renunciations."

Now these renunciations had not then been made. The Report of the Danish Diet says (p. 14)—

"The renunciations in favour of the Princess Louise by the nearest heirs are already cited in the Protocol of Warsaw, although at the time when that protocol was signed the renunciations had not been made, as is shown by the Acts of Renunciation laid before the Diet."

M. Bluhme's despatch of May 9, 1853 Papers relative to the Succession, p. 7), confirms this statement. He says—

"The message affords the king very great liberty, &c. . . . in so much that his Majesty need not seek at once the successive renunciations by those possessing rights annulled by the treaty, or rendered impossible by other means."

Yet the Protocol of Warsaw is grounded on the supposition that the renunciations have already been voluntarily made. The protocol continues—

"Nevertheless, it is understood that the eventual rights of the two younger branches of Holstein Gottorp should be expressly reserved, that those which the august chief of the elder branch should abandon for himself and for his male lineage in favour of Prince Christian of Glucksbourg and of his male lineage should be revived in the Imperial House of Russia whenever (which God forbid) the male lineage of that Prince should become extinct."

These reservations were repeated when the treaty was signed. Baron Brunnow's note, handed in at the signature of the treaty, May 8, 1852, says that he

"Having been authorized to sign the treaty, . . . has been ordered to transmit, at the same time, the present note, for the purpose of recalling and renewing the reserves contained in the Protocol of Warsaw."

He then recites these reservations from the protocol. Therefore, after the death of Christian and his sons, these claims will be revived into rights; they are now acknowledged as such by this treaty. Russia, therefore, virtually gives up nothing for something; for under no circumstances could she have preferred any claims till all these, and many more intervening heirs besides, had been dead. Hence, by pretending to renounce, she cuts out nineteen heirs, and comes in all the sooner to the Crown. M. Bluhme sends a despatch from Copenhagen, May 9, 1853, Papers relative to the Succession, p. 8, saying—

"The Diet fear a preponderating influence on the part of Russia in the application of Article 2 of the Treaty of London, it being in the power of His Majesty the Emperor, by means of the reservations made by the Protocol of Warsaw, and renewed at the conclusion of the Treaty of May 8th of last year to support a claimant which all the monarchy would be forced to accept, because the Cognate Succession, established by the Royal Law, being abolished once for all through all parts of the monarchy open to this succession, would have no claimant to oppose to him."

Nearly a century ago Russia got Oldenburg in lieu of some doubtful claims on a small part of Holstein. The arrangement was this: on the failure of the heirs of Frederick III. Oldenburg was to revert to Denmark, and Holstein Gottorp to Russia. Now, on the contrary, Russia will come in for the whole—Holstein, Schleswig, Denmark, Iceland, and all—on the death of three persons; but she does not resign Oldenburg until all the intervening heirs also shall have died. Besides, those "claims" were very doubtful; now they are acknowledged as "rights." Moreover, Bunsen, in p. 19 of his Memoir to Lord Palmerston, denies the validity of the renunciations. Besides, if they were valid, why should they not have been incorporated in the treaty, as the renunciations of the House of Bourbon were incorporated in the Treaty of Utrecht? The upshot of the whole matter is that Russia gives up nothing in exchange for getting her succession made more rapid and more certain; and for getting doubtful claims acknowledged as rights; and by procuring an acknowledgment of the "integrity of the monarchy" as permanent, she, of course, obtains the whole instead of a small part. Thus M. Usedom, the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Berlin, in his official Memoir to the King of Prussia, February 4, 1851, says—

"In attempting to break the legitimate succession in the Duchies, violently and without a free renunciation on the part of those concerned, the dangerous principle of arbitrary power is installed in the place of positively existing hereditary rights. . . . I pray to God that your Majesty may, at any risk, keep yourself free from establishing the principle of 'integrity' which is not in existence, but which is only intended to be artificially created. The right of Denmark with regard to such 'integrity' has hitherto no other foundation than her own desire."

Chevalier Bunsen, in his Memoir to Lord Palmerston, p. 31, says—

"It was only too much to be feared that the plan now proposed was nothing but the execution of the project which the late French Government had recommended in 1846" (which was done at the instance of Russia.)

Now, that this is no chimerical fear or childish fancy, is proved by the fact that it was shared by no less a man than the historian M. Thiers, who said—

"It is quite enough, in delivering Finland to the Russians, to have afforded them the means of a step in advance to the Sound, a point from which they will not be less menacing to us, at a future day, when the Russian Colossus with one foot on the Dardanelles and another on the Sound, will make the whole world his slave, and liberty will have fled to America. However chimerical all this may seem now to narrow minds, it will one day be a cruel reality."

I trust the House will bear in mind that our agreement to all this arose not from deliberate approval, but from the political exigency of a Minister, who, to retain office, signed the bond which bound him to carry out this policy. The treaty was submitted to the Danish Diet (but not to the States of the Duchies), and was forced upon them by the Minister saying that "any alteration would appear as if the King had broken his engagement with the foreign Powers." The proposed abolition of the Law of Succession of Denmark was also laid before them, and the Minister represented such a step as a "European necessity" to them; but to the foreign Powers he asserted, before the signature of the treaty, that the Diet had already taken that step. The Diet was three times dissolved before this alteration of the Lex Regia could be forced upon them. This recalls the frequent dissolution of Parliament in Charles's reign, which has been always held up as a justification for the violent retaliation which followed. But the extraordinary thing is that this abolition of the Lex Regia of Denmark also was brought about by foreign interference. In the Papers relative to the Succession, p. 9, there is a despatch from Lord Clarendon, dated June 7, 1853,

"Sir,—M. de Bille has communicated to me the despatch addressed by the Danish Government to the Danish Ministers at the Courts parties to the treaty of the 8th of May, a copy of which was enclosed in your despatch of the 11th ult., and which contains an explanation of the reasons which induced the Danish Government not to confine themselves to a simple communication of that treaty to the Danish Chambers, but to accompany it by a proposition for the abolition of the Lex Regia."

"Although the course which the Danish Government has deemed it expedient to pursue in this respect would not appear to call for the expression of an opinion on the part of a foreign Government, I have yet to instruct you, as the expression of such opinion appears from your despatch to be desired, to assure the Danish Minister that Her Majesty's Government do full justice to the motives by which the Danish Government have been actuated, and that they see no reasons for changing the opinion already on various occasions expressed by Viscount Palmerston, that the abolition of the law in question (namely, the Lex Regia of Denmark) would afford a simple, safe, and apparently unobjectionable method of hereafter preventing renewed complications, such as those to which the Treaty of the 8th May so happily put an end."

Now, in the first place, it is odd that this measure should be defended on the score that it would "prevent hereafter" that which had already been "put an end to." But it is a still more extraordinary discovery that the abolition of the Lex Regia should also be due to the noble Viscount.

WINDOW-CLEANING &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, which he advocated in the interests of the lower classes, to protect them against the danger of being ordered to clean windows from the outside. That practice, it was well known, had led to a great many fatal accidents, and he was sure that the House would be glad to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of such calamities. He had received that morning information of four accidents of the kind, three of which terminated fatally, and probably the fourth also, although it was only stated that a man, who had fallen from a window of Buckingham Palace, was taken to the hospital for a fractured skull, and it was not stated whether he had died or not. On the occasion when he brought this measure before the House in the last Session of Parliament a Gentleman of the law took upon himself to turn the matter into ridicule, and found plenty of other Gentlemen to join in the laugh with him. He was advised by his friends not to press the second reading then, but he hoped that now the House would allow the Bill to be considered in Committee. A similar Bill was passed about fourteen years ago for Scotland, and Scotch Members told him that the operation of the Act in preventing these accidents had been completely successful. Last year, after his Bill was thrown aside, there were no fewer than four deaths within two days from accidents of the sort which he was anxious to provide against. That was a striking proof of the urgent necessity for such a measure. He employed a system of window-cleaning in his own houses, both in town and country, which was attended with no danger whatever, and he would be glad to see it generally adopted. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he held that to pass such a measure as that before them would be to carry the principle of interference between employer and employed to a most inconvenient and unprecedented length. Some of the provisions of the Bill were really absurd, and would render an employer liable to punishment if his servant cleaned a window from a balcony. Every one must do justice to the motives of the hon. Baronet, but, however well meant the Bill might be, he was satisfied that it would prove a source of great annoyance and vexation. He, therefore, moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. CAVE said, that whatever opinion the House might entertain of the merits of the Bill, there could be but one sentiment with regard to the motives of his hon. Colleague in bringing it before the House. The House could not but respect one who had been a Member of Parliament before most of them were born; whose political career carried him so far back that he was one of those who seized the assassin of Spencer Percival in the lobby of the former House of Commons, and who now, towards the close of a long and honourable life, at an age when most men, if they had the power of thinking at all, thought only of themselves, was exerting himself in the cause of humanity to stop what was at any rate a clumsy and dangerous practice, and not only by this Bill, but by setting the example of an improved construction in his own house, which had already been followed in some public offices, and if architects and builders had a little more public spirit would soon be generally adopted. He (Mr. Cave) had thought it right to say thus much, as his name was on the back of the Bill, though all the credit of it was due to the hon. Baronet, who was its sole author, and who knew, indeed, that he (Mr. Cave) did not entirely approve of the details. These, however, might be amended in Committee. It was not so long ago that 150 hon. Members opposite, among whom was the hon. and learned Baronet who moved the Amendment, were ready to go into the lobby in favour of the second reading of a Bill of every clause of which they disapproved. Should this be refused, he recommended his hon. Colleague to wash his hands of the matter, and to rest content with the efforts he had made. He was now relieved of all responsibility on this score, and might be well satisfied to leave that to those who opposed him. For his own part he would rather be the author of such a measure than one of those who treated it with ridicule.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the motives of the hon. Baronet who promoted the Bill deserved respect, and he was not aware of any disposition on the part of the House to treat the subject with ridicule. He himself never said anything that could be construed into a suggestion that the measure was a laughable one. It was a perfectly serious proposal, and deserved to be so treated. The general law of the country was that any person who knowingly and wilfully placed another in a situation of danger whereby his death might be caused was liable to an indictment for the man's death. That principle would apply to cases of window-cleaning where any degree of rashness which the law deemed culpable was exhibited; but the hon. Baronet wished to make that sort of trifling with the lives of others subject to a special penalty. The general rule on which they went was that an adult person in any employment was master of his own life and safety, and that the law was not required to interfere for his protection. It was obvious that there were many dangers to which persons in the employment of others voluntarily exposed themselves which were greater than those in the case of window-cleaning. The Government had not neglected the Motion of the hon. Baronet for a return of the number of accidents through window-cleaning, but had received an answer from Mr. Wakley that it would take a very long time to search through the reports of all the coroner's inquests in Middlesex in order to make the return. He thought, however, that they might assume as a matter of notoriety that such accidents were not of frequent occurrence. Employment in mines, or even on board a ship going to sea in stormy weather, was attended with dangers at least equal to those to be apprehended in the case of window-cleaning. In many of the building trades, in driving a railway train, and in many other avocations, there was great risk of accident, but in none of those cases was there any legislative interference for the protection of life. Then there was a case which had excited a good deal of public attention lately—that of rope-dancers, who in places of entertainment exhibited themselves in dangerous positions for the gratification of the public. No attempt had been made to prevent adult persons, who were masters of their own understandings, from exposing themselves in that manner. From time to time dangerous ascents were also made in balloons, but the law did not enable the executive Government or the magistrates to prevent them. If they were to enter on a course of legislation of the kind proposed by the hon. Baronet, it was clear that there were other employments which were as dangerous as window-cleaning, and with which it would be equally necessary to deal. Not being prepared to depart from the recognized tenets of our legislation in that respect, he could not give his vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he had not heard any objection to the Bill which could not be obviated in Committee. He thought that the Bill came in aid of a class of persons who were especially unable to exercise a free-will. For what poor female servant could refuse to clean a window in the manner objected to if so ordered by her master? Servants really required some protection in the way suggested by the hon. Baronet, and he hoped the House would read the Bill a second time.

COLONEL NORTH said, that, reference having been made by the right hon. Baronet to rope-dancing, he wished to know whether any steps had been taken to prevent the repetition of M. Blondin's performance on the rope with his child?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had already informed the House that he had addressed a letter to the Directors of the Crystal Palace Company, objecting to a child of tender years being allowed to take part in such a dangerous exhibition, a child not being capable of giving any reasonable consent, and, therefore, not falling under the general rule as to adults which he had stated. The Crystal Palace Company, to their credit, at once complied with his letter, and stated that the performance would not be repeated.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he understood that the Bill was intended to protect female servants who might be required against their will to do certain work under pain of forfeiting their situations. That was a totally different case from that where a person voluntarily exposed himself to danger.

Mr. MALINS said, he would not stop to consider whether the Bill was very much called for. It sufficed for him that its objects were benevolent.

Mr. POTTS directed attention to an accident, said to have occurred that morning, through a steam engine passing along the streets drawing a number of carts.

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.—

[SIR JOHN TRELAWNY.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that he had so repeatedly stated the case of those concerned in the movement for the abolition of church rates that he would best consult the wishes and convenience of the House if he were as brief as possible under the circumstances in which he was placed. It was necessary, however, that he should refer to one or two arguments which might be used by the opponents of the Bill, as, owing to the hour at which the House rose, he had practically no opportunity to reply. It was constantly thrown out against hon. Gentlemen on that (the Liberal) side of the House that they were prepared to endorse the views of the Liberation Society, who were assumed to hold ulterior views with regard to the Church. There were surely sufficient reasons why church rates should be abolished without mixing up the question with the proceedings of the Liberation Society. The fact that a certain society was prepared to go much further than the abolition of the church rates had no connection with the question now before them, and was no argument against a measure which was just and expedient in itself. Hon. Members opposite were to a great degree in agreement with him as to the necessity of legislation. He believed there was no hon. Gentleman on the other side who was not quite as anxious to determine in what way Dissenters might be relieved as hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House. Therefore they were come to this, that the House of Commons might be regarded at that moment as nothing more or less than a Committee of Inquiry as to the best way of dealing with church rates. His position was rendered peculiar and somewhat difficult by the absence of opposition, for substantially there was none. He did not know of any hon. Member who was not committed to the opinion that Dissenters were entitled to relief. In that way they got rid of a variety of arguments, such as the antiquity of church rates and the fact of land being bought subject to church rates. The latter was a point which ought not to be introduced at all, because hon. Gentlemen opposite were prepared to exempt, not only Dissenters, but Churchmen also in the case of district churches. But the point to which he wished chiefly to call attention was as to the proposed compromise. Gentlemen opposite would bear in mind that nobody had taken more trouble to bring together the parties opposed than he had done. He had gone to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway and above the gangway on both sides, and to Dissenters day by day, with the view of bringing parties together and he must say not entirely without success, because their position was now very different from what it was before. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) had consented to make sacrifices which were, no doubt, important from his point of view, and he had urged upon those who supported the abolition of the rates, that they ought also to show a conciliatory spirit, and consider whether they could not make some concessions to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen on the other side. It was clear that they (the anti-church rate party) must have the substance of that for which they contended, otherwise there would be no settlement at all. The opponents of the Bill made a great mistake when they thought that the question was simply one of money. It was not, and could not possibly be so. It was absurd to suppose that a vote of 1*d.* or 2*d.* in the pound in certain parishes was all that was at issue. The question, as regarded Dissenters, had been described as a sentimental one, and the term was not inappropriate, but it certainly was not a money matter. If they were going to attempt to settle the question on the ground of the exemption of Dissenters they would not succeed, because in trying to apply the severe provisions which it was proposed to introduce into the law, they would find that there would be disturbances in the streets, and a rescue of the goods which might have been seized. Consequently he did not believe the system of what was called ticketing would be successful. Therefore they would not be doing what was best for the Church itself by compelling Dissenters to register themselves in that way. He would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that there were many on their own side who had come over to his opinion. He would not trouble the House by quoting at any great length from the recent remarkable pamphlet of Mr. Bennett. He thought it would be seen that the nationality of the Church was not at all compromised by the course which they were taking. He did not think that hon. Gentlemen opposite cared so much about substance as about the theory; they had a sentimental feeling on the subject, and objected to the abolition of church rates because they thought that by doing so the national character of the Established Church would be destroyed. He denied that such would be the effect of abolishing church rates, and if they wished to take the issue on that point he was ready to do so. He contended that if they abolished church rates, the nationality of the Church would remain untouched. It was said that the working classes would be injured by his Bill. He did not think that those who used that argument knew what the real feelings of the working classes were. He would recommend hon. Members to read a petition which had been presented to that House from the parish of Moulton, in the county of Suffolk, signed by three working men, whose names were William Wybrow, Thomas Dover, and Richard Wybrow, and especially the following passages:—

“That your petitioners have no faith in such suspicions and ephemeral generosity; and, moreover, do not see any reason why they should be robbed of what they now hold as a right, and be left dependent on a precarious charity: that your petitioners, being uneducated, and little conversant with affairs of State, and so seldom meddling therewith, and having, moreover, no voice in the election of representatives of the people in your honourable House, are liable to have their rights overlooked and frittered away through want of a due consideration of them.”

Those men gave expression to the wishes of their fellow-labourers generally, and if the suffrage were extended, the real feeling of the working classes respecting church rates would be made known. It was not necessary for him to go into details to show the inconvenience arising from the present system of church rates. Every second or third day some illustration of that inconvenience was to be found in the columns of The Times. The pamphlet of the Rev. Mr. Bennett explained very clearly the evils arising from the law with respect to church rates, and he would call attention to the following remarks in it:—

“We recur, then, to our remedy all the more cheerfully and without any fear of Erastian hostility, when we find one of the principal members of her Majesty's Government thus assuring us. We have only to look round—to watch, and take note. The evils of the present system are so enormous, while the blessings of relief are so refreshing and so hopeful, that we will throw ourselves at once among the boldest to say—‘Deliver us from the bondage of this law!’ Who that practically knows the evils will not join in this prayer? Look into some country market town, or some manufacturing district, swarming with an ungodly population. That whole community, since the time of Oliver Cromwell, has been divided into three or four, it may be five or six, assortments of sectarianism. Politics are made to take their colour from religion, and religion from politics, and each in its turn plays its part against the other. Put yourselves down among these people when there comes an election, either of a parish officer, a churchwarden, or a member of Parliament. See how all the ill-blood of jealousy, and the sarcasms of personality, and the bitterness of tale-bearing inflames the whole population in an instant; and the anger and resentment of one year has hardly subsided before it is evoked again by another. Then throw into this cauldron of schism, already boiling over, the additional ingredient of church rates, and what will your parish become? We have read of or may have imagined what a Pandemonium may be. Here we have a chance of realizing it. The parish priest is said to be the ‘Minister of Peace.’ His mission is love. His doctrine is to be delivered for the salvation of souls, ‘without money and without price.’ He is, ‘to know his sheep and be known of them,’ and they are to ‘follow him because they know his voice.’ Realize this in a parish vestry in which two-thirds of the people never enter the church at all, except for the one purpose of clamouring against a church rate. Now is the time for the bitter Nonconformist, the acute Dissenting minister, or the sharp practising latitudinarian attorney to rise up and hold forth before his assembled townsmen. Now, under the guise of speaking against the rate, is dealt forth the bitter virus of hostility either against all establishments in general, or the special circumstances of the parish in particular. The wearing of surplices, or the Act of Uniformity; the tolling of bells, or the Apostolical Succession; the beadle's coat, or the blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the sacred elements of which by the rubric of the Book of Common Prayer the parish must provide, and the vestry pay for in the annual rate—such subjects as these, mixing the ludicrous with the sacred, and not unfrequently tinged with unsparing personalities between the different parties, find their place in the annual display of Dissenting oratory. The unfortunate parish priest, in his official capacity as chairman, sitting in the chair of state, to moderate between the combatants, the legal pastor of this happy community ‘by law established,’ must put the fatal vote to the meeting. ‘Shall the decaying church be repaired or shall it not?’ Shall the services of religion be maintained any longer, or shall they cease, or if not cease, shall they continue curtailed and shorn of their beauty, for the sake of the penny rate moved by the churchwarden and amended by the Dissenting minister? The vote is put; the acclamations are great; the rejoicing general, when the luckless chairman hides his face in shame amid the taunts and jeers of those, whom he is still nevertheless bound to call his ‘legal parishioners.’”

He (Sir John Trelawny) submitted that nothing could more clearly show the evils arising from the present system. There was another pamphlet suggesting a remedy, by a former Member of Parliament, in which it was proposed to take away the sanction altogether, and to leave the existing machinery; but, undoubtedly, that was not the best way to overcome the evil against which they had to contend. He wished to say before he sat down, that should hon. Gentlemen opposite see their way hereafter to any approximation to his views he should be prepared to hear them, but he now placed the matter in the hands of the House. He would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that at very heavy responsibility lay upon them. If they did not settle the question then in all probability it would be handed over to the secular arm. Much evil might befall the Established Church if hereafter the question should fall into the hands of persons who would not take the moderate view of it which he did.

MR. COLLIER said, he was extremely glad that the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock had acceded to the request that had been made to him to postpone the third reading of the Bill to that day. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) had every right to prefer that request; because his good sense, his acquaintance with the subject, his moderation, and his conciliatory spirit, qualified him to undertake the settlement of the question, if it could be settled. They had before them the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and he (Mr. Collier) very much regretted to say it did not contain the elements for a settlement of the question. If that were so, and if the right hon. Gentleman had only contributed another failure to those already experienced, he only furnished an additional argument for reading the Bill then under consideration a third time. He (Mr. Collier) should confine himself to pointing out one or two objections to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman which were fatal to it. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to change altogether the nature and incidence of the tax. At the present it was a personal charge upon the occupier, but the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make it a charge upon property, and to fix it upon the owner, irrespective of his residence or non-residence in the parish. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was not satisfied with changing the nature and incidence of the tax; he altogether deprived the taxpayers of the right they had exercised from time immemorial of determining, if the tax should be levied, what amount should be levied, and for what purpose it should be expended. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to deprive the vestries of the parishes to which the third clause referred, of the powers they had hitherto exercised, and to transfer these powers to the churchwardens. It seemed to him that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, instead of uniting all parties, would tend to excite further opposition to the rate. It was almost impossible to expect that the hon. Member for Tavistock, and those who thought with him, and who were opposed to church rates being levied with the consent of the vestry, should assent to the tax being permanent. It was almost impossible to suppose that those who had the right in the parishes to which the provision referred—if they could obtain a majority to defeat the rate altogether, would consent that the rate should be permanently charged upon them and their heirs for ever. But it also seemed to him that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman must have to encounter the opposition of the leader of his own party, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had some time ago made the discovery that church rates were extremely valuable, as affording to parishioners the opportunity of exercising the functions of local self-government in their parishes. The right hon. Gentleman also objected to the Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock on the ground that it would revolutionize the parochial system of England. But the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) revolutionized the parochial system of England, and destroyed those powers in vestry of self-taxation, and of control over that taxation, which had been exercised from time immemorial. Henceforth the churchwardens were to exercise the sole judgment as to how far the church required repair, and to what extent a church rate should be imposed for that purpose. It seemed to him that the main provision of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was calculated to excite even the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. It proposed so great an innovation upon the Constitution of the country, that although he (Mr. Collier) sat upon the benches below the gangway, he was too much of a Conservative to approve of. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman thought, by his proposition for what might be called "stereotyping" church rates, he would put an end to litigation. He (Mr. Collier) could not help thinking that upon that subject also the right hon. Gentleman had been the victim of some pleasing delusion. There was a provision in the proposed Act to the effect that an owner's rate should be levied on all property in respect of which the occupier had been assessed to a church rate within five years. In all these cases the question would arise, whether there had or had not been a legal assessment to the church rate within five years, and, probably, in almost every case, that question would be disputed. So far, therefore, from putting an end to litigation, the right hon. Gentleman would open an extended field of litigation in the greater portion of the parishes to which the Act would apply, which might last for a great number of years. The right hon. Gentleman did not stop there. Not content with one church rate, to simplify the question, he proposed two, and he also proposed two vestries—one the ordinary vestry, and the other for the purpose of collecting the church rate, and to be formed of owners rated as aforesaid, and all occupiers who during the preceding twelve months had paid church rates, or contributed any subscription in lieu thereof. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman did not require a declaration of religious belief from persons who wished to exempt themselves from church rates. The notice only required the person to “decline to be a member of the church vestry;” but the difference was only one of form. The notice would be construed as one declaring that the person dissented from the Established Church, and would, therefore, be open to the objection put forward against “ticketing Dissenters.” He (Mr. Collier) was one of those who thought it extremely impolitic to attempt to define the precise boundary between conformity and nonconformity, and if there were a hard line of demarcation, which he trusted there was not, their policy ought to be to obliterate that line if they desired to see the Church of England a Church not of one sect or party, but of the whole nation. He had alluded to what seemed to him the salient features of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought he had shown the House sufficient to satisfy them that such a measure could never be taken as the basis of a satisfactory settlement of this question. So far from being a plan for relief from church rates, it was one for rendering them permanent; and so far from being a plan simplifying matters, it was one that would make “confusion worse confounded.” It would effect a great constitutional innovation by depriving vestries of functions which they now exercised, and transferring them to churchwardens. The failure of the right hon. Gentleman was to be attributed to the inherent difficulty of the subject, and he believed the House would not be premature in coming to the conclusion that the only way of settling the question was by passing the Bill of the right hon. Baronet, the Motion for the third reading of which he now begged to second.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it would have been very much more agreeable to him to assist in bringing about a settlement of the question than to appear as an opponent of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock. Before entering on the question before the House he wished to take that public opportunity of bearing testimony to the perfectly straightforward and conscientious manner in which that hon. Baronet had dealt with him in the negotiation which he (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt) had attempted to carry on with regard to that subject, but in which, he must confess, he had entirely failed. He knew very well that if an hon. Gentleman who had taken a prominent part for or against a Bill, was induced to listen to any offer or proposition from an opponent, he was exposed amongst his own particular friends to a charge of falling short of what might be expected from him. But he could assure those who supported the hon. Member for Tavistock that in the course of those negotiations he had in no way compromised the principles which he had previously advocated. He regretted that no settlement had been arrived at; but although the armistice between him and the hon. Baronet was at an end he did not understand why a parley should not take place, he did not see why all overtures for a reconciliation should be stopped. He had no doubt that the House would still be ready to hear any reasonable proposition for a settlement. He was not going to defend his own plan on the present occasion, because it was not before the House; but he must observe that he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken clearly apprehended the meaning of the Third Clause. He never intended that any money, whether contributed by occupiers or owners, should not be under the strict surveillance of the vestry. As to the Bill now before the House he did not propose to go over old ground, or to offer any argument that was founded upon his own particular views of the measure. He should offer arguments only on two heads, and upon both of them he expected to receive the entire concurrence of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The arguments, it appeared to him, might be divided into two heads—the one was an inherent defect in the Bill itself; and the second, that it stood in the way of any practical dealing with the question. The principal objection to it was that it was not merely an infringement of, but an actual prohibition to the parishioners of every parish in this country against exercising a system of independent local self-government which had been in operation from very early times. If the Bill was carried it would put an end to the common law right of the different communities of the country to determine by conference among themselves what was desirable for the maintenance of the property which belonged to the parish, and to decide upon raising the money which was required for that purpose. The church rate differed in no degree in the mode of raising it from any other rate. The highway rate, the rate for mending roads and bridges, and the poor rate derived their origin from the same source, and originally stood upon the same footing as the church rate. It was, according to our Saxon Constitution, an element inherent in every community, in every parish, to meet and determine for themselves how they would support properly the fabric of the Church, and how raise amongst themselves the money. It was true that by statutes these rates had been placed upon a different foundation, and that the jurisdiction over them had remained in the common law courts, for which reason there had been no difficulty about them. The difficulty with regard to church rates had arisen from the fact that the jurisdiction over them had from time immemorial been in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and that its application was, therefore, very difficult. If they took advantage of that circumstance to get rid of the power of the parish to assess itself for a church rate, would they not deal a blow at the whole principle of self-government? If they passed the Bill they would deprive the people of the country of a right which they had possessed for at least 500 years, without providing any substitute for it. The Bill alleged no grievance, and it announced no principle. He believed that there were good reasons why it should not do so. If a grievance had been alleged, the House might have applied the remedy which would have met it. If a principle had been announced, the opponents of the measure would have known how they were hereafter to manage their concerns. No one, however, denied that the complaint, whatever it was, was made by a portion of the community not exceeding one-half, and, therefore, for the sake of pleasing one moiety or less of the community they were about to do an act which, it could not be denied, would be objectionable to the other half. Was that a mode of legislation which was either conformable to precedence or in accordance with the practice of Parliament? Then as to principle. If the preamble of the Bill had said, "Whereas it would be an improvement that the repair of churches should be provided for entirely by voluntary contributions," the House would have known what would be the consequences of the Bill. He asked in what manner the friends of the Bill proposed that the repairs of the Church should be provided for. They on that side of the House objected to give up the right, which the people of England had enjoyed for at least 500 years, of meeting in parishes and providing for their expenditure by an equitable assessment. They were as eager as the hon. Baronet himself to remove the evil of the existing law. He himself two years ago expressed before a Committee of the other House of Parliament the opinion, which he still retained, that personal exemptions on account of difference of religious persuasion ought to be allowed, and that was, in fact, the only principle upon which they were in future likely to deal with the matter. Any measure that could carry out that principle would be acceptable to him; and he wished any such measure to be put upon the footing which would be most agreeable to those for whom exemption was to be enacted. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Collier) that nothing could be so bad as to draw a hard line between Nonconformists and Churchmen; and he also thought that nothing could be worse than to deprive any portion of the ratepayers of their interest in the parochial property. If those principles were agreed upon why did they differ? The hon. Baronet said that the House was not so much determining in the usual form upon the third reading of the Bill as sitting in Committee to see if they could agree upon a compromise; and he intimated that some slight modifications might be introduced into his plan. That would have been very well if that had been the second reading of the Bill, but at that stage no alteration could be made, and it, therefore, appeared to him that the necessary preliminary to a compromise was the removal of the Bill from the Table of the House. In his opinion it was the duty of the hon. Baronet rather to withdraw than to move the third reading of the Bill, the effect of which would be to shut the door of compromise, which they were all anxious to keep open. He believed that there were on both sides of that House hon. Gentlemen who said that a great principle was at stake, and, therefore, they could not agree to any compromise. What was the principle which was at stake either on the one side or the other? The hon. Baronet disclaimed distinctly the principle of separating the Church from the State. Then, what was the principle for which he contended? Did it go beyond this—that it was improper to compel a man to contribute towards the maintenance of an edifice for religious worship of the congregation of which he did not form part? If that was the principle, he did not dispute it. But what was the principle contended for by hon. Gentlemen who held extremely opposite opinions? He had during the last fortnight received from the country many letters asking him what on earth he was about in attempting to effect a compromise upon the question, and asking him if he was not aware that there was a great principle involved in it. He confessed that he saw no principle in the matter, except that of devising the best means of repairing churches, and providing the necessaries of public worship in the manner which should be least onerous to those who paid and least objectionable to those who were excluded. If it were a financial question only, it was surely susceptible of settlement. If it were not, then he asked to have it shown to him what that principle was which stood in the way of an equitable settlement of the matter. The courses open to the House might be fairly represented by the different phases of opinion which existed at the present moment. There were those who raised the cry of “No surrender!” and said that they would never give up church rates; there were those who declared that they would be content with nothing short of converting the Church of England into a sect; and there were those who did not agree with either of these parties, but were determined to have an arrangement. The small number who, in that House or out of it, entertained either of the extreme opinions to which he had referred was a sufficient indication to the representatives of the people that the true course for them to pursue was to act in accordance with the wishes of the third party. More than that, he denied that it was possible to avoid the adoption of such a course. It might be put off for a year or two, but to that they must come at last, because the time would arrive when people would be sick of the annual agitation, and would force the House, by an argument which they could not resist, into making some arrangement. He was not going to justify or argue upon the plan which had been referred to. It was offered upon a condition which was not accepted, and the House must look upon it as having dropped. It would, however, probably be expected that he should, without discussing the details of any scheme, state the principles upon which he thought that an arrangement might fairly be made. In a matter of the kind, affecting the social habits and the arrangements of the every-day life of men residing in country parishes, he was persuaded that the only safe course was to ascertain what was the old plan and the old principle, and to depart from that as little as possible. What was the old principle of the church rate? Until the Reformation only one religion was tolerated, and those who did not pay their church rate were excommunicated and treated as heathens. At the Reformation a new light, thank God, broke upon us; the Bible took the place of the Church as the guide of our consciences. And, subsequently, various statutes introduced the widest religious toleration or equality. The practical conclusion which he drew from the course of our legislation for the last 300 years was that a man who separated himself from the Established Church ought to have provided for him the means of separating himself from the expenditure which was required to keep up that Church. Practically every Nonconformist excommunicated—he only used the word for the purpose of illustration—himself. The old penalty had become obsolete, but why should not the practical distinction be retained? The proper mode of dealing with this question was to allow every man, if he thought proper, to exempt himself personally from the obligation to contribute to a rate which was to be applied to the support of a Church of which he was not a member. Let the principle be admitted, and all the rest would follow naturally. Let it be accepted in the form in which it would be least offensive; let it be carried out in such a form as should not, if possible, cause the faintest allusion to religious differences; let it not be pressed in the least degree beyond its legitimate limits. Let them not require that the person who did not contribute to the church rate should give up any right as a parishioner of which they would be sorry to see him deprived; but all must admit that he could have no claim to a voice in the management of funds to which he did not contribute, and that while he paid no rates he ought not to have a seat in the church. At the same time he did not wish to prevent his regaining that seat or to sever his natural connection with the parish church, the parish churchyard, and anything belonging to it. Let those who objected to church rates be satisfied with that personal exemption, and he believed that a large majority of the Members of that House would be prepared to sanction such an arrangement. He should himself support it for the reasons which he stated two years ago. He believed it to be, not a concession, but a necessary inference from the toleration which had been the rule for the last 300 years. He accepted it readily, because, as a Churchman, it was a pain and an annoyance to him that for the services of the Church, which he venerated, any money should be contributed with a reluctant and grudging hand. Let them, then, suppose that such an arrangement as he had referred to, allowing personal exemption from church rates without reason assigned, had been made, how would it affect the landlord? In order to put the case in its least invidious form, he would state how it would affect himself. He was the sole owner of a parish in which he had six or seven tenants, and where there had never been any difficulty about raising the small sum which was paid annually for Church purposes. If the arrangement of which he had spoken was adopted, Farmer A might take advantage of it, and pay no rate. Farmers B, C, D, and E, although they were quite ready to pay their own rates, might naturally object to pay those of A also. What should he do as the landlord? He should say that it was better that they should all be exempted, should take care that the rates were paid, and should arrange with his tenants individually. Was there anything wrong in that, and was it not what must inevitably result from the adoption of the scheme for giving personal exemption? That result was present to his mind when he introduced one clause which had been animadverted upon into the plan which he submitted to the hon. Baronet. At the same time, while he thought that landlords ought to take upon themselves so much of the expense now met by church rates as arose from the repair of the fabric, he admitted that under the circumstances it would be unwise and inexpedient to impose that obligation upon them by statute. Then came the question of personal exemption. For that he was prepared to vote, and so were many other Gentlemen; but the Bill of the hon. Baronet prevented any measure with that object from being laid on the table of the House. He did not suppose the hon. Baronet himself expected it would pass. He might believe—erroneously, as he hoped the result would prove—that the third reading would pass in the House of Commons; but there was another branch of the Legislature, and in the present state of public feeling, with one-half of the community distinctly objecting to the Bill, and with adverse opinions expressed by a very large number of highly respectable persons in all parts of the country, he did not believe the hon. Baronet could expect the measure to be sanctioned by the other House of Parliament, so as to become law. Was it not better that the Bill should be stopped now? He was in a position to state that, within a very few days after the Bill was got rid of, the House would be asked to allow a proposition to be submitted affirming the principle of personal exemption in a shape which was intended to be unexceptionable, such as every Nonconformist could accept without difficulty; and, if any one could point out a more easy or unobjectionable mode of defining those exceptions, his hon. Friend by whom the Bill would be proposed would have no objection to listen to reason. He asserted that no principle was involved in the Bill, or if there were any principle it was one he would describe as that of common prudence. Common prudence showed the importance of endeavouring to arrive at a solution of the question by mutual concession. To agitate it year after year only rendered it more difficult to attain any safe conclusion. If the struggle continued, the blame must rest on those who rejected all attempts at compromise. Disagreeable as that word might be, mutual concessions must be made, and the old English principle of give and take must prevail in the long run. He was not one of those who thought that a great principle was involved, and that a great “no surrender” struggle was a duty cast on all Churchmen. He would not argue the question on any grounds higher than those of common sense, common prudence, and “financial desirability.” But the Session ought not to be allowed to pass without some scheme of a practical nature being at all events placed on the table. Such a measure ought, in the first place, to respect the religious principles of those from whom they differed; secondly, it ought to retain for Churchmen their old common law right of levying money wanted for the repair of churches by the old plan of a rate; and, in the third place, it should produce as little disturbance in the existing arrangements in parishes as was absolutely necessary to meet the difficulties of the case. For, let the door of exemption be opened ever so widely, there would still be a large number of parishes in which from the first the new law would be inoperative, as they only asked to be let alone. Lastly, the arrangement, whatever its nature, should not leave it in the power of either side to claim a triumph. Believing that the Bill now before the House was bad in itself, and prevented any adjustment in the spirit to which he had referred, he begged to move that it be read a third time that day three months.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, as he also had taken part in proposals for a compromise, he begged to second the Motion of his right hon. Friend. He thought it a most satisfactory feature of the debate, not only that the right hon. Gentleman had spoken in that conciliatory tone which he always adopted when addressing the House, but also, that on the other side of the House a very great anxiety had been shown by hon. Members who supported the Bill to disconnect themselves from that which had now become odious—from association with the Liberation Society. It was exceedingly unjust to charge upon hon. Members who did not deserve it any connection with that society, and he much regretted that the hon. Baronet, the Member for Tavistock, should have suffered from an accusation he so little merited. But when he stated the grounds on which, mistakenly, perhaps, Members at the Opposition side of the House had been led to bring a charge of association with the Liberation Society against the party opposite, the House would acknowledge that there had been some reason for their doing so. Some time ago an hon. Baronet, a very distinguished Dissenter, and a man highly respected in that House, disclaimed all partnership with the Liberation Society, in these terms:—"In taking the course he now did he begged to assure the House that he had never taken any part with the enemies of the Church. No man deplored more than himself the existence of the Liberation Society." That was a very satisfactory announcement from the hon. Baronet, the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto). But, unfortunately, in ransacking old newspapers, he came across a copy of the Liberator, a paper known to record the views and to represent the opinions of the Liberation Society. In it he found an account of a meeting in 1859, and there, to his extreme astonishment—having listened with such pleasure to the disclaimer of the hon. Baronet, the Member for Finsbury—he read as follows:—

"Sir M. Peto, Bart., who was received with loud cheers, said,—In order to be useful in Parliament or out of it, it was necessary not only to be very sincere and straightforward, but also very clear in one's sentiments; and when he stated that he sympathized with the object of the meeting, and desired to labour with those who conducted the affairs of the society, they would feel, he hoped, there could be no mistake about his views. It was also necessary, in order that a man might be useful, that he should be prudent in advocating his opinions and conciliating to those who differed from him. There must be no shrinking from principle in the House of Commons in the present day. He remembered that in the earlier stages of the society he had felt some hesitation in identifying himself with it, because he felt there was not that kindness and liberality shown towards those who differed from it which he felt should be entertained; but he must admit that the conduct of its affairs, especially during the last three or four years, had thoroughly recommended it to his adhesion and support, and he had no hesitation in thoroughly identifying himself with it."

With two such documents before him, the speech of an hon. Member in the House of Commons on one side, and his speech in the Liberation Society on the other, was it so very odd that hon. Members should rather distrust these loud disclaimers of the Liberation Society? When the hon. Baronet the member for Finsbury, who, as he had already stated, was highly respected, and would no doubt be able satisfactorily to explain this apparent inconsistency, found no difficulty in combining these opposing incentives to action, might not other Gentlemen be similarly situated with regard to their opposition to church rates? Another document came under his notice within the last few days. It was headed "Serious and immediate," and it was addressed "to the ministers, office-bearers, and others connected with the various Nonconformist bodies throughout North Derbyshire." It said—

"Dear Friends,—Very special information has reached the Church Rate Abolition Committee relative to the means already in active operation to defeat Sir J. Trelawny's Bill on the 5th of June."

And it proceeded to state that the two hon. Members for Derbyshire having recently modified their opinions on the subject of church rates, the undersigned respectfully urged—

"Every Nonconformist minister, office-bearer, and layman, of whatever denomination, in your county to write at once to Lord G. Cavendish and Mr. Thornhill, and not to cease their communications until there had been received a distinct assurance of their intention to be present at the division on the 5th of June, and to vote for the Bill."

A reason was given for that extreme pressure, for the authors of the circular, it seemed, did not regard a victory in the House of Commons as sufficient, recent discussions about the House of Lords having given them new views of constitutional questions—

"We must employ all legitimate means to defeat this plan, more especially as the carrying of the Bill a third time to the House of Lords will introduce into the discussion a constitutional issue between the two Houses, which can only end in one result."

That was the view of the functions of the House of Lords, and of the tone which the House of Commons should adopt towards it, that had been propagated in the country by the measures which had recently been passed. He particularly wished to call attention to the signatures attached to this document. These were—

"Edward Steano, D.D., and J. H. Hinton, M.A., secretaries of the Baptist Union; George Smith and Robert Ashton, secretaries of the Congregational Union of England and Wales; Apsley Pellatt, chairman of the Dissenting Deputies; Robert Eckett, secretary to the United Methodist Free Churches; William Cooke, ex-president of Methodist New Connexion; R. Brook Aspland, M.A., secretary of British and Foreign Unitarian Association."

All these names represented the various Dissenting bodies who formed the strength and backbone of the present agitation against church rates; but last of all came the well-known names of "William Edwards, Charles J. Foster, Liberation Society." The hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock told them that if the Bill were not passed this year he would hand them over to the secular arm. He did not know exactly what the "secular arm" meant, but he supposed it was the hon. Member for Birmingham. Personally, he should rejoice at the change, for the hon. baronet the Member for Tavistock always held the language, and he believed entertained the sentiments, of a sincere friend of the Church of England. In defending the Church of England against one whose sentiments were orthodox, Gentlemen at that side of the House were placed at some disadvantage. Gibbon declared that nothing "was so dangerous as the virtue of priests," and, from his point of view, that was a just observation. He would venture to paraphrase that sentence by saying that nothing was so dangerous as the orthodoxy of Radicals. He should, therefore, rejoice if this agitation were handed over to the hon. Member for Birmingham, who, by his previous language, his known sentiments, and the political support on which he relied, was well entitled to be placed at its head. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) said it was a disgrace and a shame to a Christian country that the question should so long remain unsettled. In that sentiment he entirely coincided. But the question was who was guilty of the delay? It was protested on the other side of the House that the measure was proposed in the spirit of civil and religious liberty. There were two kinds of liberty—that of the parish and that of the individual. Since the decision in the Braintree case nobody would dispute that the liberty of parishes had been absolute and complete. But some parishes liked to adopt one course and some another; and some, not content with carrying out their own views, came forward and said, "We will compel other parishes to do as we like also." The Bill, promoted in furtherance of that spirit, was not a Bill of liberty and enfranchisement, but of disfranchisement and forfeiture of privileges which had been held for a thousand years. It was a Bill of pains and penalties to punish those parishes which liked to levy church rates; it was an attempt to impose on the majority a Procrustean rule, coercing them to forego their own inclinations; it was an attempt to fix on all the opinions and the actions dictated by the inclination of the few. But, then, it was represented, not as a question of parochial, but of individual liberty, and it was held to be a grievance that individuals should be forced to pay for the support of a system in which they did not believe. Hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, though they might not perfectly agree with that opinion in theory, were yet prepared to give practical expression to the view that those who did not hold the tenets of the Church of England should not be called on to contribute towards her support by the payment of church rates. But when they sought to carry their view into practice they discovered that the conscientious objection referred to a conscience of a very peculiar kind. It was not a conscience that objected to worship in the edifices of the Church of England, to enjoy all Church privileges, to use her churchyards, to attend her sacraments, or to avail itself of the ministrations of her clergy. It was simply a conscience which objected to pay for what it enjoyed; and in that respect it was like a conscience which was very common in the world, only it did not usually bear that name. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth in thinking that the form of the exception was a secondary matter. Whatever form was adopted it would be equally a register of Dissenters. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) said, that by cutting too sharp a line round the Church of England they would lose a great many of those who would otherwise join her communion. He could not understand the extreme anxiety shown by many sincere persons to retain those who, as it were, hung outside our religious system with an impartial affection for church and chapel, who went to chapel in winter because it was warmer than the church; and who went to church in summer because churches were generally larger than chapels, and who were so completely impartial that they usually refused to support either one or the other. These were a kind of amphibious religionists, with whom he owned he had no manner of sympathy, and whose numbers he believed had been very much exaggerated. With those who were anxious to spread an opinion in the world, or to maintain a creed, the text, "those who are not for us are against us," was of universal applicability, and was the only road to success. And if they made efforts to claim men who were mere waverers in opinion, who when a stress came would desert, or, at least, give them no genuine support, they were but wasting their resources and sacrificing their principles for an unworthy object. An opinion such as he had adverted to he had even heard from his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and he was the more surprised, because at a time anterior to his own political experience his hon. Friend had been the whip of a party. Did he then value the waverers and mere outsiders? Did he think the men who always failed him at a pinch were worth the sacrifice of any principle to conciliate them? The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, using a word which had almost grown classical in Parliamentary language, said that, whatever they did, they must not "ticket" Dissenters. The hon. Member for Birmingham, who was the originator of the phrase, told the House on the second reading of the Bill that the old Puritans were the fathers of the present Nonconformists, and that the spirit of the old Puritans still lived. Hon. Members at the present day might differ from the Puritans, might condemn many opinions which they held, and many acts which they did; but, at least, they must acknowledge them to have been some of the noblest characters in our history. They maintained earnestly and fearlessly, not only against public opprobrium, against the frown of power, but against absolute and cruel persecution, the opinions which they held and the faith in which they believed. If any of them could rise again, he was convinced they would disown their degenerate children, who regarded it as a stigma to be ticketed with the name of their own belief, and wished to enjoy the luxury of Dissent in secrecy and obscurity. But he could well understand the feeling of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and those who acted with him, for entertaining peculiar views on the question of secrecy; they had for years been asking the House to apply that secret policy to our political system. It was by a natural transition that those who sought the secrecy of the ballot should dislike to bring their religious opinions into the light of day. He would not, however, believe that these Gentlemen really represented the Dissenters of the country. He could not doubt that the latter would repudiate with disgust the imputation that they were ready to slink into a corner, and that, for fear of losing a certain amount of social caste, they wished to conceal from their friends and neighbours the creed and the opinions they professed. The failure of all proposals for a compromise betrayed the objects and policy that were at the bottom of all the professions of the abolitionists. If they were really anxious for the relief of personal conscience, such flimsy objections as had been put forward in regard to "ticketing" would not have been urged. Such objections proved what the evidence of the Liberation Society, the avowals of liberation newspapers, and the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) on the second reading of the Bill abundantly showed—that a considerable number of those to whom the agitation on the subject was due were actuated, not by the desire to obtain civil and religious liberty and toleration, but to pull down the Church of England from the national position it occupied at present. Although, therefore, he did not entirely go with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) in his proposal, he was not sorry it had been made. He thought it established that those who sat on his (the Opposition) benches, at least, were anxious for the settlement of the Church-rates question. If the proposal for a compromise had come from the Opposition under other circumstances, it might be liable to misconception; but now, when the tide had turned in their favour, when the divisions in support of the Bill had diminished year by year, when the House of Commons were equally divided, and an overwhelming majority of the House of Lords were against the abolition, the country would discern between the real advocates of liberty and toleration, and those who only concealed under these fair names the bitterness of political hostility and the desire for widespread and revolutionary changes.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that representing as he did a large and important constituency (Marylebone), he felt it would hardly become him to give a silent vote on a question of such magnitude. He would not, however, trespass too long on that indulgence which the House generally conceded to a new Member. He wished to express the pleasure he felt in hearing the very conciliatory speech in which the opposition to the Bill had been conducted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), who had so carefully and so gracefully avoided personal allusion of any kind. Whatever the division on this measure might be, it was consolatory to all who intended to vote, as he did, in favour of the Bill of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny), to know that an endeavour had been made on the other side of the House to satisfy the just claims of the Dissenters. The position of the question was this. Both parties grounded their course of action upon conscientious principles. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire evinced a desire to waive the principle of compulsory collection in the case of those who conscientiously objected to the payment of church rates.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT: What I said was, I would never assent to give up the mode of raising the money by means of a rate.

MR. LEWIS: Be that as it might. It might be true that church rates had lasted a thousand years. The time, however, had now arrived when they ought to cease. They all looked with love and respect upon the venerable fabrics of the Church of England, and wished to see them kept in thorough repair. As a sincere Churchman, however, he felt convinced that in voting for the Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock he was conferring a great boon on the Church. The Established Church ought to live in the hearts and affections of the people, but that result could never be obtained so long as so wretched and miserable an occasion of bickering and quarrelling was maintained. To abolish church rates would, therefore, be, in his opinion, to cut out a festering sore that was eating into the very vitals of the Church, and weakening its influence in the country. The voluntary principle had been so pre-eminently successful that the Church need not fear the smallest possible damage from the abolition of church rates. Let any one consider what the voluntary principle had done among the Dissenters. Chapels erected in every part of the country were nobly sustained, and their ministers provided for. So far were Dissenters from wishing to hide their opinions from the light of day, that these chapels were filled to overflowing. Then see what the voluntary principle had performed within the Church itself. Could hon. Gentlemen, unless they held pews of right, obtain accommodation in any parish church in the Metropolis? Churches and chapels had arisen in connection with the establishment which were maintained and kept in repair, and their ministers supported, by voluntary contributions. The Church Missionary Society sent preachers of the Gospel to almost every part of the world. Almost every town on the Continent had its place of worship, supported by voluntary contributions, where Englishmen could worship God according to their conscience. He had that confidence in the liberality and religious feeling of members of the Established Church that he was sure they would not permit their sacred edifices to fall into decay. On the contrary, when Churchmen felt that the support of their places of worship depended on their own contributions, our churches would, he firmly believed, be kept in a far better state of repair than many of them were at present. He had no hesitation in giving his vote in favour of the Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock.

MR. CROSS said, he was not going to enter into the question of the merits of church rates. He would assume that the vast majority of hon. Members and of the country at large were in favour of a settlement of the question in some shape or other. The only thing for consideration, therefore, was the form the settlement should assume. It was asserted that the only mode of settling the question was by the total abolition of church rates. That, however, he did not call a settlement of the question, but removing it out of the way altogether. He would not deny that persons on his own side of the House had, on the other hand, hoisted the flag of "No surrender." These, however, were the two extremes, and these extreme opinions were only held by a small minority in the House. The great body of independent Gentlemen on both sides of the House wished to see a fair and practical settlement of the question without delay; but when they came to define what the settlement should be, a difference of opinion manifested itself. Some held that the only way in which the question could be settled was by redeeming or buying out church rates, as, for example, the land tax was redeemed. He did not hold that view, and thought that the only practical way of settling the question was that pointed out by the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt)—the recognition of the principle of personal exemption. That opinion was, he knew, held by many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and it was, perhaps, the only mode of securing the practical settlement of the question now and for ever. What was the settlement which he (Mr. Cross) proposed? He would propose that all persons who objected to pay church rates should have an opportunity of stating that they did so. He would not propose any settlement which he thought was not likely to be accepted by reasonable persons who objected to the payment of church rates. He believed it was a sound principle in legislation to find out where a grievance existed, and then remove it. Dissenters complained of the payment of those rates as a grievance, and though he could not see the force of the argument, yet, as it was used by them, and as they said they had an objection to pay the rates, he would allow them to say that they so objected, and would on that declaration relieve them from payment. He would not advise anything to be done which might have the effect of withdrawing men from the pale of the Church, and of registering them as members of any other religion. He did not want to deprive the Church and churchmen of the right of meeting together in vestry as they had done for hundreds of years, for the purpose of talking over Church matters; all he would ask was that persons who objected should say so, and that on the statement of that objection they should be relieved from the payment of the rates. He would not even call on any person to say why he objected to church rates. He believed the effect of such a system would be that many who differed from the Established Church would willingly pay church rates. Churchmen might object to pay if they chose. The plan, he had no doubt, would work well, and he believed that in a few years no more complaints would be heard on the subject.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to order. The hon. Member was discussing a proposition which was not before the House. He was arguing in favour of some compromise of his own. But the House had before it a Bill for the total abolition of church rates. The hon. Member's Bill was not on the Table.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was perfectly true that in strictness the debate ought to be confined to the Bill actually before the House; but on many occasions like the present, when Bills on the same subject were under consideration, a greater licence was conceded to hon. Members who addressed the House. If the hon. Member had been present earlier in the debate, he would have found that such a latitude had been already granted to more than one hon. Member.

MR. CROSS said, he should be the last person to trespass wittingly on the rules of the House. He had only been anxious, in stating the grounds why he opposed the third reading of the Bill, to show the principles on which he thought the question ought to be settled. When a person declared that he objected to the payment of church rates, he would, of course, not attend the meetings of vestry, though he might rely on his interests being protected by his name being omitted from the list of ratepayers. He thought that the question should, if possible, be settled during the present Session. But it was impossible, at that period of the Session, to discuss any mode of settlement so long as the Bill of the hon. Baronet was before the House. It was, therefore, necessary that that obstruction to the settlement of the question should be removed before they could proceed to the consideration of any other measure. The country was anxious to deal with the subject on its merits, and he felt himself justified in saying that if the Bill of the hon. Baronet were out of the way the Bill which had been shadowed forth by the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire would be brought forward within a few days, which would enable the House to settle the question in a satisfactory manner.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : If the opinions expressed by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt) are shared generally by hon. Gentlemen opposite it is plain that there is no wide interval between the views of the two sides of the House, and that the settlement of this question on principles of the widest toleration is by no means distant. The objection made by the Non-conformist body to the existing system of church rates is not an objection to fiscal burdens, but one based on conscience. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) said this objection was hypocritical. [Lord ROBERT CECIL : I never used such a word.] The noble Lord did not use the word, perhaps ; but his argument went to show that the conscientious objections of Dissenters were at least insincere. He urged that they were limited to particular cases, where they had an advantage in pleading them, and that where there was no advantage their objections did not appear. My conviction is that these conscientious objections are sincere on the part of the great body of Protestant Dissenters in this country, who protest against contributing funds for the support of a Church with whose religious views they could not sympathize. The grounds on which Dissenters object to church rates are, therefore, not founded on the pecuniary pressure of these rates ; and it is impossible to urge any valid answer to this conscientious objection. It may be treated with sneers and ridicule, but it is impossible to deny its reality and its efficacy on the minds of the persons on whom it acts. It should be borne in mind that precisely the same objection was treated as a ground of legislation in the case of Ireland. Vestry cess was abolished in Ireland on the very ground that conscientious objections were entertained to paying it by the Roman Catholics, who formed the great body of the Irish people. That ground applies exactly to the case before us. The main argument used against a change of the law on the part of the Established Church is that if there is no compulsory charge levied upon the body of the ratepayers for the maintenance of the fabric of the church you destroy the essence of an Established Church ; but that argument seems to me void of strength, and, moreover, it was disregarded in the case of Ireland. Because, although I admit a charge in the case of Ireland was substituted, and the Church was not left without sufficient provision for its repairs, still the compulsory charge upon the community by taxation for the maintenance of the fabric of the church was abandoned, and, therefore, it cannot be said that there was left that compulsory charge which is of the essence of a national rate. Looking, then, at the dissension caused by the existence of church rates and the absence of any cogent argument on the part of the Church for their maintenance, I am prepared to vote for the third reading of the Bill. At the same time I am ready to enter into the discussion of the proposals that have been made on the opposite side. I contend that it is quite competent to us to discuss these proposals to-day. If they were in the shape of Bills before the House it would be irregular to enter into any discussion of them now, but as they are mere proposals, brought forward in speeches and in other forms, it is quite competent for us to consider them in connection with this Bill. In the first place there is the proposal of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Cross) which is founded on the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords. The essence of that proposal is, that you shall start on the assumption that every occupier is a member of the Established Church—that you shall charge him with church rate, and then leave every individual ratepayer, without alleging that he dissents from the Established Church, to claim, if he so chooses, that his name may be struck off the list of ratepayers.

MR. CROSS : I propose, that if a man objects to pay church rates his name should not appear on the list of ratepayers at all.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : At all events

his name is to be omitted from the list of ratepayers. Substantially, the plan of the hon. Gentleman is what I have stated. If any ratepayer enters an objection his name is to be omitted from the list. Now, my objection to that system—which is based on the most extensive toleration—is that it reduces church rates to a mere voluntary payment, and deprives them of the character of a rate. Supposing a person who wishes to have his name omitted from the list should nevertheless fail to make an objection in time, it seems hard that you should issue a distress warrant against him when, if he had made his objection a few days earlier, he would have been freed from such a possibility. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) laid down his proposition, and said he wished to exempt from the payment of church rates those who objected to support a church the principles of which they disapproved. But on that ground how can you maintain the principle of a national rate? If you lay down that principle you concede the doctrine on which the Bill of the hon. Baronet is founded. All the hon. Baronet asks is that you should not subject Dissenters to the payment of church rates. [Cries of "No, no!"] I cannot see any practical distinction between the two proposals. The only distinction lies between a general and a personal application of the same rule. If you admit that all persons who dissent from the Established Church are to be exempted you destroy the character of a compulsory rate, and then you must come to the principle of a total abolition of the rate. I cannot see, therefore, that there is any standing ground for a distinction between the principle laid down by the hon. Baronet and that advocated by my right hon. Friend, for the essence of a rate is that it should be general and compulsory. Then, my right hon. Friend opposite proposes a plan in which there shall be two rates—one a rate of a penny in the pound, being of the nature of a land tax; and the other a voluntary rate on occupiers. I confess that that plan seems to me to introduce a new complication into the question, and that in a form highly inexpedient. It has been generally recognized as a principle in these discussions that we are not to give to the Church a stronger remedy than that which it now possesses, or to put it in a more favourable position than that which it now occupies. But if you lay a charge on the land to the extent of a penny in the pound it would no longer be the voluntary rate now imposed by a majority of the vestry. Another objection to the plan is that it would not remove the scruples of those who object not to the amount of the rate, but to the principle of it. On these grounds I am not favourable to the compromise suggested by my right hon. Friend. But if this Bill is passed in its present form, conscious as I am that in the great majority of parishes, including nearly the whole of the rural parishes, a church rate is made by general consent, I am not prepared to say that that would be a satisfactory state of the law, or one that could remain for any long time. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have seen various plans proposed. Perhaps they will allow me to state my plan. I am not at all sanguine that it will be favourably received by any considerable number of Gentlemen opposite, but still I will take the liberty to state it. The objection I have to the plan of the hon. Member for Preston is that it starts with the assumption that every occupier in a parish is a member of the Established Church, and puts upon those who are not members of the Established Church the obligation of keeping their names off the list of ratepayers. That gives rise at once to a system very much objected to, and which has been called ticketing Dissenters. I would proceed in a reverse direction. I would begin by laying the charge on those who are members of the Church, and who testify their membership by attendance at a place of worship. I know the objection there is to the principle of pew-rents; but I cannot admit that the objection has much weight in it, except what may be derived from accidental associations. We know that pew-rents are paid to a great extent in the metropolitan churches; in fact, a large majority of them are maintained in this manner, and so also are the district churches in the country. But Gentlemen seem to think that there is something objectionable in the name of pew-rents, and that they are unworthy of the character and position of an Established Church. It seems to me that a list should be made of persons attending the church and forming the congregation in each parish, who should form the vestry, and that there should be a power of imposing a compulsory rate upon them, which should possess all the legal qualities of a rate. I cannot see that this proposal is open to objection. There would be no ticketing of Dissenters, and I believe the system would work harmoniously in rural parishes, and provide a sufficient fund for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. I am quite aware that Gentlemen opposite will think this an insufficient plan; but I mention it as my contribution to the list of suggestions that are being made, and I trust the House will give me credit in making it for a sincere desire to bring about a practical settlement of this important question.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had for many years opposed the abolition of church rates, as a spoliation of the Church, and an interference with the parochial system of this country; and when he considered the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, he felt that while it was not quite analogous to the scheme for "ticketing Dissenters," which was deeply objectionable, it would "ticket Churchmen," and not only ticket Churchmen, but it would tax them also, and them only for the benefit of the whole community. If there was any title to the possessions of the Church of England, whether in the shape of glebes or tithes—if there were any title to her position as a national Church, it consisted in this—that she was a Church maintained by the nation, at the cost of all, for the benefit of all. That the principle on which he had ever upheld the Church of England as the National Church. The noble Lord, the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), had thought fit to refer to him as having formerly held a position in connection with the party on that side of the House, and to infer that he had departed from the principles upon which that party was formed. His (Mr. Newdegate's) special connection with that party had long ceased. He was an independent Member of the House. But he had been the first accredited officer employed in the formation of that party in 1845. He acted alone for more than a fortnight in the formation of that party, under the late Duke of Richmond; and, perhaps, he might be allowed to be some judge of the principles on which that party was formed. The party was strictly national. The principles on which that party was formed embraced the maintenance of the Church of England as she existed in that blessed completeness which she derived from our forefathers, and in the comprehensiveness which the Church acquired at the Reformation, when an hon. Member of that House accused him of having departed from those principles—

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he had never stated anything so preposterous as that the hon. Gentleman had departed from his own principles.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member accused him of having abandoned the principles of that party. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: No, no!] Then what was the meaning of the noble Lord when he alluded to his having been formerly whipper-in of that party? He should be sorry to believe that he was alienated from those with whom he had so long acted, because they had narrowed their views of the Church of England, and would consent to her being treated merely as a sect instead of being the national Church of the country. Undoubtedly, she permitted great difference of opinion. She comprehended the noble Lord, and she comprehended himself. He did not complain of that. It was a glorious attribute of the Church of England that by her principles, her doctrines, and her discipline, she was fitted to be the national Church of a country in which the expression of great latitude of opinion was allowed; and it was because he feared that if either of the plans he had heard suggested, that suggested by the right hon. Member for Wiltshire, or that indicated by the Home Secretary, for narrowing the incidence of the charge for maintaining the fabric, it would practically narrow the organization of that Church that he objected to all personal exemption on the score of opinion. He objected to the proposal of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Cross) because, disguise it as they would, it would ticket the Nonconformists. He objected to the suggestion of the right hon. the Home Secretary, because it would both ticket and tax the Churchmen for the benefit of all. What he hoped would be done was this—that as property had always been liable to the charge of church rates through the occupation thereof, that now, when it was found that large bodies of persons were unwilling to submit themselves to the discipline of the Church—unwilling to be bound during their whole lives by the doctrines of the Church—and still more to any personal liability for the maintenance of the Church—that the whole difficulty would be swept away by creating a provision for the National Church out of the property of the country, which was always liable to it, and by abolishing all personal liability to any charge whatever on account of the Church. That seemed to be consistent with a wide toleration and almost with equality of religious opinion.

Let them not destroy the National Church because some objected to it for their whole lives, and others for a part of their lives; but let them make provision for her maintenance in her full extension out of the property on which she had a claim which was perfectly indefeasible. Until some such proposal was made he must object to the Bill of the hon. Baronet, the Member for Tavistock, on the ground that the National Church had a claim on the property of the nation, which would remain unsatisfied by the total abolition of church rate without a substitute, whereby the Church would be despoiled of some £300,000 a year, which was essential to the performance of her functions, and upon the ground that by his measure, without intending it, the hon. Baronet would go far to break up that parochial system which lay at the foundation of our self-government, and was one of the primary elements of the Constitution.

MR. BUXTON said, he would not have spoken at all upon the subject under discussion, but that he thought it desirable that as there were many hon. Members on his side of the House, who entertained an earnest wish that the question of church rates should be amicably arranged, some one of them should give expression to his opinions in that respect. He quite concurred with those who thought that the tax was one which in its present shape was attended with serious evils, but he could not help thinking that the force with which those evils were felt constituted a good reason for accepting nine-tenths of that which the opponents of church rates required, if they found they could not obtain that which they sought for in full. It was, he might add, quite obvious that they had not come off quite victorious in the struggle, inasmuch as, while two years ago they had a majority of seventy-one in favour of the second reading of a Bill for the abolition of the tax, that majority had last year dwindled down to thirty, and in the present Session to eighteen, so that if that process of diminution were to continue they must on the next occasion expect to have a majority of only half a Member. Then the question would still have to be dealt with by the House of Lords, and it was under those circumstances obvious that, while much ill-will would be created, church rates would not be done away with for the next forty years, unless some amicable arrangement with respect to them were arrived at. His opinion, therefore, was, that the scheme suggested by his right hon. Friend opposite was a generous proposal, and indicated a liberality on the part of hon. Gentlemen sitting upon the other side of the House which would be in striking contrast with that displayed by those who sat upon the Ministerial side, if they refused to entertain it. The effect of the scheme would, he thought, be virtually to abolish church rates, while at the same time, those members of the Church of England who wished to rate themselves for the maintenance of their parish church would be provided with the necessary freedom and machinery for the purpose. He had simply to say, in conclusion, that he believed he was speaking the sentiments of a large number of hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House when he asked the Government to direct their attention during the recess to devising some settlement of the question based upon the principle indicated by the right hon. Gentleman to whom he referred.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I think that my hon. Friend who has just sat down is one of the most easily persuaded and credulous mortals with whom it has been my lot to have met for some time. Now, I am willing to go with him in his expression of admiration of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite; nothing could be better, unless it had a slight admixture more of what he might probably have got from this side of the House. But we must recollect that the right hon. Gentleman has only within the last few days sent round to all the Members of this House the terms of a proposal which he himself, after the most mature deliberation, was prepared to recommend for the adoption of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman says, indeed, that we are to consider that proposition now as laid aside, but that we are not to look upon it as one which he himself disowns, or one which he does not think it reasonable to make. But, instead of adopting the plan of the hon. Member for Tavistock to abolish church rates, he proposes that there should be two church rates, and that they should be perpetual in scores and hundreds of parishes in which the tax has for several years not been levied. ["No, no!"] Yes; his theory is a limitation to five years, but we know that every year the number of parishes in which church rates are still granted is diminishing, whereas the number in which they are abolished is increasing. I, therefore, contend that no simple fish in a pool ever rushed so foolishly at a fly as the hon.

Gentleman who has just spoken, when he rushes at a proposition like that which has been simply put forward in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and which has never been put in the shape of a Resolution, so that we may definitely know in what it actually consists. For my own part, I undertake to say that if the right hon. Gentleman makes a proposal which practically includes nine-tenths of the Bill now under discussion, many hon. Gentleman, indeed, I believe the majority—on his own side of the House would at once reject it. Now, I hope I may not shock anybody when I say that I, for one, am weary of these church rate discussions. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Cecil) is a lively Member on the subject, but he must not be surprised if that be not my case, seeing that I have listened to debates with respect to it for the last fourteen years, and that I myself have taken up no small portion of the time of the House in discussing the matter. I have, however, the great consolation of believing that we have during all that time made some progress. We are, it is true, a slow people, and Parliament is slower than the nation; but, notwithstanding these facts, we have attained to a certain amount of information upon the question, as is clear from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite who brought us to this point—a conclusion which, when I first entered the House of Commons, was denounced as something fearful—that the Church of England, excluding, of course, from consideration the property of the State which is intrusted to her or which she may in any way possess, shall henceforward be supported in her services and the maintenance of the fabric of the church by the contributions of Churchmen alone. That is the principle which the right hon. Gentleman has admitted to be a fair one, and to be in conformity with the opinions entertained upon this subject on the other side of the House. Then comes the question, how is this principle to be carried into effect? I may say that all the plans that have been submitted to the House of late have adopted this same principle, from which I am confirmed in my belief that we have made astonishing progress in this question; and possibly, when we get a little further on in our discussion, we shall be able to get what hon. Gentlemen would not hear of when I first came into Parliament. However, we are agreed upon this, that only those who are churchmen should be expected to support the Church of England. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Cross), who has taken a course upon this matter the fairness of which I admit, and which does him great credit, proposes that anybody who objects to pay church rates shall be entitled to do so, and that there the question in dispute shall end. Now, that looks exactly like that to which we upon this side of the House ask you to accede. It cannot, however, be precisely the same thing after all, because if it were I do not suppose you would object to the proposal of the hon. Member for Tavistock. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford has, among others, the “No Surrender” flag, if I do not mistake. I will not try to settle the differences between him and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, but it is quite clear that he spoke of the question to-day in a very different spirit from what he used to do: at the same time I think he might yet learn something of a more conciliatory manner from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. But the question comes now to this—how are we to accomplish this object? The hon. Member for North Warwickshire says that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of ticketing Dissenters proposes to ticket Churchmen. I have no objection to this plan if they will reverse, its application; if every person shall be free but those who choose to write to the vestry and say that they are willing to pay, I shall be satisfied. You want a compromise, my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone is great for a compromise. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge brought in a most elaborate Bill which was also a compromise; yet these measures never corresponded with the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, so far as I heard them expressed. The hon. Member, too, last year made a proposition which did not meet the acquiescence of the House. Some Members of the Treasury bench also brought forward plans in past times, but they also were unsuccessful? Why has all this been the case? Simply because those proposals did not hit the grievance which is complained of, and I would now ask whether hon. Gentlemen opposite hit it when they say that they are ready to assent to the suggestion that Churchmen only should be expected to pay the tax for the future? Are they; in acceding to that suggestion, willing also to get rid of that which Dissenters feel

to be a certain legal supremacy on the part of the Church of England with respect to this question? [Ironical cheers.]

Hon. Members opposite are well aware that I do not in this matter shrink from the open avowal of the opinions which I entertain. I told the House on the second reading of the Bill under discussion that the question at issue was not one of £250,000 as between Churchmen and Dissenters, and that it was impossible to settle it except on the ground of perfect equality as between the Church and other sects, so far as the tax itself was concerned. I am quite sure you Churchmen would despise us Dissenters if we held other language than this, and we shrank from making avowal of the principles we hold. You cannot for a moment suppose a contest which has been maintained incessantly for twenty years turns altogether upon the payment of a penny or a half-penny in the pound in the shape of a rate. There must be in this matter something deeper, and he is no friend of the Church and no true statesman who hopes to settle this question without taking that fact into consideration. The right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Wiltshire said, that by passing the Bill you will please one-half the population and aggrieve the other half; but I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman was quite correct in saying that. Everybody will, I think, admit that in nearly all the parishes where the payment of church rates has been contested there have been found friends and members of the Established Church who have openly protested against the continuance of the tax. I have heard of a case in which an amendment pronouncing in favour of a voluntary rate was seconded by the curate of the parish, and I know of one which took place in Somersetshire, in which, when the vestry met to levy a church rate, the clergyman of the parish, knowing that a contest with all its attendant evils was impending, told his friends—who I believe constituted exactly half the vestry—that he was ready to give a cheque for £70 or £80 out of his own pocket rather than that his parishioners should be thrown into the state of turmoil which he anticipated would be the result of persevering in levying the tax. His friends, however, did not think it reasonable that so great a burden should be thrown upon him, and probably not wishing to pay the required money themselves, preferred to encounter a contest in order to raise it, and the rate was, I believe, eventually carried. But here you have the fact that one of these men, whom you so much and so deservedly respect, being aware of the multiplied evils which were likely to ensue from persevering in levying the rate, offered, in order to avoid the contest, to pay a large sum out of his own pocket. He is one of those men of whom Chaucer says—

“Christ’s law and His apostles’ twelve
He taught; but then he followed it himself.”

There are, I believe, many more—hundreds more—clergymen of the Church of England who would from the bottom of their hearts thank you if you were this Session to pass the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock. The right hon. Gentleman, however, brought forward a new argument. We are told that in taking that course we should be striking a blow at the root of that parochial system which it is said tends so much to foster our freedom, and which is so much admired within these walls. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite himself proposes that in the case of those parishes in which a church rate has not been imposed for five years—that is to say, in the case of one-third or one-fourth, or one-fifth of the parishes of England, as it may be—to abolish this parochial constitution of which you speak, and last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a proposal somewhat to the effect that in all populous and town parishes church rates should be abolished, but that in all rural parishes they should be continued. With respect to that proposal I may be permitted to observe that there are in the rural as well as the town parishes thousands of Dissenters who object as strongly to the payment of the tax as any persons resident in the towns, and that if you abolish it in the one case on conscientious grounds, it would be intolerable, monstrous, incredible, that you should seek to continue it in the other. I have got a plan of my own upon this question, but I do not offer it to the House as an original one. My theory of the present Bill is, that if we accept it, it will leave the parishes entirely free, and it will leave the churchmen in every parish also free. It will leave the parishes free for that voluntary rate which is now found to be sufficient to support all the churches which have been built during the last fifty years, and all the chapels of all the Dissenting bodies in the kingdom. But I have heard it repeatedly stated in this House and elsewhere that it would be better for Church congregations and Churchmen if they had some machinery. They have not, it is said, the machinery which Dissenters have in their congregations; they have not so strict a line of membership; and, therefore, they would be at some disadvantage in arranging their affairs when the new system was introduced. I admit there is some force in that, and anything which the House could do with the view of providing a remedy should have my hearty support. But why should not the machinery you have suffice? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary referred to a plan which has been submitted to many hon. Gentlemen in the shape of a pamphlet by some person who, I believe, was once a Member of this House. The writer of that pamphlet proposes that you should leave everything just as it is, only abolishing the summons, the magistrate, and the bailiff; that you should meet as you meet now and agree upon a rate; in point of fact, that you should do precisely that which has been done in the parish of Manchester for as long as I can remember. The rate is arranged somehow by those who will have the spending of it, and a bill is sent round, as in old times, for the amount, but it has the words "optional rate" printed upon it. What is the result? The other day I saw that the old cathedral had been repaired in a manner which it has not been accustomed to for some centuries. In the parish in which I live the Church churchwardens, not the Dissenting churchwardens, advertise themselves to the ratepayers as particularly worthy of their confidence on the ground that they will never again permit a church rate in the parish; and yet the old parish church is in a condition in which the oldest inhabitant never saw it before, and never hoped to see it until the church rate was abolished. I saw, then, that I had pointed out what is probably the best mode of dealing with this question. There is another plan which, if adopted, would meet the objections raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year. It will be recollected that the right hon. Gentleman made a speech which was much more gratifying to hon. Gentlemen opposite than many he has delivered during the last few weeks. I understand, indeed, that the violent antipathy which they have to him on financial questions subsides altogether when he comes to discuss church rates.

The right hon. Gentleman complained of the harshness of our proceedings. He said that if we threw all these parishes at once from what I call the Protective theory to the free trade theory, from the theory of compulsory support to a system of voluntary support—if we pitched them, as it were, off their ancestral platform, and put them in the more modest place which Dissenting congregations now occupy—we should act with great harshness and severity towards them. I admit, for the sake of argument, that there is something in that, though I do not think there is; but, supposing the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock were asked to introduce words by which his Bill should not come into operation until after the lapse of three or four years—supposing the Chancellor of the Exchequer could step in now, with his church sympathies, and his wise and intelligent views on questions generally, and propose to mediate between the two sides of the House in the manner I have just suggested—what would be the result? I speak with no authority, but I do not think the hon. Baronet would object? and I know too much of those who are in correspondence with him out of the House to believe that they would make any serious objection to what might prove an amicable settlement of this question. I am prepared, of course, to vote for the Bill; but I say that if you wish to settle this question on different terms; if you are willing to pass a clause which shall withdraw the compulsory power of levying a rate, leaving your present machinery in other respects as it stands; if you are desirous that the Bill should not come into operation for three or five years—in either of these cases, I think we might even this Session, arrive at an amicable, if not an unanimous termination of this contest. What are we proposing to do? First of all, we exempt all men from the legal obligation of paying church rates; and, in the next place, we enable all men, who choose to support the fabrics and the services of the Church, to do so by means of the machinery which now exists. I cannot see that there would be the slightest difficulty as to the working of it, and I am quite sure there would be no difficulty as to the pecuniary results. Hon. Gentlemen opposite evidently think—I see it from the smile of incredulity on their countenances—that such as I am cannot make a friendly suggestion to their party or to the Church. If they had taken more of my advice years ago they would have had fewer irritating contests and humiliating defeats. If I could bring before them all that their own Church has done during the last fifty years, they would feel it to be the direst insult which could be offered to them for any man to say, that in any parish throughout the country, the beautiful and ancient parish church would not be properly maintained if the rate were abolished. I cannot turn to any part of the kingdom—I care not whether it be in England or Wales, in Scotland or Ireland—without seeing what has been done by appealing to men's feelings, by evoking their religious sympathies, by exciting their ideas of independence, and even by encouraging the much lower feeling of rivalry. Appeal to the feelings under which all men act, withdraw the law, and the Church will spring from the low ground on which, in this matter of compulsory rates, it now rests, to an altitude which it has never yet attained; and in the course of a few years there is not a Member on the other side, not even the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, who will not admit that the Church he loves so well and defends so zealously, has found in me, and such as me, the best friends she ever had on the benches of the House of Commons.

MR. CROSS said, he rose to explain to the hon. Member for Birmingham that his plan was not a mere abstract proposition, but was embodied in the form of a Bill, and ready to be laid on the table of the House.

MR. HUBBARD said, the hon. Member for Birmingham had talked of the difficulties of settling this question, but he wished to know who had created those difficulties. Hon. Members on his (Mr. Hubbard's) side of the House had offered one measure of conciliation after another; they had first proposed a measure of exemption, which he admitted was objectionable in matters of detail, as it required a Dissenter to go before a magistrate and make a declaration of his belief; it was afterwards proposed to accept a simple declaration of objection as a ground for objection; but all those successive plans were objected to. There must be some secret reason for rejecting these repeated offers of conciliation. The hon. Member for Birmingham told them that the difficulty lay in the supremacy assumed by the Church in claiming the right to levy church rates. But that objection to the supremacy of the Church went to deeper questions than the mere levying of church rates; it touched the question of a Church establishment; it struck, in his opinion, at the position of a Sovereign on the Throne. He felt sure that the question would not be settled till hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side did their parts as hon. Gentlemen on his side were doing theirs, and would agree to a basis of arrangement founded on a recognition of the Church and of the great principle of civil and religious liberty, and which would respect alike the rights of Churchmen and Dissenters.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the question had been discussed rather as one of policy than of principle, and in the few remarks that he should make he would endeavour to continue it upon the same grounds, for the question of principle having been granted the question of method was the only one which remained to be solved. In approaching the subject, although he had not arrived at the same conclusion as the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton), he had not been influenced by partisan feelings, but by public considerations, and the conviction at which he had arrived was that hon. Members on his side of the House, in reference to the measure before them and others of a cognate nature had been making claims upon the Church, each one of which, if conceded, would be a weapon taken from the hands of those who were supposed to seek the destruction of the Establishment; and that, on the other hand, the policy which had been pursued by the advocates of the rate was one which, more than anything else, was calculated to raise the question which he and his friends had not raised in that House—the separation of Church and State. It had been said that those questions which in their inception were questions of conscience, had become questions of supremacy. He accepted that antithesis with the qualification that the question of supremacy had been added to that of conscience which still remained. But, besides that, it would appear that in the opinion of some hon. Members a great discovery had been made, with reference to the principles and objects of a society which had been in existence for many years, which had never concealed its objects, and which, no doubt, duly felt the obligation which it owed to hon. Members on the opposite side and noble Lords in “another place,” for giving further publicity to those objects and principles. An attempt had been made to identify the advocacy of the present Bill with the name and with the principles of the Liberation Society. It had been said that all Dissenters who desired the abolition of church rates did so simply with the view of destroying the Church, and it had been argued that the abolition of church rates would be a step towards the destruction of the Church as an establishment. He denied the accuracy of the statement in point of fact, and he disputed the soundness of the argument. The name of the Liberation Society had been imported into the discussion upon two different occasions by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil). On one occasion the noble Lord hoisted the flag "No surrender," but on that occasion he had come down to the House and attempted to play the part of a conciliator, and said, "We believe we were mistaken in charging you with advocating the views of the Liberation Society; prove that to us by accepting the compromise which we have put on the table of the House." But for the interests of the Church herself it was essential that a broad distinction should be drawn between the question of an objectionable and unnecessary supremacy — which the supporters of the Bill had raised — and the question of the separation of the Church from the State, which the supporters of the Bill had not raised. There was a time in the history of the country when the Church and the nation were as one. The Reformation took place, and then, step by step, came the recognition of the right to dissent from that which was itself an act of dissent. Toleration, beginning as a protest of the moral against the intellectual man, gradually rationalized itself until it merged into a claim of equal right; and now it would not only be an act of simple justice to Dissenters, following out the principles of legislation by which we had been guided since the Toleration Act, but it would also be an act of true wisdom as far as her own interests were concerned, if the Church were fearlessly, and of her own motion, to divest herself of every power and faculty which was not absolutely and strictly essential to her character as an establishment, and to place herself in accordance with the spirit and ideas of the age. It would be seen that the question of supremacy, viewed in the light in which he had placed it, was totally different from the question of separation, which some hon. Gentlemen had endeavoured to import into the discussion. The idea of separation was based, not upon any claim of civil and political right, but upon a belief that it was pre-eminently for the interests of religion that it should be free from the trammels of a connection with the State. No scheme of compromise had been, or could be, submitted to the House which would not be objectionable to Dissenters, and which they would not regard as degrading. He believed, indeed, that all schemes of compromise were vain, mischievous, and dangerous. In saying they were vain he agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had admitted that it would be useless to offer as a boon that which the organs of the party to which the offer was made chose to consider an offence. In saying they were mischievous, he agreed with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, because he believed they would tend to perpetuate and intensify those dissensions and that antagonism which the House ought to endeavour to assuage; while, in saying they were dangerous, especially to the Church, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for the City, who had declared that any plan for the exemption of Dissenters would denationalize the Church and reduce her to a sect. Compromise, therefore, was impossible, and he believed that Churchmen would before long arrive at a knowledge of the fact. He could not avoid coming to the conclusion, on those grounds, that hon. Members had no alternative between the present unhappy state of things and the measure now before the House; that if they would look boldly and steadily into the face of the question, the visions which they themselves alone had conjured up would melt away; they would acknowledge that they had got rid of an element of weakness rather than of strength; the fabrics and the services of the Church would be maintained with a liberality hitherto unknown, and new life and vigour would be given to the Church which they desired to sustain.

MR. WHITESIDE: The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) objected to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) on the ground that it was not sufficiently conciliatory. Such an objection comes, no doubt, with peculiar appropriateness from the hon. Member for Birmingham, whose whole course of political conduct, all will readily admit, has been eminently conciliatory. Then the hon. Member for Birmingham objected to the speech of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton). On what ground? Because he spoke the language of common sense, and called attention to the fact that the majority for the unconditional abolition of church rates, once sixty or seventy, was dwindling away, until at last it amounted to only eighteen, and by the way the hon. Member forgot to say that in the last division it had diminished still farther to nine; so that the energy and eloquence of the hon. Member for Birmingham have led to the gradual diminution of the majority by which this question has been supported. The speech of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department deserves more consideration than it has received. When the House is in difficulty it naturally turns to the Treasury Bench for instruction and edification. The right hon. Baronet commenced his speech by stating that the time was not far distant when the settlement of this question might fairly be expected. I was consoled on hearing that statement from the right hon. Gentleman, because I came to the conclusion that he was about to explain how and in what manner that satisfactory settlement could be obtained. He then proceeded to explain to the House the difference between a rate that would be universal and compulsory. There, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I think he fell into a mistake, because, although a rate might not be general, yet, as far as it extended, it might be compulsory: and there would be no difficulty on that ground. The right hon. Baronet next insisted on the analogy between church rates and vestry cess in Ireland; but he admitted that the first thing the Legislature did on abolishing vestry-cess in Ireland, was to provide a substitute for the maintenance of the fabrics of the church. It may be a strong measure to abolish a certain number of Bishops, but as between the parish clergy and Bishops I give my vote in favour of the parochial clergy, and the fund obtained from a certain source was first and foremost applied to the maintenance of the fabrics of the church. That case surely affords no argument in favour of a scheme which professes to provide no substitute for church rates. Then the right hon. Baronet, greatly to my surprise, after having argued in favour of a compromise for a considerable time suddenly turned round and declared that he was about to vote for the measure of the hon. Member for Tavistock—a Bill for the unconditional abolition of church rates. The right hon. Baronet having declared that he felt constrained to give that vote, went on, with a logic peculiar to the Treasury bench, to take a survey of the plans proposed, with a view to compromise by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Wilts (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) and others; and then, to my infinite astonishment, proposed a plan of his own; and having discussed all these propositions—having declared that the time was not far distant when a satisfactory settlement of the question might be expected—his logical conclusion was to vote for a Bill which goes entirely in opposition to all these plans and anticipations. It is absolutely impossible to reconcile his logic with his vote. I greatly prefer his speech to his vote; and I submit to his better judgment—it was his reason, and no doubt his conscience, struggling against the position in which the Ministry stand in reference to this matter—I appeal to the right hon. Baronet, as several plans have been proposed in favour of a conciliatory settlement of this question, to give us the benefit of his vote as well as of his speech, and not to vote for a measure which makes any or all of these plans impossible. The hon. Member for Birmingham has spoken a speech to my infinite surprise. He referred to the various plans which had been proposed; but none of them lead to the same conclusion he supported. Why he is a Saul among the prophets. He would let the matter stand over for three years. He admires the ancient and venerable fabrics of the Church—as who does not who is a Christian?—established as they were by a Christian people for Christian worship; he is half in favour of our case; he is willing to let it stand over to consider his own and other plans, yet he imitates the example—speaking with unfeigned respect—of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, who has throughout the Session spoken, I must say, one way and voted another. The hon. Member for Birmingham dropped an expression which caught my ear as being very significant. He said this question was one deeper than money, and which the true statesman must consider. I perfectly agree with him. It is a question that goes deeper than money, and which statesmen are bound to consider. Accordingly, statesmen on both sides of the House have considered it. There is no desire to carry out any extreme course against conscientious Dissenters—although I have always a slight hesitation when I find conscientious objections verging towards the pocket—but I believe them sincere; and plans have been proposed on both sides for the satisfactory settlement of the question, yet the hon. Member joins with the right hon. Baronet in voting for a Bill which renders the adjustment of the question impossible. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last said this is a mere question of policy, and no principle at all is involved. I controvert that statement. It is not a mere question of policy. It is one of principle. The hon. Member who spoke of supremacy, and who said the question of the separation of Church and State had not been agitated—although he intimated that it might be raised—went broadly upon principle. We, too, contend for this question as one of principle, because from the earliest times the Christian Church has been interwoven with the State; the State has stood by the Church, and I believe the Church has taught nothing but Christianity. When it is said the separation of Church and State has not yet been agitated, a clever practical man like the hon. Member for Halifax would not, I am sure, be surprised to find it agitated. We have made no aggressive movement. We act generally in defence. The party with which he is connected is indefatigable. They make the aggression. But they have been opposed with a vigour and a power they were not prepared to meet, and the position in which this question stands to-day arises from the spirit and unanimity with which their attack on Church and State has been resisted. We are not in the position of assailants; we are not asserting any supremacy; but while we are for maintaining the old principle of the Constitution, and settling this particular question in the fairest and most amicable spirit, how are we met? By a direct proposition to abolish church rates, with an intimation that we ought to be very grateful that the great question of separation between Church and State has not been mooted. I shall conclude my observations with a few words expressing deep truths from a writer whose name is familiar to many hon. Members. The author of The Book of the Church says—

“From the time of the Revolution the Church of England has partaken of the stability and security of the State. We owe to it our moral and intellectual character as a nation, much of our private happiness, much of our public strength. Whatever should weaken it would in the same degree injure the common weal; whatever should overthrow it would in sure and immediate consequence bring down the goodly fabric of that Constitution whereof it is a constituent and necessary part. If the friends of the Constitution understand this as clearly as its enemies, and act upon it as consistently and as actively, then will the Church and State be safe, and with them the liberty and the prosperity of our country.”

Question put, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

The House divided: Ayes 274; Noes 274:

And the numbers being equal,

MR. SPEAKER said, if the equality of voices had arisen in an earlier stage of the Bill I should have had no difficulty in the course I should pursue; because, guided by the rule which has been established by many able men who have preceded me in this chair, I should have desired so to vote as to give the House another opportunity of deciding the question for itself, rather than to have taken that decision into my own hands. But that rule does not prevail on the third reading of a Bill. We have now reached the third reading of this Bill, and I find that the House hesitates, and is unable to express a decision, whether this law shall stand or shall be changed. As far as I can collect the opinion of this House from the course of the debate, it seems to me the general opinion of the House is in favour of some settlement of this question different from that which is contained in this Bill, and I think I shall best discharge my duty by leaving to the future and deliberate judgment of the House to decide what change should be made in the law, if it should be their pleasure to make a change, rather than to take the responsibility of the change on any single vote. I, therefore, give my voice with the “Noes.”

Words added: Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to. Bill put off for three months.

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Windsor Suspended Canonries; Public Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment; Metropolitan Police Force Pensions.

BOROUGHES OF GLOUCESTER AND WAKEFIELD.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTHE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), Whether it is his intention to proceed to-morrow (Friday) with the Motion of which he has given notice, relating to the Boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield?

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, his answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman would depend upon the answer he should receive to the questions that he was about to put to Mr. Speaker. When he made his Motion he was under the impression that it was a question of privilege, and as such he should have precedence, and he intended to have brought forward his Motion on the resumption of the House at six o'clock. He now wished to know from Mr. Speaker whether he was entitled to take that course? He understood that an objection would be raised to his doing so, that a Resolution that had been agreed to by the House had annulled the Privilege portion of the question, and that, therefore, he must take it as a regular Motion in the course of the evening. Of course to bring on a constitutional question of this nature after twelve o'clock would be an act of folly, and if Mr. Speaker decided against him, his answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman was that he (Mr. T. Duncombe) must seek some other opportunity.

MR. SPEAKER: Since 1848 it has been the settled practice of the House that, where a seat has been declared void on the ground of bribery and corruption, no Motion should be made for a New Writ without previous notice, and it has been held that a Motion for a New Writ under these circumstances is not entitled to precedence on the ground of Privilege. The very essence of Privilege is that a Motion may be made without notice. This, however, has been the practice of the House for many years, and has been acted on in the case of Berwick-on-Tweed, Rye, Maidstone, Chatham, Harwich, and Durham, in the years 1853, and in 1857 in the case of Galway and Mayo. I must, therefore, adhere to the established practice of the House; and must state that the hon. Member cannot claim the Privilege of precedence in making his Motion. The Motion must be made, as has been done in former cases, by notice, and then taken in its due course.

CASE OF MR. KING HARMAN.
QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that Mr. King Harman was, on the 12th of June, committed to the House of Correction for ten days, but was liberated by a Warrant from the Home Office before the expiration of his sentence, and contrary to the advice and opinion of the committing magistrate; and if so, whether the Secretary of State for the Home Department has any objection to state to the House the grounds on which he recommended Her Majesty to exercise Her prerogative of pardon?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, it is not usual to ask for the grounds upon which a recommendation is made to the Crown for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, and I am very reluctant to enter into any case of this nature. But I will state to the House that Mr. Harman was brought before a magistrate in London and charged with having created a disturbance at Cremorne Gardens on the night of the Derby day. He was fined by the magistrate after a remand of a week, and bail having been refused, he had suffered imprisonment for five days. The magistrate thought that justice required that a second information should be laid against Mr. Harman, on account of the same transaction for resistance to the police. That was not the opinion of the police authorities, who did not think a second information need be laid. However, the second one was laid, and the magistrate convicted on it. There was no question of any violence used or blows struck. The person was rescued from the custody of a policeman—merely drawn from his custody without violence being offered. The magistrate sentenced Mr. Harman to ten days' imprisonment. An application was made to me on account of what was considered the unnecessary length of the sentence. It appeared to me that after he had undergone two days' imprisonment, the justice of the case was sufficiently met, and I directed him to be liberated.

SLIGO WORKHOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. M'EVROY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a Resolution passed by a majority of the Sligo

Board of Guardians, respecting two children named Caulfield, in the Sligo Workhouse, and who had been registered Protestants, though their parents were both Catholics?

MR. CARDWELL said, he had not yet received the papers from Ireland, for which he had written, and, therefore, did not possess the requisite information.

ARMY—GRANT'S COOKING APPARATUS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said he rose to ask a question of the Under Secretary of State for War—the Adelaide transport took out to China, by order of the Secretary of State for War, Captain Grant's cooking apparatus, sufficient for 5,000 men, in order to test its efficiency for troops in the field; the waggons were never landed, though three written applications were made by Captain Milward, who had the charge of them—Whether the Adelaide did not take them to Hong Kong, and whether they are in use there now?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that Sir Hope Grant had informed him that he did not think it necessary to land the apparatus referred to. He could not say whether they were at present in operation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. QUESTION.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the case that Thomas Richardson, who was convicted at the Winter Assizes at Lincoln of the wilful murder of Police Constable M'Brian, there being, in the opinion of the Judge, no extenuating circumstances and no provocation, had his punishment of death commuted to penal servitude, the presiding Judge not having been consulted by the Home Secretary? If it is the case that the Chief Constable for Lincolnshire then pointed out to the Quarter Sessions and to the Home Secretary the danger of this course of proceeding, and the probability of future attacks on the Police; and if it is the case that the Chief Constable has lately officially informed the Home Secretary that a Police Constable has again been fired at?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he felt it necessary to answer a question as to the remission of a capital punishment with great reserve, because it was obviously inconvenient, and much to be deprecated, that it should be made the subject of discussion in that House. The outline of the case was as follows:—A poacher returning at night with a loaded gun was challenged by a policeman, at whom he suddenly discharged one barrel, and then, throwing down the gun with one barrel loaded, made off. At the end of a fortnight the policeman died from the effects of the wound. It was clear that this was not a case of premeditation, and it was doubtful whether the person who fired the gun anticipated the fatal effects which ensued. Richardson returned to his work, and did not attempt any concealment. After conviction strong representations were made to him on behalf of the prisoner. There was a petition for a remission of the sentence from Boston, in the neighbourhood of the place where the affair occurred, stating that the act was not one of deliberate murder, and that Richardson had resided at Wyberton for twenty years, and was generally regarded as a very industrious man. That petition was signed by the Rector of Wyberton, by several of the magistrates, including the committing magistrate, and upwards of 200 persons, mostly tradesmen in the neighbourhood. Soon after another petition to the same effect was received from Lincoln, with upwards of fifty signatures, among which were the names of several magistrates. There was no dispute as to the facts of the case, and, therefore, no necessity for any reference to the Judge. In the exercise of his discretion he thought it desirable to recommend Her Majesty to commute the capital sentence to one of penal servitude for life. About a month after the respite had been granted the chief constable transmitted to him by desire of the magistrates his quarterly report, in which he set forth the disadvantages which in his opinion would accrue from the commutation of the sentence, and he had subsequently sent a letter to the Home Office calling attention to the fact that a stone had been thrown and a gun loaded with shot fired through the window of the dwelling of a police constable. No damage, however, had been done to the man, and it did not appear that there was any intention of taking his life.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, If he will fix a day on which to move that the Lords' Amendments on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill be taken into consideration?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I will now state what I intended to say the other evening. I have had no opportunity of fully considering those Amendments myself, or of submitting the effect of them to Her Majesty's Government. I think that a certain time should be allowed the country to give its opinion upon the nature of those Amendments. They were discussed, as the House is aware, in a Secret Committee; and under those circumstances I cannot fix a day, but it shall be as early as possible, and any course which I shall take will be dictated entirely by views of public utility. The Bill, as amended, is ordered to be reprinted, so as to show the extent of the Amendments.

TEMPORAL DOMINIONS OF THE POPE. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any account that the Senator Heckeren has lately arrived at Paris from Vienna as the bearer of a secret and confidential proposition from the Emperor Francis Joseph to the Emperor Napoleon, to the effect that the two Emperors will co-operate to form an independent Army for the protection of the temporalities of the Pope, and will engage to prevent Piedmont from entering the States of the Church; and whether a Letter, published as from Baron Ricasoli, is authentic, in which, without denying the report, he is stated to say, "I am confident we shall checkmate all intrigues; my inflexibility and calmness are equal to the right which I defend"?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot say that the Foreign Office has received any information to this effect, but I should not be giving a complete answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman if I were not to state that I have received a communication from the French Ambassador in London, informing me that a proposal has been made to the French Government by the Austrian and Spanish Ambassadors in Paris, in general terms, that the Roman Catholic Powers should act in concert with regard to the temporal power of the Pope. There was no mention of armies, or of protecting by arms the temporalities of the Pope. It was a general proposal, and to that proposal an absolute negative was given by the Government of France. I may, perhaps, state that the ground on which the proposition was refused was that the general arrangements with regard to the temporalities of the Pope were settled at Vienna by Great Britain, Prussia, and Sweden, as well as by the Roman Catholic Powers.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL, &c., BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had to present a petition of considerable length from the inhabitants of Madras, European and Native, stating that, in the opinion of the petitioners, the time had come for the introduction of the representative system with advantage to the institutions of the country. They called attention to the fact that before 1833 the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay had greater powers than since that time, and they prayed that those powers might be restored. In point of fact the petition, though drawn up before, went in the same direction as the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. He also wished to present another petition from Bombay, bearing the signatures of many hundreds of the Native inhabitants of that city and island, who complained of the extravagant expenditure of the Indian Government, the onerous nature of some of the new taxes; and also, that the Presidencies had not sufficient power over their own local taxation. They prayed the House to pass a Bill in the spirit to which they referred. Those petitions had been sent over here, and ought to have been presented in the last Session, but they had not reached him till within the last two days.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask whether the Secretary of State for India in Council had under consideration any scheme for reducing the salaries of the higher officers in India, beginning with the Governor General? He felt convinced that in the present state of the finances of India the adoption of some such change was absolutely necessary.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question of the regulation of the salaries of the higher officers of the Indian Civil Service was under the consideration of the Indian Council; but that, in consequence of the great pressure of important business, they had hitherto been unable to enter into the details of the question.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished to express his surprise that some Gentleman acquainted with India had not risen to move that these Bills be referred to a Select Committee. He thought it very unfortunate that a Bill with regard to India should be brought forward here, and pressed through the House, which was almost as ignorant as he was himself upon these subjects. He had seen enough of Bills relating to Ireland—a subject with which he was acquainted—to know that they were greatly improved by the process of passing through a Select Committee. He considered the High Court of Judicature Bill to be both mischievous to the population, as it now stood, of India, and extremely unjust to the Judges. He saw great inconvenience in the separate discussion of these Bills, and, therefore, he should move that the first of them be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he hoped, if there was to be any reduction in the salaries of the high Civil servants in India, that the higher branches of the Military Service would also be subject to revision. The sums which were paid in the high Military Departments of India were quite monstrous. The Commander-in-Chief in India had a salary of not less than £19,000 a-year when on service. He received the double salary of a Member of the Council, his military salary, and also an extra salary when he went on active service. His ordinary salary was £14,000 a year, which was increased by £5,000 a-year more when he was on active service. Such a sum was perfectly monstrous at the present day.

MR. SLANEY was understood to say he hoped the claims of the Naval Service in India—a most meritorious body—would be taken into consideration by the right hon. Gentleman.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Acts and parts of Acts repealed),

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to move as an Amendment to add to the clause the repeal of the Act of the 5 & 6 Will. IV., c. 52, and of sections 15, 16, 17, and 19 of the Act 16 & 17 Vict., c. 95, in order to revive the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 85, for establishing separate governments at Calcutta and Agra. The clauses to which he referred were those portions of the existing law which suspended the action of the so-called charter of 3 & 4 Will. IV., by which provisions were made for a separate governor in council at Calcutta, and another at Agra. The Amendment was very simple in form, but the question involved in it was one of the very highest importance to the government and people of India. He should almost think it necessary to apologize to the House for bringing forward the subject, were it not that the reproach had been frequently thrown out that the House of Commons was in the habit of slurring over Indian questions. He (Mr. Ayrton) had always been an advocate of the proposal that the Secretary of State for India should be met face to face by an efficient Council. That measure had been adopted, and they were now reaping the fruits of it. One of its results was that the Secretary of State had invited the House to reconstitute the Indian Government. But the first question which stared them in the face was the one which had been raised with so much ability by the hon. Member for Birmingham—could there be an efficient Government in India as long as the control of affairs remained in its present divided footing? As the first step towards improved administration in India, it was necessary that there should be district Governments, and that each should not have under its charge a greater amount of territory than it could conveniently and efficiently administer. When he was in India no one there seemed to be able to account for the system on which we acted in concentrating the management of the whole of the affairs of India in the Government of Calcutta. It was said, indeed, that it was owing to the administration lying in the hands of what was called “the Calcutta clique.” He did not join in that statement; but he mentioned it for the purpose of showing that the system was so unsupported by any good grounds that persons were forced to account for it by an imputation. The portions of India for which he asked a distinct administration stood in much greater need of it than did either Bombay or Madras. The Bengal provinces contained a population of 37,000,000, subject to what were called “Regulations.” That was to say those 37,000,000 were people for whom legislation took place in a similar manner to that in which legislation took place in this country for the people of England. In addition there were 3,000,000 in what were called the "non-regulation provinces." He was afraid that the distinction between "regulation" and "non-regulation" provinces was not very generally understood; but he thought it was this—that in the "regulation provinces" there was law, to which every one could appeal in asserting his rights, as between man and man, or in regard of the Government of the British Crown; but the "non-regulation provinces" were unhappy districts which the Government had pronounced to be unfit to enjoy any system of established jurisdiction, beyond the despotic rule of the Governor General. There there was no established law; and no man could say he had any rights at all except at the will of the Governor General. No doubt the absolute power of the Governor General was to some extent modified by the wisdom of successive governments, but the principle remained the same. Thus there were 40,000,000 of people in the Bengal provinces, which yielded also a gross revenue of nearly £13,000,000 sterling. Now, he contended that whatever might be the ability, or the assumed or imagined ability, of any man in India, it was quite enough for one man to rule over 40,000,000 of people, and to manage £13,000,000 of revenue. The interests of the people and of good government required that these provinces should be made a separate and distinct administration. He would next pass to the north-west provinces. They had there a population of 30,000,000 of people in the regulation provinces, and of 3,000,000 in the non-regulation provinces, making a total of 33,000,000 with a gross revenue of £5,700,000. There, again, there was a charge so extensive as to demand the undivided care and responsibility of a separate government. It would be an argument for his proposition if it could be shown that these subdivisions were greater than some of the existing presidencies. The Presidency of Madras was said to contain 20,000,000 of people in the regulation provinces, and 2,500,000 in the non-regulation provinces, with a revenue of £6,500,000. The Presidency of Bombay had 9,000,000 of inhabitants in the regulation and 2,700,000 in the non-regulation provinces, and its revenue was £7,200,000. If, with such populations and revenues as these, it had been found necessary to have these two Governments of Madras and Bombay, it was quite obvious that in the case of a population of double the amount, with a revenue nearly double, it was equally necessary and more desirable. Let not the Committee suppose that if the subdivision were made there would be no duties left for the Governor General to perform, because there would remain to him an amount of duty and responsibility sufficient to make a wise man start with alarm before undertaking its duties. He would still have 23,000,000 of people subject to his control; he would have to supervise the affairs of the Native States connected with the British Government, possessing a population of 48,000,000; he would have to look after the revenue of the British provinces and after the revenues of all the Native States that the British Government had bound itself to maintain in their rule over their Native subjects—which comprised a population of 71,000,000 of people, producing £7,000,000 of direct taxation, and many millions of indirect revenue belonging to those Native States. But such was the love of power that they had been unable to get the Government to consent to the establishment of additional government, on the ground that it would interfere with the free action of the Governor General. Parliament, however, was invited to consider the subject at a time when it made the most comprehensive and searching investigation that had ever taken place into the administration of Indian affairs—he meant before renewing the charter in 1834; and the result of all that investigation and the deliberation that ensued upon it was, that it would contribute to the good government of India at once to establish two distinct governments upon the basis of the governments of Bombay and Madras—one for Calcutta and the north western provinces, and the other for Bengal and Agra. That was the deliberate judgment of Parliament at that time, and it was embodied in the statute, which contained also all the requisite provisions for carrying it into effect. But after a year or two the subject was considered in Calcutta, and a despatch was written, which was laid upon the Table of the House, suggesting that it would be undesirable to carry that Act into effect. He had read that document as well as the other documents on the subject, and it struck him that they were singularly deficient of any reasons against giving effect to the deliberate legislation of the House of Commons. The Government of the day, however, proceeded in what he would call a mild and gentle manner, by asking the House to suspend the operations of the

Act. The House acquiesced in the course proposed, and from that day to the present the Act to which he referred never came into operation. Now, he wished to put an end to that state of suspension, and to give effect to the Act which had previously passed. It was, no doubt, the easiest thing in the world at any time to conjure up an immense amount of difficulty, if it were thought desirable by certain parties to prevent a measure coming into operation in India. He had seen many occasions in which such difficulties were set before their eyes. But he had also found that on a minute examination of the facts of the case in question those difficulties generally faded away. If there had been difficulties in the way of carrying the Act into effect, they rather arose from the position of the Government having to deal with a Court of Directors and Board of Control, from the interests of the Civil Service in India, which was the child of the Court of Directors, and from the state of the army, which was in the last degree unsatisfactory. But the alteration that had now been made in the Home Administration, in the Civil Service, and in the organization of the army, and in other important matters, had entirely removed all the difficulties which were formerly suggested as being in the way of giving effect to the Act of Parliament. He did not believe there was any real objection to the Act coming into operation, and that being the case, the great question came before them, whether it was not their imperative duty to provide for a population of 40,000,000 an efficient local administration—whether they ought to leave such a population the sport of circumstances, as they had done during the last twenty-seven years of their Indian Administration? Hitherto these people had been left to the casual rule of a Lieutenant Governor—they had never experienced the advantages that other presidencies had had of having regular governors sent out direct from this country, but had been placed in an inferior category, which he believed had been very prejudicial to the interests of their inhabitants. He admitted the advantage of having an organized Civil Service identified with British interests in India; but if they wished to have a province in India well governed, the man at the head of that province should be an independent ruler, sent direct from this country. The first duty of such a governor was to hold a firm hand over the Civil Service, and when necessary to stand between them and the other classes in India. But, however able a man brought up in the Civil Service of Bengal might be, when he left the secrétariat and entered upon the office of Lieutenant Governor he did not assume the government under conditions favourable to a sound administration, but rather under conditions most unfavourable to an efficient administration, and the maintenance of that authority and influence which he ought to possess. If there had been a British Governor in Bengal, as in Bombay or Madras, he did not believe they would have heard one word of those indigo transactions, which had been so deplorable in their results. At a time when they saw people in this country anxious to employ their capital in India, and saw that this involved a question pregnant with results important to the industry of this country, they were bound to consider what was likely to induce British subjects to settle in India, and what was requisite for their security when there. If they did not get from India those products which she was so well able to raise, such as corn, cotton, indigo, &c., they could not hope for those remittances to this country that were so necessary for the maintenance of Indian credit. It was essential that Bengal should have a local Legislative Council. Whatever, indeed, was necessary for good government in Madras or Bombay was equally desirable for Bengal, and it would be an object of great importance to emancipate the Governor General from the local administration of affairs in Bengal. There was only one other point to which he wished to refer in support of his Motion, and that was the great commerce of Bengal even as compared with Bombay and Madras. The exports of Bengal were year by year increasing, and had now attained a magnitude which a few years ago none could have anticipated, and with these great interests involved, he placed the question before the right hon. Gentleman as one of paramount importance. Every one with whom he had conversed upon the subject acquiesced in the necessity of the step. Terrified indigo planters looked upon it as essential for the protection of their interests; the Natives had always demanded it; while he thought the personal interests of the Civil Service were no longer to be looked to as the first consideration in regulating the affairs of India. Military interests were also now made subservient to the interests of the nation, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give his consideration to the matter, and upon his own responsibility propose the repeal of the suspending Acts that had been passed, and give to these great populations that which was a necessary condition of their future good government, and which he believed was absolutely necessary if they did not want a recurrence of those proceedings ending in mutinies such as they had had before. He proposed in line nineteen to add the words "the Act 5th and 6th Will. IV., cap. 52, and sections 15, 16, 17 and 19 of the Act 16th and 17th Vict., cap. 95."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Gentleman, but he had scarcely been able to collect the object of his proposal. The hon. Gentleman said it was essential to the interests of India that there should be a local Legislative Council in Bengal and a fixed Governor in Bengal, as in the other presidencies. But there had been for many years a fixed Lieutenant Governor for Bengal. The Executive Government of Bengal had long been separated from the Government of India, and the Bill now proposed to give a separate legislative organization to Bengal. Therefore, the main object which the hon. Gentleman appeared to desire was attained by the Bill before the Committee. The difference between the hon. Gentleman's proposal and that of the Government simply amounted to this, that instead of a Lieutenant Governor appointed by the Governor General, who was always a member of the Civil Service of India, the hon. Gentleman wished there should be a Governor sent out from this country, who might or might not be a civil servant of India. The difference being so inconsiderable, it might be said that the general tenour of the hon. Gentleman's speech had been in support of the Bill. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman in approving the separate local administration of Bengal. When he had the honour of being President of the Board of Control he introduced the Bill of 1853 in which he provided for the appointment of a Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. The hon. Member was, therefore, incorrect in saying that for thirty years the affairs of Bengal had been administered by the Governor General. The non-regulation provinces had nothing to do with the administration of Bengal. Many of them had been administered as admirably as the provinces in any other part of India. He believed that the administration of Sir John Lawrence in the Punjab and of Mr. Thomason and Mr. Edmondson in the North Western Provinces had been as good as that of any other district of India. Take also the case of Oude, which, in two years under the administration of Sir Robert Montgomery and Mr. Wingfield, from a chronic state of war and bloodshed had become as tranquil as any portion of Indian territory from Cape Comorin to the Himalayas. The hon. Gentleman had, he thought, done injustice to the administration of affairs in our non-regulation provinces. That administration had, moreover, very little to do with the hon. Gentleman's proposal, seeing that it was confined to the administration of Bengal and the North Western Provinces, which were not non-regulation provinces. He also concurred in thinking it most desirable that the Governor General should be relieved from the local cares of a portion of India, and should be able to devote his attention more exclusively to those general questions in which there was ample scope for any amount of exertion and ability he might possess. But the tendency of all recent legislation had been to separate the Governor General from the exclusive influence of the Bengal Civil Service. That object had been so far attained that for a short time there was not a single member of the Bengal civil or military service in the Governor General's Council. That Council, no doubt, ought to consist of Members summoned from all parts of India, and conversant with the wide and varied interests of that country. With the general view of the hon. Gentleman he entirely agreed, but he was not prepared to take upon himself at present to re-establish in Bengal and in the North Western Provinces governors upon the same footing as the presidents of Madras and Bombay. He did not mean to say that the time might not come when such a measure would be expedient, but there had been a good deal of reference in these discussions to the finances of India, and he was not prepared at present to impose any new charge upon the revenue of India which was not necessary for the due administration of its affairs. The staff of a Governor would necessarily be more expensive than that of a Lieutenant Governor. The question could not be considered except in connection with, perhaps, the more important question of the transaction of the seat of government from Calcutta to some other part of India. He did not mean to say that this might not be desirable some day, as there were many reasons in favour of placing the seat of government within nearer communication with this country. There were, however, various difficulties in the selection of another place for the seat of government; and he did not think that it would be desirable to carry the changes now being made further at present, or to raise difficulties beyond those which must necessarily be encountered. He had written to the Governor General to suggest to him whether the course now recommended by the hon. Gentleman would be desirable, and his reply was this:—He was not prepared to say that it was a proposal to be at all times negatived, but that we should not at present go beyond what was proposed in the Bill—namely, to give the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal power to summon councillors of the Civil Service, and other persons not in the service, both Europeans and Natives to aid in the legislation for Bengal. If the Governor General were to sit with his Council in Calcutta, and the Governor of the Presidency to sit with his Council, also, there would be two independent authorities; jealousies would arise, and that he thought was a great objection to the proposition. But if the seat of Government were taken away from Calcutta, he thought it should be fixed in some central place where there was no Governor. He did not think they were ripe for that yet. Concurring with the hon. Gentleman in the expediency of having a separate executive and legislative authority in Bengal, which was provided for in the Bill; concurring with him also in the expediency of a separate Government for the North-Western Provinces, he was not prepared to go the length of repealing these clauses, which suspended the power of creating separate presidencies in Bengal and Agra, the effect of which would be to constitute these in the same manner as the presidencies of Bombay and Madras were constituted. Having consulted with the Council he came to the conclusion that for financial and political reasons it was not desirable to take a step of so much importance at present. He, therefore, trusted that the hon. Member would not press his Amendment to a division.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he agreed in much that had been said by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, but his Amendment would more properly come on when the 44th Clause was under discussion. He believed it would be of great advantage to have more councils in India. For thirty or forty years recommendations had been made by the very highest authorities that Central India should be formed into a separate Government. Metcalfe recommended it; so did Malcolm; so did the present Governor General. He also thought that if a governor were appointed from this country in Agra, with a council consisting of Natives and Europeans in equal proportions, such an arrangement would be advantageous, and would cause the Natives to become better accustomed to the British rule, especially if the council was a mere consultative one—a kind of darbar. In the case of Scinde and the Punjab the subject of uniting the two had been considered, and the union of the two with a separate government had been recommended, and it was thought best to assimilate it to Madras and Bombay. His objection to the Amendment was that there existed at the present moment power in the Secretary of State, who succeeded to the powers of the Court of Directors, to constitute Agra into a new presidency, with a governor, but not a deputy governor.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he concurred in the general views expressed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, though, perhaps, there would be hardly time to embody them in an Act. There was a great deal of force in the argument that it might be desirable that the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal should not be a member of the Civil Service. One of the greatest problems to solve was how to tempt Englishmen over to India to invest their capital there, and at the same time to treat the Natives with the greatest justice and forbearance. Differences of opinion existed with reference to the official and non-official classes in India. It was not for him to say which class was right, though he confessed that with respect to the indigo question he thought the official class in India was right, and that the steps which had been taken were demanded by justice, and would result eventually in the advantage of the non-official class of British cultivators in India. But, however this might be, it was essential for the continuance of proper relations between the two classes that there should be perfect confidence in the impartiality of the Government. He, therefore, thought that it would be a great benefit if the Government at home were able to appoint a Lieutenant Governor for Bengal; and he suggested that, if such power did not exist already, a clause should be introduced giving the requisite authority to the Secretary for India.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, his impression was that he had the power under the 16th Clause of the Act to make the appointment of a governor who was not of the Civil Service; and if he did not make the appointment, then the Governor General might appoint a lieutenant Governor, who must be a member of the Civil Service.

LORD STANLEY said, the expediency of sending out a Governor from home, or empowering the Governor General to appoint a Lieutenant Governor, was a question the solution of which appeared to him to depend very much on the circumstance whether a Native or European population existed to the greater extent within the district to which the appointment was to be made. In his opinion, a Lieutenant Governor would be found preferable in the former case, inasmuch as he would in all probability be selected from a class of men who had Indian experience, and were versed in Native customs and habits. In the Punjab and the North-Western Provinces, therefore, a person who had an Indian training would make the best Governor. In those instances, on the contrary, in which a European population had to be dealt with, it was well known that a Native training was not the best to which a man called upon to govern it should have been subjected. If, he might add, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets pressed his Amendment to a division, he should be obliged to vote against him, while he concurred in many of the arguments he had advanced. The proposal to constitute two new Presidencies was, he thought, one of too much importance to be decided by a hasty vote in a thin House, particularly as the matter had not been duly considered in India, and as no opinion with respect to it had been pronounced upon it by the Governor General, and as it had not been discussed by the Secretary for India in Council at home.

MR. BRIGHT said, the Committee was much in the position with respect to the question at issue in which hon. Members had found themselves the day before, when everybody agreed that some settlement of the church rate question was desirable, but could come to no definite arrangement as to how that settlement should be carried into effect. The Secretary for India concurred in the main with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets; the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets said he (Mr. Bright) had forcibly expressed the same view of the subject on some previous occasion. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Danby Seymour) also agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and he thought the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) agreed with them all. He (Mr. Bright) had no intention of differing with any one, except by suggesting a mode of doing what was wanted more conveniently than by the means which had been suggested. It was raised upon the part of the Government as an objection to the establishment of a Governor at Calcutta that he and the Governor General would, as it were, be in the position of the two kings of Brentford, and that Parliament would ultimately be called upon to extirpate one or the other, owing to the circumstance that they would come into collision. But if the right hon. Gentleman would turn to Clause 44, he would find that it was proposed, when the Secretary of State for India thought fit, to give the Governor General the power to apply this Act to the Presidency of Bengal, though not to establish exactly the same kind of Government which existed or was to exist in Madras and Bombay. Now, what he asked the right hon. Gentleman to do, and what he believed would meet the case, was to give the Governor General power to establish exactly the same kind of Government in Bengal as would be given by the Bill to Bombay and Madras. If some words were left out, he thought the difficulty would be met. As to the office of Governor General itself, he would simply say that he was not in favour of such functionaries in India, believing them, as he did, to be, generally speaking, great nuisances; but if it were deemed necessary that there should be a Governor General, he might, he thought, be located in some place more central, more healthy, and where he would be less likely to interfere with the population of the Presidency of Bengal, than Calcutta. He should not recommend the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets to divide the Committee on his Amendment, while he should repeat the suggestion that by an alteration of the 44th Clause power might be given to accomplish that which he sought to effect when the most advantageous moment for doing so arrived.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he believed that the best way of dealing with this and all similar questions was to refer them to a Select Committee, although when he made a proposition to that effect it did not find a seconder. He did not believe that the Committee with its existing information was in a position by a hasty vote to alter the Bill.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to know whether the press and the public as far as possible would be admitted to the debates in the proposed Councils? He believed that publicity of that kind was the best mode of initiating the people of India into our system of Government.

SIR CHARLES WOOD remarked, that if a lieutenant governor was appointed out of the Civil Service for Upper India there would be no need of an Executive Council; but they could not send out a governor for the administration of a Presidency without giving him the advantage of such an Executive Council as existed in Madras and Bombay. A governor general would cost more than a lieutenant governor; and although not averse to the proposal of sending out a governor he did not think that was the time to extend expenses, more especially as they had just been cutting down the higher salaries in India. With regard to publicity of the debates in the Councils, he did not think it was a matter which ought to be made imperative law. His views were in accordance with those of the present Governor General, that publicity in the local Parliament ought to be the rule; but that in Upper India, where the Natives would take part in the debates, publicity would be inconvenient. He thought that the question must be left to the Governor General or to the Governor of the Presidency.

MR. AYRTON said, the right hon. Gentleman had admitted the correctness of his (Mr. Ayrton's) views; but had put in the usual plea of Indian secretaries, that they could not be put in force just now. He thought a great step had been taken in getting so distinct a recognition of the soundness of the views taken in 1834, and the expression of a desire, as soon as possible, to carry them into effect. He should, therefore, withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he should move the postponement of the clause unless he received a satisfactory explanation to the question which he had to put. The clause in the beginning said, that a number of sections were repealed. He wished to know were they repealed in consequence of anything in the Bill, or because of things beside the Bill?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the clauses proposed to be repealed were those which were contradictory to the provisions of the Bill.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Composition of the Council of the Governor General of India),

MR. ADAM said, he wished to propose such an alteration in the clause as would provide that vacancies in the Supreme Council of India should be filled up by the Secretary of State in concurrence with the majority of his whole Council, and not as the Bill provided, with a majority only of those who might be present at a meeting. He did not wish to hint that the Secretary of State would pack a meeting, but Members might be out of town, or the Council might be hurriedly called, or Members connected with Bengal only might be present when a councillor for Bombay was wanted, or councillors for Bombay might be called on to elect a Member for Bengal. He was satisfied that the public confidence would be more fully reposed in the Members elected if the whole Council were concerned in the election.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he had an Amendment to propose in a previous part of the clause. It was in line 29, and was, instead of the words "there shall be," to insert "it shall be lawful to appoint." His object was to make it permissive instead of obligatory to appoint a financial secretary to the Legislative Council. It might be necessary to appoint a financial secretary, but not to re-appoint one. Where a matter of £8,000 a year was concerned, he thought it might be worth while to consider whether it might not be possible at some future time to save it. He could not conceive that the right hon. Gentleman could object to the proposal, as he understood it to have the sanction of a great many gentlemen of high authority upon Indian affairs, and there was a public rumour abroad that the Council of the right hon. Gentleman were favourable to it. In the one case the right hon. Gentleman must find a gentleman to fill this appointment of £8,000 a year, but if the Amendment were adopted a licence would be given by the House to effect the economy when it might be desirable. He thought the time was fast approaching when it would not be necessary to send out a financial secretary to India. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Laing had inaugurated a new system, and he thought after a short time all that would be wanted was a gentleman like Mr.

Arbuthnot and other gentlemen high up in the Treasury, who would put the accounts of India in order, and keep them so.

COLONEL SYKES said, that the time might arrive when it would be important to the Secretary for India to save £8,000 a year, and it would be gratifying to him to know that it would not be necessary to appoint a gentleman to receive that sum. He should, therefore, support the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had merely followed the precedents of former Acts. The last Act prescribed that there should be four members of Council; the Bill before them prescribed that there should be five. There had always been an optional power vested in the Secretary of State to suspend the nomination of members of Council; but he thought it desirable that the number should be fixed in the Act. The Governor General had recently written home exulting that, for the first time these four years, he had a full Council and a full secrétariat; but in the course of a month two Members of Council had been struck down with illness—one was obliged to come home, and the other to take a sea voyage for the restoration of his health. Five members he thought not more than enough to conduct the important business which had to be performed by the the Council.

MR. BRIGHT said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not divide the Committee upon his proposal. It was six of one and half a dozen of another. £8,000 a year was a matter of £8,000 a year, but it did not appear to him that five members were an excessive number. It might be that £8,000 a year was too much, and he should like to see it brought down to £5,000. But there was one point upon which he did not agree with his hon. Friend, who thought that the finances of India could be brought down to the state they were in before, and that there would be no need of a Chancellor of the Exchequer for India; but if the right hon. Gentleman were to give his testimony he would be able to make some great revelations. Many of the gentlemen in India appeared not to know even the multiplication table. No one of the 1,000 persons connected with the Civil Service in India seemed to understand his multiplication table.

MR. VANSITTART said, he thought the hon. Member for Birmingham had travelled a good deal out of his way to say something derogatory to the Civil Service of India. He spoke of the necessity of sending out a Financial Secretary from this country; but the fact was that Mr. Laing was actually reversing Mr. Wilson's financial policy, and adopting that recommended by Mr. Harrington—a civil servant and Member for the north-western provinces—namely, to abandon the income tax and introduce a licence tax. Candidates for the Civil Service were obliged to undergo a severe competitive examination; having passed that, they had to undergo another examination in two of the Native languages; then, while they remained in this country, they had to submit a report to the Civil Service Commissioners in regard to the procedure of the courts; and when they went to India they were subjected to a departmental examination before they could get any appointment, while by the Bill a barrister of five years' standing was to have the powers of superseding these civilians. They all knew what a barrister was—a gentleman, after keeping a certain number of terms, or eating a certain number of dinners, and hearing lectures for one year, was a barrister, called to the Bar; and five years afterwards, without looking into a law book unless he chose, he was eligible to one of the judgeships under the provisions of this Bill. He could not help saying so much with reference to the want of financial ability imputed to the Civil Service by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham with respect to the civil servants in India too sweeping. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not divide the Committee. There was nothing in the Bill which compelled that the salary should be £8,000.

LORD STANLEY observed that, no doubt, the appointment of a Financial Secretary was desirable, although it was only within the last two years that it had been thought necessary to send him from this country. There was power, however, under the law as it stood to send out a financier instead of a legal Member, as had actually been done in 1859. He had more doubt about the appointment of a legal Member, but if his right hon. Friend was prepared to take the responsibility of the appointment he was not prepared to oppose him.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the greatest possible inconvenience had been found from the want of a financial Member. It was absolutely necessary to send out Mr.

Wilson and Mr. Laing, and he was sorry to say that the accounts of the finances of India showed them to be in a very unsatisfactory state. His hon. Friend (Colonel Sykes) had been studying those finances—[Colonel SYKES: Hear, hear!]
—and had not been able to come to what he (Sir Charles Wood) certainly had not been able to arrive at—namely, a clear conclusion on the subject. The Governor General upon more than one occasion had complained of not having the assistance of a legal gentleman, and had been obliged to call upon the Advocate General to assist him in the framing of Bills. It was quite essential at present that there should be both those Members.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Amendment. He wished to ask the Secretary for India whether it was intended that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court should be one of the Governor General's Executive Council, or one of the Legislative Council?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the Chief Justice never had been a Member of the Executive Council. He would not be ex officio a member of the Legislative Council.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that with reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kinross (Mr. Adams), he begged to state that he had merely adopted the words of the existing law—that in all appointments the majority of Members of Council present was necessary. He did not give himself more power or patronage by the words of the clause. If Members of the Council would not attend in their places the alteration proposed would create an obstacle which might be very inconvenient. He thought it better that one uniform rule should prevail, and that in matters of expense and patronage a majority of the members present should be all that ought to be required.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought the Amendment a very reasonable one. The Indian Council consisted of fifteen members, but five formed a quorum, so that three members would constitute a majority.

LORD STANLEY said, he was quite as zealous as any one for the maintenance of the influence of the Council, but he thought it would be doing injustice to the members of it to suppose that, because five Members of the Council were a quorum, therefore, only that number habitually attended.

VOL. CLXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Generally speaking, the whole fifteen were present, and no absences occurred except from illness or other unavoidable causes. By the Act of 1858, all the powers exercised by the Council were vested in the majority present at a meeting.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could confirm the statement of the noble Lord. He had never known a meeting of the Council to consist of less than eleven, and, in most cases, the entire number attended.

Mr. ADAM, after the explanations which had been given, said he would not press his Amendment.

Mr. TORRENS said, he wished to move the omission of the concluding words of the clause, empowering the Secretary of State in Council to appoint the Commander-in-Chief to be an extraordinary member of the Governor General's Council. The military duties of the Commander-in-Chief rendered it generally impossible for him to attend the sittings of the Council, and that in the present state of the finances of India he ought not to be paid a double salary. The Commander-in-Chief received about £8,000 a year as a member of the Supreme Council, and £7,000 for the discharge of his military duties, together with some £3,000 or £4,000 for field allowances. The civil salary might be very fairly deducted.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not agree to the Amendment, which proposed to exclude the Commander-in-Chief from the Governor General's Council. That would be a most unfortunate step to take, considering to what extent the Governor General had to do with the management of the army. It should, moreover, be remembered that by the Act of 1853 the emoluments of the Commander-in-Chief had been reduced nearly one-half. Formerly he received from £17,000 to £18,000 a year in his twofold capacity, but now his salary was only £10,000, or little more than the salary of an ordinary member of Council, although his responsibilities were far greater.

Mr. H. BAILLIE said, he thought that the explanation as to the salary was satisfactory, and would advise his hon. Friend not to press the Amendment.

Mr. VANSITTART said, he hoped the Amendment would not be persisted in.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he wished, after the words referring to the appointment of the remaining two out of the five ordinary Members of Council by Her Majesty's warrant under the Royal sign manual, to move the insertion of the words :

" Provided that one of such remaining two shall, at the time of such appointment, be a practising barrister-at-law of not less than ten years' standing at the Bar of England or Ireland, or a practising member of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland of not less than ten years' standing at the Bar of Scotland, to assist by his legal advice the said Council of the Governor General, to superintend and control the preparation of laws and regulations, and to discharge all other duties incident to the office of an ordinary member of the said Council."

If his Amendment were not acceded to, the Committee would be sanctioning the possibility that some gentleman other than a legal gentleman might be sent out to fill the post of Legislative Councillor.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that of course the object of the provision was to enable the Government to send out a gentleman to assist the Governor General in Council in the legal portion of the business that came before him. He objected to the terms proposed by the hon. and learned Member, because he did not want a practising barrister. There was a good deal of law in India which was not English law, and, therefore, it might be preferable to have a person acquainted with the principles of law rather than a practising barrister. Under the terms of the Amendment, he believed the late Lord Macaulay was not qualified when he went out to India. It was unwise to tie up too closely the discretion of the Government. The difficulty was often to find persons qualified and willing to fill the various posts. Let the Committee consider what had happened. It had been intended that a legislative member should be a lawyer, but fortunately the words of the Act of Parliament did not bind the Government to send out a practising barrister, for circumstances arose which rendered it desirable to send out a financial member of the Council, and accordingly, in compliance with the suggestion of the noble Lord opposite, a gentleman was sent out who rendered great services, and whose death was a loss much to be deplored.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he thought the legal adviser of the Governor General should be acquainted with Indian law, but he did not see why there need be any legal member at all.

MR. BRIGHT observed that the right hon. Baronet had told them that it might be desirable to send out a person who was versed in arithmetic and not in law, and that it was better not to restrict too much the discretion of the Government. But, as of the five members of the Council one was to be a financial member, there could be no necessity for appointing a financier in place of the legal member. The term of " practising barrister " in the Amendment might, perhaps, be better omitted, as there were many men well qualified who did not practise in court. He did not, however, attach any weight to the illustration of the right hon. Gentleman of Lord Macaulay, because he (Mr. Bright) did not believe that Lord Macaulay ever did anything for India while he was there. As to the requirement of ten years' standing at the Bar, that period might be thought too long, but still it was desirable that some term of experience at the Bar should be prescribed. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a difficulty sometimes to find the right man for a particular post; but when there was a salary of £8,000 a-year there was sometimes a tendency to put in the wrong man, who was always ready. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the Amendment if the word " practising " was omitted, and the requirement of ten years' standing reduced to six or seven years.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that if there were to be any restriction at all it ought at least to be wide enough to include all the legal profession. A civilian ought not to be excluded if he were the right person for the place.

MR. AYRTON said, that reference had been made to the Indian code of Lord Macaulay. All he had ever heard of that code was this—a gentleman once read a passage from it to another person, who remarked, " What an admirable skit on a code of law ! " The gentleman assured him it was no skit or joke at all, but an actual passage from the code itself. He believed that for twenty years there had been attempts to make something of that code; but no one had ever succeeded. That was very instructive. He admitted the great difficulty of framing a code of law. But what he complained of was this—they were asked to pass Acts of Parliament that were of the nature of a code, and he thought it absolutely necessary that some description or definition of its policy should be inserted; but if any one proposed to insert anything like a description they were told it was a restriction. The purpose or necessity of these appointments ought to be put on record. There were two Members of Council to be appointed—one for the purpose of managing the finances of India, the other to assist the Governor General in the administration of the laws. He would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman to put something into the Bill indicating the purpose for which these two officers were sent out to India. If it was stated that a barrister of a certain standing was to assist in making the laws, it would be enough. The number of years standing would not be a test of ability; but it would be a check. It would prevent any one being made a barrister merely for the purpose of going to India; he could not be called to the Bar merely for that purpose. The standing might be fixed at five years, according to the qualification for an Indian judgeship; or seven years, which was the qualification for a Judge of a County Court.

LORD STANLEY said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would follow the advice of hon. Members, and give some guarantee in the Bill that the gentlemen to be appointed should be men of ability. He felt, however, much difficulty in the wording of the clause. The post ought to be restricted to a lawyer, but the words "practising barrister" would exclude many valuable members of the legal profession, and that might be attended with inconvenience. It would be necessary also to consider how the Calcutta Bar would be affected. Again, the term of years was not a secure guarantee of professional eminence. Many barristers, after some years' practice, had really no more knowledge of the law than any educated man. The mere qualification of a practising barrister, therefore, was no security for professional knowledge. Still, with a view of securing as great a safeguard as possible, it might be well, notwithstanding the incidental inconvenience, to retain the word "practising."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, if the hon. Gentleman did not press his Amendment, he would, before the Report was brought up, endeavour to meet the objections.

MR. LAYARD said, he presumed, after what the right hon. Gentleman had said, that the hon. Member for Poole would not press his Amendment. He quite agreed with the noble Lord opposite that the way in which the description was worded required great consideration. There were many persons qualified as jurists who had never been called to the Bar; Bentham, for instance, never practised as a lawyer; and those professors of law in the Universities who had made law their study, yet had never been called to the Bar, were better qualified as jurists than many practising barristers.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he approved the Amendment. He thought for so high and important an office the qualification ought to be ten years' standing rather than five.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he would withdraw his Amendment, but, as to the qualification, he considered it a great advantage to have had experience of the collisions in the courts of law, and to have seen them in actual operation. A man who had not seen something of the practical working of the law could not be of much assistance to the Governor General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Present Members of Council to continue),

MR. AYRTON suggested that there should be a limit to the amount of the salaries, and moved the insertion of the words, "not exceeding the amount now allowed by law."

SIR CHARLES WOOD assured the Committee that there was not the slightest intention of increasing the salaries, but as the Council of India had been constituted in order to serve as a check upon the expenditure, he thought it would be more fitting to leave the matter to them.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman would not be in the slightest degree binding on the Government, and if their intention was not to increase the amount of the salaries, why not insert the words suggested?

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 5 to 9 inclusive.

Clause 10, (Additional Members to be summoned for the purpose of making laws and regulations),

MR. LAYARD said, he had to move an Amendment of much importance. The great value of the Bill was that it recognized at last the position of the Natives. By the clause the Governor General in Council had the power of appointing not more than twelve and not less than six additional Members of the Council, of whom one-half were to be non-official Members. Now, he wished it to be expressly stated that a certain number of these additional Members should be Natives. The right hon. Gentleman had a few nights before declared that no distinction should be drawn between any subjects of Her Majesty, whether Natives or not. No such distinction ought, indeed, to exist between our fellow-subjects, whatever their race, their colour, or their creed. But he should shortly have to bring before the House an instance drawn from the medical service in which this distinction was maintained, and a great hardship had been inflicted. The insertion in the clause of express words respecting the appointment of Natives would convey no slight upon them, while it would insure the object in view. These Bills afforded an earnest of the right hon. Gentleman's sincerity upon this question; but his successor, or the Governor General for the time being, might not be of the same mind, or a pressure might be brought to bear upon him by the British inhabitants, which might prevent the Governor General from nominating Native gentlemen. Believing that to insert such a provision would strengthen the hands of the Governor General, he would move to add the words—“And provided that not less than one-fourth of such additional members of Council shall be Natives of India.”

COLONEL SYKES said, he gave the right hon. Gentleman full credit for a wish that Natives properly qualified should be eligible to offices of trust and emolument; but in the Bills there was no mention of the Natives. It was all very well to say that there should be no difference between a British subject born in India and one born in any other part of the world, but unless a distinct provision to that effect were introduced into the Bill, it would be said in India that the Natives were never intended for high office. Unless they gave fruition to the expectations they had excited they would ultimately fall victims to the intellectual energy which they had stimulated.

MR. BUXTON said, he was of opinion that there were a large number of Natives who might safely be trusted with a share in the Government of India, and nothing would so tend to establish our Government in India as a liberal distribution of public patronage to them. It might be said that by the existing Act it was declared that there should be no difference in the position of Natives and Europeans in this respect; but, on the other hand, it might be argued that, as the Natives were not specifically mentioned, it was not intended that they should be intrusted with these offices, and to insert these words, therefore, would give them a guarantee which they did not now possess.

MR. TORRENS observed, that it would be better to leave the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he still adhered to the opinion which he had formerly expressed, that it was essential that the Natives should be more largely taken into the administration of the country, and the Bills were framed in that spirit. There ought to be no legislative distinction between any class of Her Majesty's subjects whatever their colour, creed, or race, and for that reason he objected to mentioning any class by name in an Act of Parliament. A Bill had been introduced into the Legislative Council making that distinction which the Governor General had resisted, and he had strongly supported the Governor General in his objections to any legal distinction being made. He objected to the Amendment on the same principle that, neither by exclusion nor by privilege, should any distinction be made, but that all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, without being named, should be admissible to offices to which they were qualified.

MR. BRIGHT said, there was great force in the objection made by the right hon. Gentleman to the insertion of the words. At the same time, he considered that the arguments in favour of his hon. Friend's Amendment were absolutely overwhelming. He believed the universal opinion of Parliament and of the people of the country to be in favour of the fair admission, at least, of such a number of Natives to the councils as should give some satisfaction to the people of India; but he had great doubts as to the desirability of defining accurately the portion of power which should be given to either race in that country. He should be quite satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman, when these councils were formed, would express his opinion to the Government of India as to the employment of Natives in them, because, if such a recommendation were once given to the Government by the Secretary of State, a practice would be set up and a precedent established, without putting words into the Act to which there might be some real objection.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the hon. Gentleman's suggestion was a perfectly fair one, and when the Act was passed it would be his duty to address a despatch to the Government of India, pointing out how it should be carried into operation, and he had no difficulty in saying that he should recommend—as it was before his intention to do—the free admission of Natives into the Legislative Council, without specifying any proportion.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had no faith in these fast and loose statements, which did not in any way bind any future Secretary of State. If compulsory words were not inserted in the Bill he did not believe that any Natives would be admitted into the Legislative Council: at all events, if they were, it would only be pro hac vice, until the policy of the Government were changed. It would have been much better if the Emancipation Act had contained a clause requiring that one-fourth of the Cabinet should be Roman Catholics. There was a permissive power, but no Roman Catholic had ever been admitted a member of the Cabinet. He hoped the hon. Member would divide the Committee upon his Amendment. If he succeeded he would do good, and if he failed he would have called attention to a very important subject.

MR. AYRTON said, he was in the habit of communicating almost daily with Natives of India, and he thought he knew better than the hon. Member for Southwark what would suit them. He believed it to be expedient that the Executive Government in India should be essentially British, but that British authority should be exercised with a due regard to the wishes of the Natives, and that proper means should be taken to ascertain what those wishes were. He did not think that either the clause or the Amendment was well designed for the purpose. He should prefer to leave it to the Governor General to take those means which were most appropriate to the particular circumstances of each case in which laws affecting the Natives were to be made. For instance, there was a very important class in India—the nobles of the Deccan; and the proper mode of legislating for them was for the Governor to call a meeting of them, and consult them upon any law affecting their interests. But if two merchants of Bombay, for example, were sent to the Legislative Council as representatives of their opinions, it would be an insult to the nobles of the Deccan. If they wished to maintain British ascendancy in India, power should be left in the hands of the representatives of England.

LORD STANLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Southwark would withdraw his Amendment, and leave the matter in the hands of the Secretary of State and the Governor General. Although he admitted it was quite right that Natives should be admitted to legislative power in India, yet he could not help feeling that there would be considerable difficulty in carrying out any scheme for such a purpose, and that difficulty would be increased by the mere fact of the paucity in number of the representatives required. For it would not be an easy matter to find in so large a population as that of India three or four individuals so vastly superior to the rest that their appointment to a seat in the Legislative Council would excite no jealousy. Then, again, the different nationalities and religions into which the Indian community at large was divided would superadd difficulties of another character. For instance, a Mahomedan would not consider himself at all represented by a Hindoo; nor would a great landowner of the North Western Provinces or a Talookdar of Oude, feel his position at all bettered because a respectable Calcutta Baboo was allowed a seat in the Council. He, therefore, thought it would be much better that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

COLONEL SYKES said, the effect of the noble Lord's arguments was, that because it was difficult to find representatives of the different grades in India, ergo there should be no representation at all.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he agreed with the hon. Member that the number of Native Councillors should be fixed, and believed that the feeling of the Natives would be that their race was honoured by such a provision being made by the Imperial Parliament. In former times the Natives governed the country, and India produced statesmen and warriors. European communities were unable at first to exercise political power after they had for a long time been debarred from it, and in the same way the Natives of India ought to be taught how to use it. The Act would be a beginning, and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would divide.

MR. LAYARD said, he felt that after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman he would not forward the cause he had espoused by pressing his Amendment to a division. He consented to withdraw it on the distinct understanding that the right hon. Gentleman would instruct the Governor General and the Governors of Provinces to appoint Natives as Members of the Councils.

Amendment by leave withdrawn; Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Additional Members to be appointed for a year).

MR. VANSITTART said, that the effect of appointing non-official Members of the Council for only a year would be to render them mere dummies. A man could not be expected to master the business of the Council in so short a time, and he doubted whether any respectable non-official persons would consent to serve for so brief a term of office. He regretted very much that the Chief Justice, Sir Barnes Peacocke, had not a seat in the Council. It was owing very much to the able and untiring exertions of Sir Barnes Peacocke that the revision of Lord Macaulay's code had been completed; and, indeed, it had been through his assistance that nearly every valuable measure of late years had been passed. When information of the constitution of the Council, under the present Bill reached Calcutta, he believed it would be received with scorn and indignation. With the view of infusing a little independence into the Council, he would move an Amendment to the effect that five years should be substituted for one year as the term of office of non-official Members.

MR. BRIGHT said, that in looking over the Bill no clause surprised him more than this. He thought the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment had not stated one-half of the arguments that might be used against the proposition in the Bill. It seemed these additional Members were to be nominated by the Governor General, and they were to be appointed only for one year, and were to have no salary, although their expenses would be paid. Every element of independence as regarded these Members was taken away. The person going into office for twelve months knew who put him there, and he also knew who could exclude him when his term of office had expired. The only element of independence was that there was no salary attached to the office, and there being no inducement of a pecuniary nature for retaining office, the man might snap his finger at the Governor General, and say, "I do not care whether you appoint me for another year or not—I get nothing by it." It appeared to him that nothing could be arranged more cleverly for making it a difficult matter to get good and efficient Members, and when they had got them to keep them. He was not prepared to go the length of saying that those Members should retain office for five years, but he thought three years was the shortest term for which they should be appointed.—As the clause at present stood there was no inducement to those Members to do that which they wanted them to do—namely, to exercise their own honest faculties for the good of the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to the proposed alteration, for by adhering to the clause in its present shape he would go far to mar the constitution of this Council.

MR. TORRENS observed that Lord Canning had recommended that non-official Members should be appointed for two years.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he concurred with the hon. Gentleman opposite and the hon. Member for Birmingham in the objection they had taken to the term of one year, because he could not but feel that gentlemen who were only placed in office for one year would to a great extent be under the control of the Governor General. If they were to show an independence which was distasteful to him he would naturally be disposed to exercise the power which was vested in him—of appointing some one else at the end of the year. He should, therefore, support the Amendment, with the alteration proposed in it by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

LORD STANLEY said, that three things were required in a member of any legislative body—imdependence, experience, and zeal and interest in the public service. Under this clause none of these qualifications would be obtained. Who would take a seat in that House for only twelve months? If they wanted Europeans, men of wealth and position, to give up their occupations and devote themselves to the transaction of public business they must hold out to them some better prospect than that of a year's seat in this Council, with the chance of the almost ignominy of a removal at the end of that period. It was also worth considering whether the Government might not find it in practice more difficult to get rid of a member of Council appointed for this short period than they would do if the appointment was extended. If the members were appointed for only one year it would probably become the practice to re-appoint them, and their removal, except on the ground of some obvious disqualification would be invidious, while if they sat for five, four, or three years it would be understood that they had no claim to be appointed again.

MR. ADAM said, he agreed that European members of the Council ought to be appointed for three or five years. But the period of one year had been fixed in order to enable the Governor General, when up the country, to call into his Council any Native princes or ministers of the State in which he might be, whose advice he might think it desirable to take. It would be inconvenient to require the services of such persons for more than a year.

LORD STANLEY said, that although appointed for a longer period, they might resign at the end of a year.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, there could not be the slightest doubt that the clause involved a very difficult question. It had been founded on an opinion of Earl Canning, who had written—

“Two things are essential in forming a body of advisers for the Governor General; one, that it should be capable of being assembled for business at other places than Calcutta. . . . To secure, therefore, those who are not ex officio members of the Council, the appointment should be for a short term—certainly not longer than two years, and I think a single year would be better.”

Let hon. Gentlemen consider what would in all probability be the course of proceeding. The object was to give the Governor General, in his Legislative Council, the best advice and assistance, and the most intelligent persons that could be got. The Governor General and his Executive Council would prepare the Bills, and have them laid before the Legislative Council, which would be summoned when a sufficient number of Bills were prepared. The European Members of Council would probably be great merchants or great planters in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, such men as the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce at Calcutta, or of the Planters' Association. It could not be expected that persons so engaged in business would sacrifice any very large portion of their time to the public service; and he was, therefore, afraid that if these appointments were made for so long a period as five or three years, many men who were well fitted to be members of this Council would be deterred from accepting seats in it. At the same time, they would, even if only appointed for a year, be perfectly independent, because they would receive no salary, and might resign directly if they thought that they were not properly treated. Then as to the Native Members of the Council, the Governor General contemplated holding the Councils elsewhere than in Calcutta, and it could not be expected that persons would attend them far away for more than one year. Lord Canning's object probably was to hold meetings of the Council at different places in different years, and to vary some of the persons summoned, according to the locality where the Council sat. He thought, therefore, it would create an obstacle to the obtaining of Natives if the appointments were for more than one year. He could quite understand a Native of the upper part of India being willing to take his place for a session at Agra, or any place in the upper part of India, but he did not think they would like to be employed for five years. He could not see there was any chance of their becoming dependent upon the Governor General, because they would receive no salary.

MR. BRIGHT said, that the right hon. Gentleman's notion of the Council was totally different from that which was passing in the minds of the Committee. He was hardly able to conceive the ludicrous position in which Earl Canning would be placed if the right hon. Gentleman's idea was carried out. At the beginning of the year he would have to publish a programme of where he would travel, and when he was appointing the Members for the next year he would appoint some men in Calcutta, then some gentlemen of position at Delhi, and others in the neighbourhood of Lahore. In fact, the Council would not be what the Committee understood they were about making. What the Governor General should do was to have his Council stationed at the seat of Government, and, when he travelled take the advice of the Oude talookdars and the Native gentlemen of the Punjab, as, no doubt, he had been taking it during his late progress. That would be better most certainly than bringing men from their towns and changing them every year. It appeared to him to be a most preposterous proposition. Either the right hon. Gentleman must have entirely mistaken Earl Canning's views with regard to it, or they were both at variance with the views of the House in requesting the Council. The plan would, he believed, be most undesirable, and would be fatal to the working of the Bill. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might go too far in his deference to Earl Canning. He (Mr. Bright) had deferred to him in some matters; but, in regard to this proposal, he thought the Committee was quite as competent as Earl Canning to form an opinion; and he was satisfied the opinion of the Committee was adverse to the right hon. Gentleman, and in favour of three years instead of two or one.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it seemed to him that the plan suggested by Lord Canning was the only way of securing the assistance of the Natives. The Committee had decided that it was most desirable to have Natives Members taking their part, and voting in the Council, and not merely, as in Native States, to express an opinion in durbar. He agreed that the Councils should seldom be moved from Calcutta; but the Governor General did contemplate its meeting sometimes at Delhi or Lahore. The Governor General knew when he was going to make a tour in the provinces, and he could without difficulty arrange to have the Councils held in accordance with these arrangements. But he thought to extend the time of service would be practically to exclude the Natives from serving on the Councils.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the right hon. Baronet seemed to contemplate that the Governor General, when he travelled through the Northern Provinces, would take his Council with him; but that had never been the practice, the Council having always been kept at Calcutta. He agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham that the Council of India ought to be a stationary body.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that if the Members of the Council were appointed only for one year, they would become completely subservient to the Governor General, because, if they took a view different from him or his Government, their services could be easily dispensed with at the end of that period. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the appointments being for three years. It was true it might be desirable to prevent the new Council from being as troublesome as the old one; but, on the other hand, if the Natives were summoned only for twelve months, the Council would be a sham. He could not help thinking that as great care had been taken to limit the action of the Council, and to secure a large majority for the Government, the period of a Member's appointment might be sufficiently extended to guarantee his independence. He did not see how an effective Council could be got if it were nominated for a less period than three years.

MR. CAYLEY said, that on Indian matters he had some weakness for the opinions of the hon. Member for Birmingham. However, on this occasion, he thought there was more reason in what was said on the other side, founded as it was, on the opinion, not only of the Governor General but also of the Council, and he thought the Committee would act unwisely in setting its opinion against the unanimous decisions of so many high authorities.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that the peripatetic character of the Council was objected to, but it might be so arranged that the non-official members should be summoned only as long as it was sitting at Calcutta. It was desirable that the Natives should be called in to the assistance of the Governor General, not merely for what their opinion was worth, but to invest them with the dignity attaching to legislators.

MR. AYRTON said, the House, forgetting that every written constitution ended in a revolution, had tried its hand two or three times in the last thirty years, and all their attempts had broken down. They were now about to frame a new constitution more precise and complex than its predecessors, without providing any means for bringing the legislative body into harmony with the executive authority. Instead of making the Governor General the true representative of the Queen, they had conferred upon him no power by the exercise of which he might allow or disallow the acts of the legislative councils.

MR. LAYARD said, it appeared to him that the only objection made to the three years was that some Natives whom it was thought desirable should be Members, and who resided at a distance from the usual seat of the Council, would not like to be called on to serve for more than one year. But that difficulty could be easily got over by giving the Governor General, at any time he required the assistance of Natives from particular provinces, power to appoint two extraordinary Members when he visited those provinces accompanied by members of his Council.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he thought that if the Legislative Council was to do any good it must be stationary. Earl Canning seemed to think that he had found the Council troublesome for the last five years, but he contended that, looking at what they had done, the balance of good against evil was clearly in their favour. He did not believe that this Bill would be permanent if it were agreed to, and he should suggest that if the right hon. Gentleman could not agree to the Amendment, he should reconsider the clause.

LORD STANLEY said, he hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. Vansittart) would persevere with his Amendment. His hon. Friend would, perhaps, think it well to substitute "three" for "five" years, and then submitting the Amendment to the Committee in its amended shape.

MR. GREGSON said, it would be a good deal for men whose time was already fully occupied to give up even one year.

MR. W. EWART observed that in his opinion three years was the preferable period; for those who desired not to serve longer than one year could resign at the end of that term.

MR. VANSITTART said, he would adopt the suggestion of his noble Friend and substitute "three" for "five" years; but he would then make a stand and divide the Committee on his Amendment.

Amendment for making the "five" years was then, by leave, withdrawn; and one making it "three" substituted.

MR. BRIGHT said, he hoped it would not be necessary to divide upon the Amendment. It might be assumed that the Committee was against one year, and in favour of three; and if it was desirable to have the services of a large proprietor or a rajah in the upper country, when the Governor General was on his travels, nothing would be easier in such a case than to give the Governor General power to appoint two or three extraordinary Members of Council. It would be most unfortunate if they destroyed the work of the Council at Calcutta for some doubtful or visionary advantage of catching a wise man at some distance from Calcutta.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought that the intention of Earl Canning might be gathered from his despatches. He was very unwilling to go beyond the period suggested by the Governor General, but he would so far give way to the opinions which had been expressed by the Committee as to take the longest period named by him, and would, therefore, substitute two years for one.

The Amendment was then negatived, and the period of two years was substituted for one.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also Clauses 12 to 17 inclusive.

Clause 18 (Business to be transacted at Meetings).

MR. BRIGHT asked, whether Members would have power to move for Returns?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that they would, if the Motion related to business before the Council.

MR. BRIGHT said, he regretted that this and the three following clauses had been inserted in the Bill, as they would tend to cripple the actions of the Council.

COLONEL SYKES concurred in that opinion, and said that the effect of the clause would be to deprive the Council of all power.

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that the clauses were passed with due regard to the facilitating of public business in the Council.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 (Governor General to make rules for Conduct of Business at Meetings).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that it was contemplated that an official Report should be published of the proceedings of the Council; but it was of great importance that independent Reports should be published from day to day. Earl Canning appeared to contemplate that the proceedings should be as in Committee; and published only after all was over.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that Lord Canning in his despatches, which were in the hands of hon. Members, had very clearly expressed his views on this subject. Lord Canning thought that open debate ought to be the rule, but in certain cases, as when the Council met in the Punjab or Oude, where the Natives did not understand English, the Reports, unless some precautions were taken, would give the arguments only on one side. In such cases there would be frequent official Reports of the proceedings.

MR. BRIGHT said, he did not think the Governor General was likely to put in his Council men who could not speak English, and he could inform the right hon. Gentleman that he had never heard an Englishman speak English so perfectly as one of the Natives of India whom he had known. The question really was whether the Governor General in Council should make rules for the conduct of business of the Legislative Council, or whether the Legislative Council should make rules for itself. In the former case there would be no security for free discussion. Unless Earl Canning was more liberal than he was suspected to be the Council would have no power of debate whatever—no power to do anything without the permission of the Governor General. If he had had the drawing of the clause he should have substituted words to this effect:—"Rules and orders for the conduct of business at meeting of Council for the purpose of making laws and regulations shall be made by the Council, and may be subsequently amended by the Council if it shall see fit; and such rules shall provide the mode of promulgation and authentication of such laws and regulations; and the meetings of Council for the purpose of making such laws and regulations shall be open to the public as heretofore, at the discretion of the Council."

He thought it right that legislative assemblies should have the right to close their doors on special occasions. The House of Commons possessed that right, although they had not exercised it for many years. But he thought that if the right hon. Secretary of State would follow Earl Canning's suggestions in a more liberal spirit, remembering that his Lordship had drawn up the Bill with the intention of giving an apparent freedom, and at the same time giving as little of it as possible, the result would be better for India as well as for this country.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he must remind the Committee that they were dealing with edged tools in legislating for the Native population of India. It had happened before now that the minds of the Natives had been inflamed to a great extent by incorrect and garbled reports of speeches. It would be much safer to leave it to the Governor General to decide to what extent publicity should be given to these debates. If the practice in this country were modified it would only be so far as to insure an authentic report of the speeches.

MR. W. EWART said, he had put down a notice on the paper to move the admission of the public and the press at the meetings of the Councils. He would not propose his Motion, but he trusted that the Governor General of India would not lose sight of the advantages of publicity, which would be one of the most valuable inheritances we could give to India.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he would beg to remind the Committee that Earl Canning himself admitted that publicity ought to be the rule, and that it was necessary for the Government occasionally to interfere to prevent the publication of one-sided reports. He thought the Bill went as far as the Committee could expect.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he wished to know whether it was intended that the Reports of the proceeding in Council should only be published after the lapse of some time? If so, what took place would be sure to ooze out, and those who desired to give an incorrect account of the proceedings would, of course, resort to misrepresentation. To prevent that the best way was to have the fullest publicity. It was said that the Native gentlemen in the North were not able to speak English, and, consequently, could not take part in the debates; but why should not the same course be followed as was pursued in Canada, where two languages were spoken, and where each speaker expressed his opinions in his own language? However, he believed that in the greater part of India there would not be very many Native gentlemen among those chosen to sit in the Council who would be unable to speak or understand English. For these reasons he should be ready to propose the postponement of the clause until some other provision were produced more in accordance with the general feeling of the House.

MR. LAYARD said, that he was disposed to agree that incorrect reports might be injurious; but would it not be possible that authentic and official reports should be forwarded day by day to the papers? No doubt the great object of publicity was that the Natives should have an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon measures which were passing through the Council. It could be of no avail that they should only be able to express themselves after the measures had become law.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought nobody would say that the House should, by Act of Parliament, enact whether the proceedings of the Council should be published every day or not. All he could say was, that he had endeavoured to state to the Committee what was the opinion of the Governor General on the subject. It was certainly to the effect that publicity was to be the rule; but that with regard to the proceedings of the Councils of the Governor General of the north-west provinces and of the Punjab, in which Natives from the upper provinces of India, not understanding the English language would probably sit, the rule should be modified to a certain extent. He did not draw the inference therefrom that it was meant that the report should only appear after a long delay, for the Governor General thought it desirable that there should be frequent authorized reports of the proceedings, in order that the Natives might not be misled by incorrect representations. The other day Sir Barnes Peacock expressed a doubt in Council as to the validity of the legal title by which all those Native chiefs to whom grants of land had been made held their lands. That expression of opinion had given rise to much alarm, and it was an instance of the danger which might arise from a too free publication of everything which might, perhaps indiscreetly, be let fall in debate.

MR. J. B. SMITH observed, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India, on introducing the Bill, quoted a letter from Mr. Laing, in which that gentleman stated that great advantages had accrued from the open discussions in the Legislative Councils. If the debates were published at all, they should, in his opinion, be published from day to day, and he should remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India that there was a Native press existing in that country which discussed with great ability the questions which came before the Legislature. They had, he might add, sometimes erred in their legislation for India, because they were not thoroughly acquainted with Native opinion; and the best way, he should contend, to obtain that opinion was by making public the debates in the proposed Council in the mode which he suggested. Entertaining those views, he hoped the hon. Member for Birmingham would persevere in his Motion, and could not refrain from expressing a wish that the right hon. Secretary for India would withdraw the clause under discussion, and reconsider it.

MR. BRIGHT maintained that if Earl Canning were to place on the Council Natives who could neither speak nor understand English, he would be departing from the objects of the Bill and the intentions of the House of Commons. He might further observe that he had no desire to appear to oppose the right hon. Gentleman in the efforts which he believed he was honestly making to improve the government of India, while he at the same time hoped that he would consent to reconsider the clause under the notice of the Committee, with the view of mitigating its stringency. Should he not take that course, there still could be little doubt that the privilege which was contended for would ultimately become an accomplished fact; and there could, therefore, be no valid objection to rendering the clause more liberal, so that when the Council met they should not be fighting against the Governor General, as would certainly be the case if they were men animated by feelings of independence and self-respect, and if they were not it would be better there should be no Council at all.

MR. LAYARD said, he did not think the time had yet come when a knowledge of English should become an absolute qualification for the Council. There were many very intelligent Natives who could neither speak nor understand English.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Birmingham should throw difficulties in the way of the admission of Natives to the Council. It would be highly inexpedient that rules should be laid down in this country prescribing the standing orders for the conduct of business in the Councils in India.

MR. LAYARD suggested that objections would be met by providing that the necessary rules and regulations should be framed by the Council and submitted to the Governor General for his approval.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not think that would be the best mode of proceeding.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to postpone the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion, so as to press it to a division.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was unable to see that any advantage would be obtained by postponement.

MR. BRIGHT said, he looked upon the arrangement proposed by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) as one which would be, to some extent, satisfactory.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 20 to 26.

Clause 27 (Power of making temporary Appointment of Members of Council by Governor General or Governor of a Presidency).

MR. VANSITTART inquired whether any provision would be made for Mr. Harrington, Mr. Erskine, and Mr. Forbes? Mr. Harrington was the author of the financial proposals which Mr. Laing had adopted.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that with respect to the case of Mr. Harrington and others it was a subject under consideration.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 28 and 29.

Clause 30 (Additional Members to be appointed for one year),

MR. VANSITTART said, he would propose, as an Amendment, that the appointments should be made for five years. The local councils would be stationary, and, therefore, in a very different position to that of the general Council. His object was to induce the non-official Members of the Councils to take an interest in them, and also to infuse a little independence into the Councils themselves.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 29, to leave out the words "one year," and insert "three years."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was willing that the appointments should be made for two years, instead of one year.

MR. VANSITTART said, he could not accept two years, but he would be content with three, and altered his Amendment accordingly.

COLONEL SYKES said, he considered that the period of office should be three years at least.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that the suggestion of Earl Canning, that the period of office should be one year, was solely applicable to the general Council.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he thought it was a pity that the Members of the Council should not go out one or two at a time instead of all going out together.

MR. BRIGHT observed that when they were discussing a similar question in regard to the Calcutta Council, the right hon. Gentleman's opinion went with the Committee, that two years were better than one, and the only reason why he did not consent to the appeals made to him in favour of the alteration was that he did not wish to depart from the law laid down by Earl Canning, but he had consented to take the maximum that Earl Canning proposed. But the argument of Earl Canning did not apply to those local Councils, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman was quite free to adopt the term of three years. He did not speak of this as a matter of paramount importance, but, seeing how many had expressed an opinion in favour of a longer term with regard to the general Council, and the right hon. Gentleman had carried his views without a division, he thought the three years might be conceded for the local Councils.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he could not see why the period should be limited at all.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that Lord Canning was of opinion that persons would be more anxious to give their services for a year than they would be if they were asked to serve for a longer period, and they would be, consequently, more likely to obtain the services of eligible persons. That was no reason, however, why they should not be appointed year by year for the term of their natural lives. He was inclined to think that it was the wisest course to adhere to the period he had fixed upon.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that members appointed for three years would be more independent than if they were only appointed for one year. If they did not wish to serve for a longer period than a year there was nothing to prevent them from resigning.

Question, "That 'one year' stand part of the Clause." Put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the blank be filled up with 'three years.'"

The Committee divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 66: Majority 6.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 31 to 36 inclusive.

Clause 38 (Business to be transacted at Meetings of Local Councils).

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to know what was meant by the words at the end of the clause, "affecting the public revenue of the Presidencies?"

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, what was meant was that no financial measure should be introduced without the sanction of the Governor General.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman meant that no member should be able to propose a resolution on the question of revenue as they could in that House? Any Member of that House could give notice that on a certain day he would move that the House should go into Committee to take a certain thing into consideration. Was that privilege to be allowed in India?

SIR CHARLES WOOD was understood to say that the effect in India would be precisely the same as in this country.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 38 to 42.

Clause 43 (Governor of Presidency, except with sanction of Governor General, not to make or take into consideration certain laws or regulations).

In reply to Mr. W. E. FORSTER,

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the local Councils would be competent to deal with internal improvements or any other subjects of purely local concern, but questions of general policy must, of course, be reserved for a higher authority. It certainly was not intended to exclude railways from the operation of this clause.

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR asked whether, supposing the Legislative Council of all India should propose to put on an income tax the local Council would be able to take that tax into consideration?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: No.

Mr. BRIGHT: And, therefore, if in any one of the provinces it was found that some tax was working very perniciously, much more so than others, I presume the local Council would not have power to meet to pass any resolution about it, or to make any representation with regard to it to the Legislative Council of Calcutta, without the consent of the Governor General? The effect of that will be to circumscribe the action of the local Councils very much.

Lord STANLEY said, he should be glad to know what class of subjects would come within the province of the local Councils to deal with, as almost every matter of public importance would fall within one or other of the categories included in the clause.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the measures that were set out, and which it would not be competent for the local Councils to deal with, were almost exclusively measures that must necessarily extend beyond the limits of the presidencies. Let them take, for instance, the conveyance of the post-office or the electric telegraph, the general code of India, and the naval and military forces of the Crown. All these were matters to be dealt with by the central authority, and not by the local Councils. Then, again, as to their relations with foreign powers, no person would say that was a question which the local governments should have the power to deal with.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he might mention for the information of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) that the local Councils would have the power of granting acts to corporations for local purposes, such as the power to raise local rates and tolls to effect improvements. There were various other subjects which would come within the scope of the local governments.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining clauses.

SIR CHARLES WOOD moved a new clause, consequential upon clause 50, providing for the temporary discharge of the duties of the Governor General in the event of a vacancy occurring.

Clause agreed to and added to the Bill.
House resumed;

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR CHARLES WOOD proposed that the House should go into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. BRIGHT said, he and many other Members had been in the House for seven hours attending to the first Bill, and they were really now completely exhausted. As for the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) himself, he must have an insatiable appetite for work if he wished at that late hour (half-past eleven o'clock) to proceed with an important measure of that kind. For himself, he (Mr. Bright) was not hostile to the Bill, but if the Motion was persisted in for going into Committee he must go away, in justice to his own powers of human endurance.

SIR CHARLES WOOD observed that they must proceed with some business, and as all the hon. Members who took an interest in Indian affairs were present, he thought it was a good opportunity for proceeding with the Bill.

Mr. VANSITTART said, he objected to going on with an important Bill like that at that hour. He and other Members had been in the House since five o'clock and were exhausted, and the right hon. Baronet looked most exhausted of all.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that he thought that as all those who took an interest in the subject were present the opportunity should not be lost.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he considered the Bill more important than the last, and he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee," instead thereof.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he thought there was ample time left for the discussion of the Bill, on which he believed there were not many Amendments.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, they had already been engaged for seven hours in the discussion of Indian questions, and he thought they ought to adjourn the consideration of the Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he also must urge postponement, on the ground that the Bill seriously increased the patronage of the Crown in India and reflected on the status and position of the Civil Service in India.

LORD STANLEY said, he would remind his right hon. Friend that when a number of Members wished a Bill to be postponed there was little use in the Government urging it forward. As to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Cork to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, he had made the same proposition with regard to the previous Bill, and substantially, if not in form, that Motion was adopted, for he believed the Members who attended the discussion were not more than would have attended a Select Committee.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, as it appeared to be the general wish of the House, he would postpone the Bill until the next day, when he would state for what day he would fix it.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 16 and 17 agreed to.

Clause 18 (Case of Child chargeable to Parish),

MR. BARROW said, he objected to it on the ground that it deprived the guardians of their proper control over the children entrusted to them, and threw upon parishes additional expense. It would also give to a single magistrate power to determine that which whole benches of magistrates had been unable to determine—the very power which a few years ago caused the alteration of the poor law.

MR. HENLEY said, the clause as framed was wholly unintelligible, and he should like to hear the interpretation of the Secretary of State of it. If, as appeared to be the case from the clause, the child was to be made chargeable on the parish from which he was sent to the school, all he could say was that a great injustice was done to the parish.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was prepared to admit that a difficult question as to chargeability might arise under the clause; but then the object was plain that so long as the child continued a burden on the parish the payment in the first place being taken from the Treasury would ultimately be taken from the parish.

MR. HENLEY asked, whether the Secretary of State meant, if a child entered a parish and was transferred to the industrial school, he was to be chargeable to the parish in which he was found?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that was the way, certainly, in which he understood it. If the Committee thought the power unreasonable as against the parish he should not insist upon it. It was a question between the public and the parish, and if the Committee thought the payment ought to be ultimately made by the public, he should not object.

MR. KENDALL said, he believed the interference with the control of the boards of guardians would destroy their zeal. They would be compelled to pay 5s. a week for the support of a child in the school who could be maintained out of it for 2s. 4½d.

MR. HENLEY said, that if there was to be a summary remedy given by a single magistrate it was only right to make the law clear.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was of opinion that the Amendment which had been introduced would enable the clause to work efficiently and well. He would, however, revise it, and if it were not then approved of he would consent to its being expunged.

MR. BARROW hoped the clause would be abandoned. It was, in his opinion, an abrogation of the entire poor law of the kingdom.

MR. HENLEY suggested that the clause should be negatived, and that the right hon. Gentleman should propose a new one upon the Report.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would do so.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, there appeared to be an understanding that though the clause was to be negatived its object was to be carried out in another manner.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there was no understanding further than his undertaking to bring up another clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was useless to legislate until the Report of the

Mr. Kinnaird

Committee which was inquiring on this question had been presented.

MR. LIDDELL said, the guardians had not performed their duty towards the children of the poor, and the House in considering the question ought not to be met by the obstinate guardian interest.

MR. HENLEY said, he must protest against the assertion that the guardians, for the sake of protecting the ratepayers' pockets, neglected the children who became chargeable. It ought to be remembered that they had nothing to do with children who did not come to them for support—with the Arab children of the streets. He thought such sweeping denunciations uncalled for. The Committee had seen plenty of assertions on this subject, but very little fact, and he had called for a return of the children who had passed through the workhouse schools, so as to see what had become of them, and to get at the rights of the question.

MR. CAVE referred to Mr. Cumins's statements upon the Plymouth Workhouse Schools, and said the Report of the Royal Commissioners stated distinctly that the guardians did not fulfil their duty, and that a large majority of children brought up in workhouses turned out badly. He had no wish to make a sweeping charge against guardians who had a difficult duty to perform; but this was the statement of the Report, and he supposed it was carefully considered.

MR. HENLEY did not think Plymouth ought to be taken as a specimen of the towns of England.

COLONEL W. STUART said, that a return taken in a district in the midland counties, comprising many large towns, with a population of 1,500,000, showed that there were only thirty women in the workhouses on a particular day, who, having been educated in the workhouse schools, had returned to the workhouse in a degraded state.

Clause 18 struck out.

Clauses 19 to 26 agreed to.

Clauses 26 to 30 inclusive struck out.

Clause 31 agreed to.

Clause 32 struck out.

Clause 33 agreed to.

Clause 34 (Application of Act to existing Certified Schools),

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact, that in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis several of the existing schools had been made use of for the purpose of maintaining monasteries and nunneries. The monies granted for these institutions had been converted to the support of establishments which were absolutely illegal.

Clause postponed.

MR. BUXTON said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) he would move as an additional clause, that

"On the application of the parent, or of the managers, or of the guardians who may be liable to make any repayment as aforesaid on account of any child, any justices of the county in which the school is situate, if satisfied that a suitable employment in life has been provided for the child, or that there is otherwise sufficient cause, may discharge the child from the school before the full expiration of the period for which he has been sent there."

MR. CAVE thought the clause unnecessary. Under the present system, application was made to the Inspector of Schools for a Secretary of State's order for discharging a child, and the reply usually came by return of post.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Secretary of State would feel it his duty to discharge the child under the circumstances stated without the intervention of a justice of the peace.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH supported the clause.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday, 1st July.

SALMON AND TROUT FISHERIES BILL. SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BARROW said, he must object to proceeding with the measure at that late hour, and he should, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, if the House would agree to the second reading the Government would have no objection to remit the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the Bill would be greatly altered before the Select Committee. It was a great misfortune that it dealt with trout as well as salmon. Unless the Committee came to their relief, the Bill would impose upon magistrates the necessity of possessing a very minute knowledge of natural history; or when they came to carry out the Bill they would be very much puzzled by the definitions in it. Some fifty different things were described as "salmon," and it was stated that "trout" was to include all fish of the trout species not comprehended under the term "salmon." He thought also that the common law remedy against nuisances in rivers would be sufficient without the stringent provisions in the Bill. Considering that the boards to be appointed were to deal to a great extent with private property, he thought the proposed constituency, which was to include those who paid 5s. for a licence, rather a strong one, and that very arbitrary powers were vested in the boards. He also deemed it very hard that people should be taxed for leave to fish in any river where trout or salmon had once been seen, and objected strenuously to the payment out of the public funds of an unlimited number of inspectors, who would be always putting their noses into everybody's face and their hands in everybody's pocket. There were other objections he had to urge against the measure, and if they were not obviated by the treatment the Bill received from the hands of a Select Committee, to which he was glad to find it would be referred, he should advance them strenuously when the opportunity offered. But as they were all matters that could be dealt with in Committee he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he should vote for the second reading, but he thought that some further protection should be afforded to millowners.

COLONEL PENNANT said, that one of the clauses would seriously affect rights in tidal waters, however long they had existed; such rights, for instance, as that of putting fixed nets in streams. It would be a bad precedent to enact such a provision. The constitution of the fishery boards also might be extremely objectionable in certain cases, as interfering with the rights of persons having property in rivers.

Mr. BENTINCK said, he hoped the Select Committee would be composed of Members who had some knowledge of the subject.

Mr. CLIVE said, he agreed that there were exceptional cases which might be provided for specially. As to permanent nets, he thought they would be found to be almost all of recent introduction, and he doubted whether any prescription could be established in regard to many of them. Where there was prescription it might be specially dealt with. As to poisoning rivers, it was not the intention to deal hardly with those cases in which the evil had resulted from manufactures. As to the right of the bailiffs to go upon the adjoining land, he thought that was necessary to prevent the fish from being unfairly dealt with.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed to a Select Committee.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD ENLARGEMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD CLARENCE PAGET stated that he believed there was no opposition to the Bill on the part of Chatham. He had, however, received a communication that the Corporation of London proposed to put in a saving clause with the view of preserving the corporation rights. He did not believe the Bill would interfere in any way with those rights. But he could not agree to insert the saving clause in the Bill that night until he had had an opportunity of consulting the legal adviser of the Admiralty.

Mr. HENLEY said, that under those circumstances it would be far better to postpone the Committee on the Bill.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he proposed to pass all the clauses but one, so that it would be competent for the Committee hereafter to introduce the clause into the Bill if it should be thought necessary.

Clauses 1 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that four Bills on the subject, which had passed the Commons, should be read a first time, and congratulated the House on their progress.

LORD BROUGHAM heartily joined in the congratulations of the Lord Chancellor. His hopes were now sanguine that we should at length have a digest of at least the criminal law, and it had been, hitherto, almost impossible not to despair. For many years he had laboured strenuously to obtain this great benefit to our jurisprudence and to the country. Above twelve years ago he had so far succeeded that the Commissioners, whom when in office he had appointed, having reported the heads of a Bill he had framed, a digest of which was fully discussed in a Select Committee; and another digest had been afterwards prepared by him from the report of the learned and experienced Commissioners, and afterwards examined by a Select Committee, with the assistance of experienced and skilful practitioners. We had the invaluable assistance, also, of Members of this House, not law Lords, of whom one might be named, as he was not now present, Lord Overstone, whose high commercial station, and whose great weight, arising from his position, but still more his eminent sagacity and acuteness was of incalculable value in the inquiry. But, when all was prepared and reported to the House, it was found utterly hopeless to have the other House's adoption of it. If that House, with all its magistrates and lawyers, were to discuss three or four hundred clauses of a digest, whose only purpose was the consolidation of the law and not its alteration, it was absolutely impossible that it should be carried. There was but one way of having such digest, if you really desire to have one. As Lord Lyndhurst had observed, either you wish for a digest or you do not. If you will not commit the preparing it to men in whom you can confide, but are resolved to have each word discussed in the Commons, confess at once that you do not want to have a digest. Only consider how the discussion must go on. The magistrates are a most valuable body of men; they perform inestimable service to the country with the utmost integrity, the most exemplary diligence, and fair ability. But they are not made for discussing the phraseology of Acts of Parliament. The bare idea of two or three hundred clauses, discussed clause by clause, in a House having half a hundred county justices, twenty or thirty town magistrates, and many more country gentlemen, whose solicitors, or whose sons preparing for the Bar, set them on and furnish them with objections to every other word of the digest, was enough to make the least somnolent slumber, and turn the steadiest head. There is but one way of obtaining what we all want, and that is to delegate the details to skilful and trustworthy persons, and to adopt the result of their labours. The Commons, happily, have at length admitted this truth in passing the Bills sent down from this House, and he rejoiced so heartily in the prospect afforded, that he no longer regretted the long years of labour which he had bestowed on it, and till now without hopes of the public or the law reaping any fruit from his toil.

THE INDIAN NAVY.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH rose to put a Question to the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty on the subject of the Indian Navy. Having read a passage from the speech of Mr. Laing proposing a reduction of the Indian Navy, the noble Earl said that from this speech he was afraid Mr. Laing was not aware of the original purpose for which this navy was established. It never was intended to place it in a position to contend with any European Power, for everybody knew that in any such contingency a naval force would be sent out from this country. It was created for local purposes only—for putting down piracy, transporting troops and treasure, and other duties which Her Majesty's ships were in the habit of performing in times of peace. So far back as thirty years ago he had calculated that a reduction might be made in the expenses of the Indian Navy by the employment of Her Majesty's ships for these purposes—he calculated the saving by such a change at something like £100,000 a year; but he had always contemplated that the Indian Government should pay for the European force, which might be employed on their requisition by Her Majesty's Government, and that that force should be as much at its disposal as the purely local force. The difficulty was, however, that the Admiralty always reserved to themselves the absolute command of every force which they despatched to any part of the world, and would not delegate it to the Indian Government on any other authority. If the Government of 1846, when he was at the head of the Admiralty, had lasted for a longer period he had no doubt that an arrangement would have been made; but it was brought to a sudden termination, and there had been no opportunity since of renewing the discussion of the matter. He wished to know who was to pay for the naval force to be substituted for that now employed in India. If the Indian Government were to pay for it the reduction of expenditure contemplated by Mr. Laing could hardly be maintained, and if this country were called upon to pay for an additional naval force to supply the place of these ships this would seriously interfere with the surplus anticipated by Mr. Gladstone. As the Indian Navy was doomed he could not help saying a word in its favour. It was originally called the Bombay Marine, and had performed very considerable service on many occasions. In the first war with Ava it performed considerable service; and the first steamer ever employed in war was a steamer belonging to the East India Company. Again, in the China war of 1839, the first iron steamers were employed in that war and were manned by crews in the service of the Company; and it was only due to the Indian Navy to say that it had done good service whenever it had been called upon. If the proposed arrangement were carried out, he hoped the noble Duke, the first Lord of the Admiralty, would take into consideration the expediency of establishing a Native force of Arab marines under the command of local officers speaking their language. To every one of Her Majesty's ships sent for service in the Indian seas a small body of these marines ought invariably to be attached, or, otherwise, these vessels would often have no means whatever of communicating with the shore. What he desired to know was what arrangement had been made for the purpose of placing at the disposal of the Indian Government a sufficient force of Her Majesty's ships to supply the place of the Indian Navy, and whether the expense would fall upon the Indian or the English Treasury?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the question put to him was one of great importance, and had occupied considerable attention on the part of Her Majesty's Government; but they had not yet come to any absolute conclusion upon it. With regard to the financial part of the scheme, he believed the Indian Government had taken sufficient funds for this year amply to provide for such naval service as they required, the amount of the service being very much reduced as compared with previous years. A question which had a further financial bearing was whether the Indian Navy should be entirely abolished, or whether a certain proportion of vessels should still be retained for river service and coasting communication, in the event of the further naval defence of India being intrusted to Her Majesty's Navy. This was a view which had been favourably considered by the Government; but up to the present time his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) had come to no definite conclusion. If the British Government were to take upon themselves additional expenditure on account of the naval requirements of India, of course it would be but fair to this country that the Indian Exchequer should, to some extent, contribute to that expenditure. That question had not yet been fully considered, nor whether the Indian Navy should be entirely abolished, or some portion of it retained. Probably a portion of the smaller vessels of the Indian Navy would be retained. From all he had heard of this navy, he believed it had always done its duty, and he fully admitted that its services ought to be duly remembered by the House.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had heard with great satisfaction the opinion of Her Majesty's Government in favour of retaining the smaller vessels. As to retaining the larger vessels, he would say that if they were retained they would be found valuable in the case of any sudden emergency, because on the breaking out of a war in India before the news arrived in England the Indian fleet might be in action.

PRIVATE BILLS—STANDING ORDERS.

STANDING ORDER No. 185.

LORD REDESDALE moved, that the Standing Order No. 185 (formerly 223) be considered, in order to its being amended in the following manner:—After paragraph 2, to insert—

"8. That no Provision authorizing any Company to raise Money or to subscribe towards or to guarantee any Money in the Undertaking of another Company, shall be introduced into any Bill which is not brought in by the Company thereby authorized to raise Money or to subscribe or to guarantee."

It had been said that such a provision would interfere with the establishment of branch railways; but he maintained that there would be no such interference in the case of lines which were really required. Such branch lines were frequently got up without first obtaining proper support from the companies of the main line itself. The effect of the adoption of the Amendment to the Standing Order would be that the promoters of small railway schemes must, in the first place, go to the Company from whom they expected to receive assistance, and who would then consider it, and see if fair exertions had been used to obtain that independent support of the line which it was right that it should receive. And having been satisfied that that had been the case, and that they had failed, they themselves would then bring in the Bill. He had been in communication with several Chairmen of Committees of the House of Commons upon the subject, who generally approved of the Amendment. They agreed that some legislation was required to check the practice of forming small branch line companies without independent capital, and only in the expectation of obtaining the necessary funds from the Company of the main line; and one of these Gentlemen mentioned that in the course of the present Session a railway Bill came before him for the construction of a branch line, which was estimated to cost £400,000. It turned out that in that case, although only £3,300 had been paid up on calls, the sum deposited under the Standing Orders was £37,000. From what fund it was supplied, however, did not appear; but it came out in the course of the inquiry that the whole of the remainder of the capital, upwards of £300,000, was to be raised by the London and North-Western Railway Company.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that his experience of branch lines was that they were usually projected by the residents in particular districts upon their finding that it was almost intolerable to be left without railway communication. They then exerted themselves to get up subscriptions for the purpose, and very naturally went to the railway company whose line they proposed to join, and with whom the first and main consideration was whether there was any other competing line to which the traffic of the district could go if they did not secure it for themselves. If they found that the traffic could not go upon any line but their own, then they would be in no hurry whatever to assist the new branch line. They would consequently turn their attention to other cases where they feared competition more, and to the district in which they were most exposed to competition, not to that which required a railway most, they would apply their resources. He took quite a different view of the subject from the noble Lord. His opinion was, and it was fortified by his experience throughout the United Kingdom and the Continent of Europe, that the wonderful advantage of these instruments in the development of wealth had been proved to such a degree that to encourage the construction of lines in districts which were not at present provided with railways was alike consistent with reason and sound sense. In Ireland the country might be said to be divided between two great companies; and it was notorious in the cases of small branch lines that the only question was in which district would they run? If a company found that a district was bound to them it had small chance of being assisted to form a branch line; or that the line ran into their rival's district, of course they would have nothing to do with it; whilst no assistance was to be obtained from the other. He had been assured by several friends in Great Britain that they were very similarly circumstanced; and that the assistance which they were able to get from the great companies mainly depended upon whether they had any chance of rivalry or opposition from other quarters. He was, therefore, very averse to adding another impediment and difficulty in the way of the formation of these branch lines. He had never heard of any branch line doing much mischief, and very few had been given up. The great companies would always take care not to lend their money too hastily; and he did not see why agricultural districts that were without commercial wealth should not have fair facilities offered them for developing their resources. The Amendment to the Order would add to the expense and difficulty of obtaining such branch lines.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not think the object of the noble Earl would be attained by the Amendment to the Standing Order. There were few great railway companies that had not made arrangements of this kind; and, should the Standing Order be amended as proposed, he feared it would deter those companies from promoting the construction of branch lines that were essential to the completion of the railway system of the country. He thought it was the duty of Parliament to simplify as much as possible the complicated system of railway legislation, and diminish its expense. But it was quite clear that the Amendment would augment the expense. Any change had better be made by some general Order in which both Houses could concur; and being unwilling to take the responsibility of the proposed change by this House only, he should oppose the Amendment.

LORD LIFFORD concurred in the remarks which had fallen from the noble Marquess. The effect of the Amendment of the Standing Order would be to protect one great interest in the country, and that was the interest of the law, by increasing the expense of railway Bills and promoting litigation; and he trusted that the noble Marquess's argument would induce his noble Friend to withdraw his proposal.

LORD PORTMAN also opposed the Motion, the adoption of which, he contended, would throw immense difficulties in the way of small railway lines, which could only be constructed by the assistance of the larger companies.

LORD REDESDALE held that the Amendment would have the effect of putting all parties on a just and proper footing, in regard alike to themselves, the public, and Parliament. He granted that without the assistance of the larger companies many smaller schemes could not be carried out, and he did not object to that assistance being supplied; but what he wanted was that it should be given in a proper form. His Motion would ensure prudence in the action of the parties at the first starting of the scheme; whereas at present more than half the schemes which came before Parliament had no foundation whatever.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY objected to the introduction of special legislation as regarded railways merely by the Resolution of one House of Parliament, and the establishment by one Standing Order of a general law applicable to all railways in which the House of Commons was not asked to concur. If legislation of this kind was required it should be provided by the joint action of both Houses, and by a general Order which would be applied by both Houses. He had another objection to the alteration—that it would necessitate the application to Parliament by both companies, the assisting and the assisted, and thus the inconvenience and expense would be greatly increased.

LORD TAUNTON said, he did not perceive the force of the noble Lord's objection, as if this House adopted the proposed Amendment it would be quite open to the other House. He thought there was great force in the argument of the noble Lord who had proposed the Amendment.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had the greatest possible respect for the opinion of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees, and agreed, moreover, in the general policy of his Motion. He could not, however, but think that the terms of the Resolution went beyond the necessity of the case. He would, therefore, suggest to his noble Friend whether his object would not be entirely answered if, instead of the Bill being introduced by the company proposing to advance the money, the Bill were not allowed to pass unless there were an undertaking—which might be inserted in the preamble—binding the company proposing to advance the money to fulfil that stipulation? It would perhaps be sufficient if the assisting company appeared before the Committee and signified its willingness to bind itself, and if its undertaking were then recited in the Bill.

EARL GREY thought that before the Bill was brought in the assent of the company intending to subscribe should be obtained. A Standing Order ought to be adopted requiring satisfactory proof to be given that the other company was willing to bind itself to advance the money.

LORD REDESDALE said, he would endeavour to modify his Resolution in accordance with the suggestion of his noble Friend, as he merely wished to carry the House with him as far as possible. At the same time he retained his opinion that unless the parties who were to advance the money were themselves either joint promoters of the Bill, or in some way concerned in it, the object in view could not be satisfactorily attained. He would, however, not press his Resolution at present, but take time to frame it in another shape.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING PUT OFF.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER (who was very imperfectly heard), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said the object of the measure was to remove a serious practical difficulty in the way of supplying additional spiritual instruction for populous districts. Under the Church Building Acts, when a new church was proposed to be erected notice was required to be given to the patron and the incumbent of the parish, in order that if they were willing to undertake the expense of providing more church accommodation they might have the priority in doing so. But in certain districts where there was an increasing population no patron and no incumbent had existed for centuries past. The right rev. Prelate was understood to state as an instance, that some four centuries ago an encroachment of the sea destroyed several parishes lying between Hastings and St. Leonard's, leaving a narrow slip of land between the sea and the steep cliffs which rose above. Of late years a great number of houses had been built here, occupied by a population of several thousand persons, and churches had been erected; but it had been found impossible, as the law now stood, to place the ministers of these churches in the full and proper relation in which they ought to stand towards those to whom they ministered. When he applied for an assignment of a district to these churches to the Church Building Commissioners, and afterwards to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to whom had subsequently been transferred the powers formerly possessed by the Church Building Commissioners, he was always asked, "Have you given notice to the patron? Have you given notice to the incumbent of the parish?" Why, ever since the parishes had been swept away by the irruption of the sea, leaving only these fragmentary slips of land, there had been no patron, there had been no incumbent. "Well," replied the Commissioners, "under the circumstances we can do nothing. We cannot assist you in accomplishing the praiseworthy object of placing the ministers of the different churches in a right position towards their congregations." The Bill which he now asked their Lordships to read a second time had no other object in view than to remedy this difficulty, and to enable the ecclesiastical Commissioners, in cases where there was neither patron nor incumbent in existence, to proceed as if the provisions of the Church Building Acts requiring notice to be given to the patron and incumbent had been complied with.

LORD PORTMAN thought the Bill was not so simple as the right rev. Prelate described it. It dealt, not with St. Leonard's only, but it went elsewhere. How could it be said that there was no patron? Why a man might start up any day and say,

"I am the patron." The specific instance proposed to be dealt with was that caused by the incursion of the sea at St. Leonard's but the Bill said, that wherever, by the encroachment of the sea or any other cause, there was no incumbent the consent of the incumbent should not be required. The Bill, therefore, interfered with the rights of the Crown and of private patrons without providing carefully for ascertaining who the persons entitled might be. Again, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were to be considered the patrons where there was no other patron; and all marriages celebrated in the churches affected by the Bill were to be deemed marriages in the parish church. The Bill required much consideration on the part of their Lordships before they agreed to a second reading.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not prepared to give advice with regard to this Bill. There were already so many Church Building Acts that if they were bound together they would make an unwieldy volume. He concurred with the noble Lord who had last spoken, that the Bill required careful consideration before the second reading was assented to.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE remarked that these churches were in a most novel and anomalous position; and it was most desirable to place the ministers on a proper footing in relation to their congregations.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER stated, that in framing the Bill he had obtained the assistance of a professional gentleman, who had had at least as many dealings with the Church Buildings Acts, and as much experience in drawing Bills, as any man in his profession; he meant Mr. Belenden Ker. He was quite willing to postpone the second reading, in order that their Lordships might have time to fully consider the subject.

Second Reading put off to Thursday next.

EAST INDIAN LOAN BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the necessity for the loan which it gave power to contract did not arise from any deficiency of income or excess of expenditure in India, but simply from the state of the cash balances in the home Treasury. Those who were acquainted with Indian matters would be aware that, speaking theoretically, there was no mode by which the Home Treasury could be supplied except by remittances from India; but, of late years, since the establishment of the railway system, the Indian railway companies had been accustomed to pay into the Home Treasury the sums necessary for the execution of their works, and money was advanced to them in India by the Indian Government; so that between the two there had always been balances in the Home Treasury which rendered actual remittances from India unnecessary. At the end of the financial year 1860 these balances amounted to £2,220,000; but, owing to short payments by the railway companies and the state of the money-market during the past year, at the end of the last financial year, the balances had fallen to a little less than £370,000. In addition to that, owing to the state of the cash balances in India, the Secretary of State had thought it advisable, in order that the railways now in the course of construction in India should not be stopped, to remit the sum of £1,000,000 sterling to India. The estimated amount of expenditure in England on Indian account for the current year was £9,500,000; the estimated expenditure on railways, £8,000,000, composed of £6,000,000 to be spent in India, and £2,000,000 at home; so that, if it were borne in mind that two sums expended for railway purposes in India was the only form in which a remittance to this country could be looked for, there would remain £3,500,000, at least, of home expenditure on Indian account to be provided for in this country. In order, therefore, to meet the demands which would thus be made on the Home Treasury his right hon. Friend found it necessary to apply to Parliament for authority to borrow the sum of £4,000,000 in this country, and to give him that authority was the object of this Bill.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL BILL.

REPORT.—ORDER DISCHARGED.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendment read.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that in consequence of the objections which had been raised against this measure in this House, and the still more powerful opposition which he understood would be raised in "another place," upon the ground that the Bill was objectionable in its form, inasmuch as it should have originated in the House of Commons, he did not propose to proceed with it further. He wished, however, to say a few words, arising from a remark of the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke), in reference to an appointment he had recently made to one of the livings. It would be satisfactory to their Lordships to know that that appointment had not been made for party or personal purposes. The circumstances were those. He had the appointment of a chaplain to one of the livings upon the Hospital property in the north of England; and he selected for the living a gentleman who had been chaplain in the service of the Admiralty on the Mediterranean and Black Sea stations. He was five years chaplain on board the Albion; and whilst he was there the ship's company was attacked most severely by small-pox and cholera, eighty men being carried off in a few days. This clergyman was, during this time, most assiduous in his attentions to the sick and dying. The ship's company's suffered in the attack on Sebastopol, the loss being eighty-seven men; and this same chaplain, on that occasion, assisted the surgeon to the utmost of his power. The surgeon and the paymaster were both wounded, and the chaplain continued to render assistance to the wounded sailors, and continued this assistance after he himself was slightly wounded. Having obtained a report to this effect from officers in command, he confessed he thought that the gentleman was very fit for the preferment; and he thought that their Lordships would see that he had been actuated by no other motive than zeal for the interests of the service. It would also be gratifying to their Lordships to know that since the gentleman had filled the living he had given the greatest satisfaction in the parish and was most popular in the neighbourhood.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he recollected that when a boy the great living of Symington was divided into six livings upon the understanding that they should be given to chaplains in the navy as a reward for services; the object being to enable the Admiralty to induce a more respectable class to enter the service. The noble Duke had done right in promoting this gentleman, and the only doubt he had was whether the noble Duke ought not to have relaxed the Order in Council in his favour, and made him a commander in the navy?

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE disclaimed having had any intention of imputing to the noble Duke that he had used the Hospital patronage for political purposes. What he said was that Greenwich Hospital had been used by all parties for political purposes, and he thought the opportunity had now arrived for doing that which would at once put an end to the possibility of doing the same sort of thing for the future. He thought that the property of the Hospital should be managed by an independent body of persons selected for that purpose by the Crown, and responsible to Parliament; whilst the internal management of the Hospital should be regulated by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and other officers.

EARL GREY understood the Bill would re-appear in this House at a very late period of the Session, when he should certainly not be present. He would now, therefore, express a hope that a more effectual remedy for the evils which were allowed to exist in the management of the Hospital would be applied than that which had been suggested. He could bear testimony to the fact that Greenwich Hospital used to be considered as one of the great interests in the county with which he was connected. It was one of the great objects of any candidate there to secure that interest, and on one occasion—in 1826—it had told powerfully against himself. For the last twenty-five years or more this influence had not been exerted on either side, but it was impossible not to admit that there was some danger of a revival of this influence at a future time. That danger would not, however, be averted by the plan proposed. At present all our public servants were subordinate to Ministers; who in their turn were responsible to Parliament. If this sound principle were departed from, and an independent authority like that suggested by the noble Earl were created, abuses of a far more dangerous description would spring up than existed under the present system. Ministers of the Crown were liable to answer to Parliament for any such abuses, but permanent servants of the public would be exempt from this control; it would be difficult to make them properly responsible to anybody; and jobbing and mismanagement, of which we had no experience, would ensue if Parliament created what was known in foreign countries as a bureaucratic. The proper mode of guarding against the evils anticipated was by selling the Greenwich Hospital property. He was persuaded that the public was an essentially bad owner of landed property. On a long series of years it was impossible that land could be well managed on behalf of the public, though it was quite true that for the last twenty-seven years the Greenwich Hospital estates had been admirably managed. On referring to the Report of the Commissioners he found Sir James Graham expressed a strong opinion that they were not likely to get another Receiver who would manage the affairs of the Hospital with equal success. By the sale of the property the Commissioners themselves stated there would be an immediate accession to the income of the Hospital; and, considering the advantage to the country of having this property held by residents instead of absentees, he hoped the noble Duke would consider the expediency of selling it. There could not be a more advantageous time for effecting a sale than the present. A considerable part of the estates of Greenwich Hospital was sold about twenty-eight or thirty years ago, just before the present Receiver was appointed. But it realized a most inadequate price. Now, however, if the present Receiver were authorized to take measures for selling the property, under the control of the Admiralty, there was an opportunity of realizing its true value, to the great benefit of the public; it would also provide a security against future abuses and evils. It seemed almost an absurdity that this property should be retained by a public body. Of the whole expenditure of the Hospital, only a small proportion, about £40,000 a year, was derived from this property. Considering the hopeless task of creating an authority to which the management of a property of this kind could be safely trusted, he hoped the Government would weigh the advantages to be derived from selling it.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the Bill on this subject would be introduced into the House of Commons, and he could only say that in the Amendments he should introduce it would be his earnest desire to meet the wishes of their Lordships.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH trusted that the Bill to come up from the other House would not contain words to the effect that any number of places might be created, at any amount of salary.

Order discharged; and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

INDIA (COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION)— EXCLUSION OF NATIVES FROM ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

PETITION—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD MONTEAGLE rose to present a Petition from certain British subjects—Parsons—Natives of India, complaining of their exclusion from the competitive examination required for appointments to office. He would also move for all Official Correspondence relating to their case. He said, the question he felt it his duty to bring under their Lordships' notice, not only stated a grievance of which the petitioners had the justest right to complain, but involved the still more important question of the obligations the Legislature of the United Kingdom had contracted in reference to British subjects in India, and of those obligations the Crown had more recently assumed on the transfer to the Sovereign, of the Government of the Indian Empire. This question included the civil rights and privileges of the Natives of India, and their eligibility to all official appointments under the Government. He did not wish to state the case of the petitioners without assuring the House that he brought it forward without any wish to express any reproach or imply any mistrust of the conduct of the present Governor General; he wished to speak of the conduct of Lord Canning, from his arrival in India to the present time, with all the respect that was so justly due to him, and more especially for the justice and sympathy he had manifested for the Natives. The Act of Parliament to which he first wished to call attention was that of 1833—the Charter Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85)—the 87th Clause of which statute enacted, that "No Native of India nor any natural-born subject of Great Britain, nor any natural-born subject resident therein, should, by reason only of his religion, place of birth, or colour, be disabled from holding place, office, or appointment under the East India Company."

The words of that clause had his entire concurrence. They were comprehensive; admitting of no doubt or exception. But he grieved to say that there was conclusive evidence to prove that, in practice by the construction given to the words he had read, they had been made subject to the most narrow and ungenerous limitation. What was the just meaning of the clause, and the intention of Parliament he would prove by referring to the authority of the statesmen by whom this Bill was prepared, or supported. At that time Mr. Charles Grant, now Lord Glenelg, was President of the Board of Control; Mr. Charles W. Wynn had been his predecessor; Lord Macaulay filled the office of Secretary for India; the Duke of Wellington, a great authority on all subjects, but especially on Indian affairs, was in the maturity of his power; the Marquess of Lansdowne had undertaken the charge of the India Bill, representing in this duty, the Government of the late Earl Grey. Those Statesmen all expressed their high approval of the 87th Clause, or, of the principle on which it rested. That clause had not been carelessly framed, or, surreptitiously introduced. It was carried unanimously, its object and its consequences having been first pointed out, and the special approval of Parliament, justly claimed and given to its authors and their supporters. Mr. Wynn, who had at that time quitted Earl Grey's Government, stated on the 10th of July—

"It is with great pleasure I have heard a declaration that all Natives of India, without regard to colour, descent, or religion, should be eligible to every office under the Government which their education might qualify them to fill." He went still further, declaring emphatically "That the only principle on which India could be justly or wisely administered was that of admitting the Natives to a participation in the Government, and allowing them to hold every office, the duties of which they were competent to discharge."

Lord Macaulay, on the same day, in one of the most powerful and finished of his orations, described the 87th Clause as "wise, benevolent, and noble, enacting that no Native of our Indian Empire shall, by reason of his descent, colour or religion, be incapable of holding office. To the last day of my life," he added, "I shall be proud of having been one of those who assisted in the framing of the Bill which contains that clause." He concluded by asking, "Do we think that we can give knowledge without awakening ambition; and do we mean to awaken ambition and to give it no legitimate vent?" The Duke of Wellington was somewhat more guarded, but without differing in principle. His words were—

"If there was one point on which all parties had agreed—and he made this assertion from a perusal of the evidence taken before the Committees which sat in both Houses—it was that the Natives of India should, as much as possible, be employed in the revenue and judicial establishments of the country. That point was again and again impressed on the attention of Ministers in the evidence of the last Session."

The organ of Earl Grey's Government, the Marquess of Lansdowne, was still more explicit in his statement of the facts, and in his exposition of the Bill, of which he moved the second reading—

"It was part of the new system which he had to propose, that to every office in India, every Native of whatever caste, sect, or religion, should be by law equally admissible; and he hoped the Government would seriously endeavour to give the fullest effect to this arrangement, which would be as beneficial to the people themselves as it would be advantageous to the economical reforms which were now in progress in different parts of India. The Natives," he continued, "are alive to the grievance of being excluded from a larger share in the Executive Government. They are at present only employed in subordinate situations in the revenue, judicial, and military departments. It is amply borne out by the evidence that such exclusion is not warranted on the score of incapacity for business, want of application, or of trustworthiness; while it is contended that their admission, under European control, into the higher offices would strengthen their attachment to British connection, and would conduce to the better administration of justice."

This evidence is conclusive with respect to the intentions of the framers of the Charter Act of 1833, and gives an unimpeachable commentary on the true meaning of that statute. The fundamental principle on which it rests never had a more decided support than from a noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) now in the House, and whose high abilities and eloquence have never been more brilliantly employed than upon Indian affairs in assisting and guiding the deliberations of Parliament. He observed in 1830, that

"Among the means of reducing expenditure was the very desirable one of reducing gradually the number of Europeans employed, and of bringing forward, though gradually and with extreme caution, the most deserving Natives by employing them in situations of higher authority and trust than they had hitherto been accustomed to fill."

The next period to which he would refer was 1853, when the renewal of the Charter again took place. While this latter Bill was in progress through the other House he (Lord Montagu) inquired, perhaps somewhat prematurely, of his noble Friend (Earl Granville) whether the principle of competition for the civil service would be extended to Natives of India. The conversation which took place in the House of Lords on the 13th June (Hansard's Debates, vol. cxxviii. p. 48) was irresistible in showing that the declarations made by the Government of Earl Grey in 1833 were repeated, adopted, and strengthened by their successors in the Cabinet of the Earl of Aberdeen twenty years subsequently; and of that Cabinet the leading persons in the present Administration were members. On that occasion he (Lord Montagu) raised the discussion as follows:—

"Lord Montagu: The question which he wished to ask the Government was this, Whether the principle of competition proposed to be applied to the Civil Service would be extended to Natives of India as well as to European-born subjects of the Crown? Supposing the case of a Native medical student, being the Queen's subject, born at Calcutta, would he be admitted to the free competition for a medical appointment, in the same manner as if he were European born?"

"Earl Granville, in answer, had not the slightest hesitation in saying that, if Natives of India arrived here competent to pass the required examination, they would gain the appointment awarded, in free competition, the same as if they had been born in Europe."

"Lord Montagu stated that he received this reply with the greatest delight—less from any large immediate consequence to which it would lead, than from the all-important results which it must produce, in carrying out eventually the full meaning of the 87th Clause of the last Charter Act and the intention of its framers. It had been stated by Lord Lansdowne in 1833 that there should be an entire equality among all the subjects of the Queen, whatever their colour or their religion. He considered the reply now given by the Government, through Earl Granville, to be a fulfilment of this engagement. It would be the entire destruction of the monopoly of what was called the covenanted service as now understood. He was mistaken if there had not been, with respect to these covenanted appointments, a violation of the law of 1833 as it had passed."

"The Marquess of Clanricarde desired to express his great satisfaction at the statement of Earl Granville that the Natives of India would hereafter be eligible for the highest civil appointments. That certainly was a great step."

"The Earl of Albemarle: A great stress has been laid on that portion of the Government plan which laid the higher departments of the civil service of India open to the Natives of the country; but so long as their admission to this competition depended merely on a single clause in an Act of Parliament, which was liable to be set aside or disavowed by subordinate authority, he, for one, must be allowed to state that his objections would remain as strong as ever."—Hansard cxxviii. pp. 48, 56.

Upon moving the second reading of the Bill in that House, August 5th, the noble Earl (Earl Granville), who had charge of the India Bill, said he was bound to admit that the intentions of the Legislature had not, up to that time, been carried out, and that the Natives of India were not employed to the extent which he should wish them to be employed, but that the Bill he then proposed would give a free entry for Natives of India into the covenanted services. Again, on the 8th and 12th of August, the same subject was resumed, and an explanation was given by Earl Granville, pointing out the reason why the exclusion of Natives from the covenanted service had been hitherto enforced, but why Parliament might confidently expect that such exclusion would cease on the passing of the Bill then before the House. He (Lord Monteagle) then adverted to the circumstance that,— “Notwithstanding the 87th Clause introduced into the Act of 1833, renewing the Company's Charter, and declaring the eligibility of Natives to the covenanted service, not one had ever been admitted, recommended a clause, declaring that no natural-born subject of Her Majesty should, by reason of colour, or religion, or place of birth, be incapable of holding office and employment under the Company, whether in the covenanted or uncovenanted service. If this clause should not be inserted in the Bill, the Company might treat the wishes and intentions of the Government in this respect as mere moonshine. He begged to give notice that he would bring up this clause on the third reading, in order that his proposal might stand recorded in the Journals.

“Earl Granville observed, that the aptitude of Natives for certain departments of the service had been satisfactorily established before the India Committee. If, therefore, he objected to the noble Lord's clause it was not from any doubt that Natives of India would be found fully qualified to fill the offices referred to in it. The noble Lord's clause, however, was directed against an imaginary evil. The reason why Natives had not been employed in the Civil Service was this—The clause in the existing Act was merely permissive, and the Civil Service being entirely dependent on nomination, it had happened that no director had nominated a Native. Had a Native been nominated, he must have been employed. The present Bill abolished the system of nomination, and any Natives who exhibited equal talent with Englishmen at the examination would obtain employment.”—3 Hansard, vol. cxxix. p. 1449.

This assurance was so clear and satisfactory as to induce him (Lord Monteagle) to abandon any intention of dividing the House, though he moved a declaratory clause on the third reading for the purpose of recording his opinion and conviction. He next came to the Act of 1858, transferring the Government of India from the Company to the Crown. While that measure was under discussion he took the opportunity of calling attention a third time to the miserable manner in which the promises previously made to the Natives of India had been redeemed. On that occasion he urged his noble Friend (Earl Granville) to hold out some more satisfactory assurance on that subject. His noble Friend answered by appealing to him not to press him for any specific declarations on the matter, observing that one of the duties of the Government, on the passing of the measure then in Parliament, would be to lay before Her Majesty, for Her gracious approval, a Proclamation which should declare Her intentions, and thereby fully recognize the rights of the Natives of India. His noble Friend added that it could not but be felt more gracious and more conducive to the future interests of India that those words of grace and favour should come from the lips of the Sovereign than appear to be forced from the Executive Government by any Parliamentary pressure. To an appeal so just and reasonable he did not hesitate for a moment in acceding. The noble Lord's engagement had been performed to the letter, in that message of mercy with which Her Majesty strove to heal the wounds of India after the mutiny. In the Royal Proclamation issued in November, 1858, and shortly afterwards circulated throughout India, the very words of the 87th Clause to which he had referred as the great charter of civil and religious equality for the people of India were incorporated. The language of the Proclamation was—

“We hold ourselves bound to the Natives of our Indian territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to all our other subjects; and those obligations, by the blessing of Almighty God, we shall faithfully and conscientiously fulfil.”

“We decree that so far as may be, our subjects, of whatever race or creed, may be freely and impartially admitted to those offices in our service the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity, fully to discharge.”

Such was the solemn confirmation given by the Sovereign, on assuming the Government of Her Indian Empire, to the pledge repeatedly held out by Parliament to the people of that country since the year 1833. It had been given by the Government of Earl Grey in 1833, by that of Earl Aberdeen in 1853. In both cases it had been adopted by Parliament as a part of the solemn compact made in renewing the charter. Finally, it was adopted and announced by the Sovereign Herself on assuming the full and undivided authority of ruling Her 180,000,000 of Indian subjects, constituting the most magnificent Empire in the world. Never was an engagement so solemnly contracted between the Crown, the Legislature, and the People. Yet the petitioners, whose case he stated, were still left in a position to complain of its nonfulfilment. This statement he was fully prepared to prove. But before doing so he would ask leave to refer to one further authority he had omitted, which would show that the engagements entered into by England with the Natives of India had also been acknowledged by one of the ablest men who had governed that country, he alluded to Lord Hardinge, who in 1844 issued the following wise and liberal minute:—

“The Governor General having taken into consideration the state of Education in Bengal, and being of opinion that it is desirable to afford it every reasonable encouragement by holding out to those who have taken advantage of the opportunities provided a fair prospect of employment in the public service, not only to reward individual merit but to enable the State to profit largely by the measures taken for public instruction, has resolved, that in every case a preference shall be given to the candidates who shall have been educated in the established institutions, and who shall have distinguished themselves by more than an ordinary amount of merit and attainments.”

If there was one mode better than another of redeeming these often repeated pledges, it was to be found in the promotion of education, and especially of medical education and science in India. Nothing had done more to remove the prejudices of caste and advance the cause of civilization in India than the establishment of the Medical College at Calcutta. This was among the many obligations which India owed to that most excellent man, Lord William Bentinck, who so long back as May 30, 1829, had by his minute announced that—

“The degree to which the Natives have conquered prejudices that without instruction would have been the most inveterate, is shown in the Hindoo College of Dr. Tytler, and the Medical School of Dr. Breton, in which there are pupils of high caste said to dissect animals, and even handle the bones of human skeletons.”

The Natives had a remarkable aptitude for medical science, and it was acknowledged by the high authority of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Ellenborough) that Native practitioners were frequently able to save lives that would be lost under the treatment of Europeans. Students of the Medical College at Calcutta came over to this country to mature their instruction, and entered successfully into full competition with their English fellow-students in our Universities and other training establishments. Nineteen of these Native gentlemen now held appointments in India with honour and credit to themselves. No doubt arose in their minds that the obligations which had been incurred by England would be fulfilled. In one instance a Native student who had obtained the second place among forty-two candidates, having completed his medical course here, went to pursue his studies on the Continent, and being anxious to acquire as much knowledge as he could, in addition to his medical and surgical acquirements had made himself master of three European languages. He thought that whilst it was impossible to overrate the importance of the visits of men whose minds had been highly cultivated and matured, as in the case of Dwarkanauth Tajore and Rammo-hun Roy, the claims of younger students should not be passed over. The education in our best British medical schools of diligent and well-instructed pupils of the Hindoo College, or of students brought up in the Grant and Elphinstone Institutions, men who had distinguished themselves, as his Parsee petitioners had done, and who coming amongst us have obtained knowledge and profited by the opportunity of seeing with their own eyes, judging for themselves of all that was in progress in England, and being thus enabled to report to their Indian brethren the results of their own experience and observation, this was the true way of spreading throughout India not only intellectual acquirements but respect and reverence for our land and its institutions. He alluded to the case in which two excellent friends of his own, Sir Edward Ryan and Mr. Charles Cameron, unfailing advocates of the rights of the Natives of India, had given their high authority to the force and effect of sect. 87, as establishing the eligibility of Natives to civil, military, and medical appointments. Of all the classes in India there was hardly one more interesting in itself, from the character of the race, their great intelligence, diligence, and superior mercantile habits, than the Parsees whose grievances were represented in this petition. Several of these had come over to this country, prepared by scientific education in India for pursuing the medical profession; and after having gone through a regular course of instruction and taken their degrees, passed the College of Surgeons, obtained other marks of honour, they made application to the Army Medical Department to be permitted to compete for admission to the competitive examination as preliminary to an appointment. They then learnt, for the first time, that the army of India had ceased to exist; that only one army now existed—the Queen's army—and that, therefore, there could no longer be a separate examination for Indian appointments, and but one examination for the united services. From the terms of the official letter from the Army Medical Department, the applicants were justified in entertaining the belief that there would be as free an admission to the combined examination, as there had previously been to the separate examination for India.

" East India Army Surgeons.

" November 14th, 1860.

" Sir,—I am directed by the Secretary of State for India in Council to acquaint you, in reference to your recent inquiry, that no separate competitive examination for the Indian Medical Service will take place in January next, but that at the next examination for Assistant Surgeons for Her Majesty's Army such additional number of appointments will be open to competition as will be sufficient to provide for the medical service of India also.

" All candidates at that examination will be subject to the Regulations issued by the War Office with regard to qualifications and examinations.

" I am, &c.,

It would scarcely have been possible to convey to the Parsee petitioners a more clear intimation that, though the separate examinations had ceased, yet one united examination would be established, and that to such united competitive examination the Natives of India would be freely admitted. But their Lordships would learn with no slight degree of surprise and regret (he might, perhaps, have used a stronger word), that, when the time of examination appointed came, the answer obtained was not an admission to that competitive examination, but a statement that, in consequence of the varied climates which medical officers of Her Majesty's army had to encounter in the European and Colonial possessions of the British Crown, it was not thought advisable to subject Natives of India to the chances of service out of their own country, and that in consequence it had been decided that such Native gentlemen should not be permitted to compete for appointments in the general military service. Here was an exclusion imposed where the statement of Earl Granville; the pledge of the Government contained in the law of the land in 1853; and last, but greatest of all assurances, the declaration given in Her Majesty's Proclamation had created perfect equality and eligibility. This was not all. The disqualification of all persons of Indian birth or parentage effected by Colonel Baker's Circular assigned no reason of policy, still less suggested any incompetency in the applicants. The motive put forward was as strange as the act was indefensible. An affectionate regard was forsooth professed for the health of those gentlemen, while depriving them of that which they had a right to expect; and they were invited, as an alternative for service in Europe or our Colonies, to betake themselves to the more inhospitable climate of Africa. This was a whimsical proof of regard for the health of these gentlemen, which he could not very well understand. The answer which these gentlemen returned was that where the law gave them equal eligibility they would not accept a qualified appointment. On their behalf he now took the liberty of claiming what he believed to be their strict legal right. If the law was objectionable, let it be altered; but where the law was clear, let it not be perverted by official prerogative. Where the obligations of the Crown had been distinctly contracted, let not the administrators of the law take on themselves either to deny the equal rights secured by law, or to intercept the promised favour of the Sovereign. He believed their Lordships felt the deepest regret that the Natives of a distant possession should have so just a cause of complaint. He asked for nothing but what the law, the Ministers of the Crown, and the Sovereign had granted. He felt confident that so just a claim could not be refused. The noble Lord concluded by presenting the Petition, and moving an Address for

" Copies of all Rules and Regulations in force on the passing of the 21st and 22nd Victoria, Cap. 106, in any respect touching the Nomination or Examination for Medical and Surgical Military and Naval Officers in India; and Copies of any additional Regulations subsequently made on the same Subject under the Section 27 of the said Act:

" Names of Persons being Natives of India or of mixed Races appointed as Medical or Surgical Officers in the several Presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, from the 1st January, 1857, to the present Time; distinguishing the Date of every such Appointment:

" Copies of any Applications to the Secretary of State for India or Army Medical Department made by Natives of India or of mixed Blood, from the passing of the 21st and 22nd Victoria, Cap. 106, praying for Admission to the competitive Examination for Army Medical Appointments in India, together with all Replies made thereto:

" Copies of Circular Letter, 14th November, 1860, from the India Office, communicating the Cessation of separate medical competitive Examinations for India."

LORD HERBERT: My Lords, there will be no objection to give the Correspondence which the noble Lord has moved for. I rejoice even at this late hour that I have an opportunity of answering the speech which the noble Lord has addressed to your Lordships, and in which—whether felicitously or infelicitously I do not undertake to say—he has confounded two things which are perfectly distinct. The noble Lord ended by saying that the claim of these gentlemen is founded upon law, which gives them a right to all these appointments; but in a previous part of his speech he admitted that the appointments which were promised to Natives of India were appointments in India. The promise was made before the recent transfer of the Government of India to the Crown, and the appointments in question were then in the gift of the Company. The words of the Act are conclusive upon that point, because they express distinctly that the intention was to throw open to all persons, without distinction of creed or colour, “all appointments in the gift of the said Company.” Natives of India were not to compete for English appointments—it was “India for the Indians,” and the right which they had guaranteed to them by the Act was a right to compete for all appointments of a certain class in India. What do the petitioners now ask? They do not ask for local appointments in India, but they ask for appointments in the general service of the Crown, and they claim to be appointed as surgeons and assistant-surgeons to our Line regiments stationed all over the world. I admit at once and fully the acquirements, the skill, the knowledge, and the high character of these gentlemen. The delicacy of their hand is recognized in operations; but it is said they are deficient in some of the most valuable qualities which characterize the practitioners of this country. What is the business of an army surgeon? It is very different from that of a civil doctor. In the case of an army surgeon everything depends upon the degree of confidence which the men have in his skill. Recollect the men have no choice; they cannot go where they like for medical advice; a surgeon is imposed upon them, and it is of the very first importance that he should be possessed of their confidence. The army surgeon now is in a very different position from what he was when Sir Benjamin Brodie recommended his pupils never to go into the army. For a long time in our service the medical profession was not much regarded, but now we have the best skill which can be found; all the best men are coming to us. What is the result? It is that the recommendations of our army surgeons are treated with the greatest respect by our officers, and that the men have that confidence in their skill which is so essential to the success of their services. A doctor cannot cure a man who does not believe in him. The noble Lord may say that science has neither creed nor colour. That is quite true; but we know that Englishmen have not the same confidence in an Italian or a German doctor—to say nothing of an Indian doctor—which they have in an English one. When the petitioners first applied to me I consulted Dr. Gibson, who is at the head of the Army Medical Department, on the subject. He said he thought they were physically incompetent to bear, not the cold of England or the heat of any other country, but the constant vicissitudes and changes of climate to which they would be exposed in our service. I was not content with that. I thought I could not do better than take the opinion of some great authorities. Accordingly, I referred the question to three gentlemen—Dr. Gibson, Director General of the Army Medical Department, Sir John Liddell, Director General of the Naval Medical Department, and Sir R. Martin, a gentleman of great Indian experience. I asked them to go into the whole subject and report to me their joint opinion whether the petitioners were physically qualified to stand the exposure to the various climates in which they would be called upon to serve were they admitted into the medical department of Her Majesty's army. They reported as follows—

“It is our deliberate opinion, founded on experience, that the Native and mixed race of India and other tropical countries will never be able to sustain, for any length of time, the climate of our Northern regions, and that they can only be employed advantageously to the public service in climates similar to those in which their races exist.”

I thought that conclusive. In the face of such an opinion I could not comply with the request of these gentlemen from India, they having no claim by Act of Parliament for admission into the general service of the Queen. But we have never questioned their right to appointments in India; on the contrary, we have urged their employment in civil, police, and, possibly, military capacities in that country. I noticed that a smile was caused by the reference which the noble Lord made to the proposal of Dr. Gibson, that these gentlemen might be employed on the coast of Africa. Your Lordships have been told that the petitioners refused the offer made to them. They had a perfect right to do so; but I can only say that the appointments in question have since been filled by Englishmen, though the climate of Africa must be more trying to white men than to Indians. I regret that I should have been obliged to come to a decision which has given so much pain to the petitioners; but appointments are open to them in their own country, where, perhaps, they might be employed in many instances with more advantage and success than English practitioners. I object to the insinuation that I have overridden the Act of Parliament. It is my duty to secure the best men I can for Her Majesty's service, and that duty I have endeavoured to discharge to the best of my judgment. I again protest against the assumption that admission to the general service of the Crown was guaranteed to Natives of India by law. The guarantee was confined to India only.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I confess I cannot understand on what principle a distinction is made in this matter between a Native of India and a native of Canada or Australia. I wish to state my opinion with regard to the general character of the Native doctors of India. While in that country I had an opportunity of seeing them in contrast with European doctors after the battles near Gwalior. Every morning and evening I visited the hospitals, both Native and European, and I must candidly say that I consider the management of the Native hospitals was superior to the management of the European hospitals. And the reason was obvious. In the Native hospitals there was the most perfect ventilation; while in the European there was none. I visited the European hospitals early, long before the doctor, and found the patients almost suffocated with the offensive air and the closeness of the rooms in which they were placed. It was thought that the best had been done for them because they were placed in a bungalow and were treated like gentlemen. The Native troops, on the contrary, were in hospitals as beautiful as those which I saw years ago in Florence, or as any that are to be found now in London. The conduct of the Native doctors was beyond all praise. I never saw men under such circumstances in greater comfort or better taken care of. There every advantage was taken to obtain ventilation. Instead of being in houses they were under canvas, and the best ventilation is that from the air which percolates through the canvas—it is ventilation without a rush of air. During the time I was in India I never needed the service of a doctor; but had I done so, and placed myself under the care of an European practitioner, the chances are that I should not now be addressing your Lordships. The Native doctors would meet the wants of the service if a fair chance is afforded to them. According to the reduced establishment, the Native army will in future consist of 110,000 men, divided into 240 regiments, who would afford ample occupation for 480 Native medical officers, and I am quite sure that they will be, under the general direction of Europeans, infinitely the best persons for the duty, because they know the effect of climate, which Europeans obstinately will never learn. The same thing which in this country would produce no ill effects, there, by the influence of climate, may become fatal, and that the Natives know, while the Europeans will not know it. As to the general employment of Natives, I have, and have always had, two opinions. One is, that every country must primarily be governed for the benefit of its own people; and the other is, that it is impossible to give good government to any country without availing yourself of the services of the people of that country. But, although I know many persons have a different opinion, I must say I think the course which the Government, urged on by public opinion here, is obstinately pursuing in India in the way of education, must militate against the objects which all have in view. We are persevering in giving the highest education to the lowest class; but we take no pains to reach the higher classes. The consequence will be an over-educated and discontented people, with a body of persons possessed of property whose ignorance would prevent them from giving a useful support to the Government; and that will produce a state of society in which anarchy will be inevitable and good government impossible. This has always been my opinion. I had intended when I was in India to take measures to promote the education of the higher classes of the Natives. I thought that the promotion of knowledge and civilization by education might descend from the higher classes; but I did not believe, nor do I now, that it could ascend from the lower classes to the higher. I know it is useless to speak this language here, when people are determined to have a certain number of persons, no matter whom, educated in the highest degree;

but I am confident such a course involves much mischief and danger, and if it is persevered in, the object which all of us very properly desire to attain—the employment of a large portion of the respectable Native population in the government the country—will become impossible.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, the noble Lord the Secretary for War had stated that the law referred to by the noble Lord who introduced the discussion related solely to employment in India. Was that the answer he gave to the petitioners? According to the law the army was for all parts of Her Majesty's dominions—the answer given to those gentlemen was that no separate competitive examination for the Indian Army was to be held in November. Was that an answer to their case? What did they apply for? They applied, not for examination for the Indian Army—they applied to be admitted into the military service of the Crown. And the answer was most unfair. Why were they not admitted to the competitive examinations? The law said they were to be open; and were the Natives of India to find that this was a mere juggle, and that they were not to be employed? They were first told that a competitive examination was necessary; and when they presented themselves they were told they were not to be admitted. And why? On account of their country, colour, caste—on account of matters which they had been distinctly told were not to be taken into consideration. An Indian, whether a Parsee or Hindoo, was not to be permitted to serve the Crown. Here was a population of 150,000,000 of men, some of them of the most warlike tribes; and we were laying down a rule depriving ourselves of the use of their services whenever the wants of the empire might require them—because if the ground of health was set up as a bar to the employment of Natives out of India it affected the services of the whole Indian Army, who, if properly trained, would be available for general service in any future war. The noble Lord stated that the petitioners had refused to go to Africa. They refused nothing. They said they were prepared to go anywhere in the ordinary course of service, but they objected to be sent specifically to “the white man's grave.” As to capacity to bear the variations of climate he thought the noble Earl was in error, for it was well known that the Persians and Parsees were capable of enduring cold at least as well as Englishmen. He hoped that this matter would be well considered by the Government with a view to the removal of the grounds of those complaints. It was intended by the Act that the Asiatic subjects of Her Majesty should be put on an equality with all others of Her Majesty's subjects; and why should not the Natives of India be placed upon the same footing as the Canadians or inhabitants of other countries? It was absurd to think of governing India in defiance of the feelings or interests of the people.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON regretted the tone which the discussion had taken, for there was no act of the Government, whether of the Secretary for India or of the Secretary for War, which could justify the language of the noble Marquess. He was certainly very much surprised that it should be implied that there was any inclination on the part of the Government to deprive the Natives of India of their just claim to employment in the service of the Crown. At the present moment there were two Bills before Parliament making the Natives of India admissible to seats in the Legislative Council and on the Bench. The noble Marquess complained that these gentlemen having applied to be admitted to a competitive examination to the Indian medical service were refused, but the fact was that the examination was not for the Indian medical service, but for the general medical service of the Crown.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said it was distinctly stated in the despatches that it was an examination for India.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON assured the noble Marquess that he was under a misapprehension; it was not an examination for the Indian medical service, but for the general medical service. Under these circumstances, for the reasons he had stated, the Secretary for War did not think that these gentlemen were eligible. But with respect to their eligibility for other employment in India the case stood just as before. They were equally admissible to the Civil Service, and any Natives who might come home to qualify themselves and win distinction here would be admitted to the covenanted Service just in the same way as any other subjects of the Crown. With regard to the special case of these gentlemen the attention of the Governor General had been directed to it, and it might safely be left in his hands.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said he had confined his remarks entirely to the conduct of the War Office, and his information was taken from a letter signed by Colonel Baker, in which he said—

“At the next examination for assistants for Her Majesty's Army such additional number of appointments will be open to competition as will be sufficient to provide for the requirements of the service in India.”

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON explained that since the amalgamation of the two armies the only mode by which a medical officer could get to India was by being admitted to one of the Line regiments, and whether he went to India or not would depend entirely on the requirements of the service. He might be sent there, or he might be sent to Canada, or to the west coast of Africa.

LORD MONTEAGLE was glad to find the question referred to the very authority in whom he had most confidence.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOURS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that it would be for the convenience of the Committee that he should state the course which was to be taken in regard to the clauses giving power to the Board of Trade to make arrangements with any public body in regard to the transfer of Ramsgate Harbour. It had been represented that such a power, if taken in this Bill, might have the effect to some extent of prejudging the question, should it afterwards be submitted to Parliament. His own view of such a proposal was that it could only have been carried through after a careful investigation by a Select Committee. As nothing was farther from his intention than to do anything that would anticipate the opinion of Parliament on this point, he was quite willing to omit the proposal altogether from the Bill. Any company, therefore, wishing to obtain the use of the harbour would have to come to Parliament for such powers as they desired, and Parliament would be free to deal with the application as they might think fit.

Clause 7 (Dues levied for Shipping Purposes on Ships or Goods which derive no benefit),

MR. MILLER moved to add at the end of the clause—

“With the exception of the said dues leviable by the Trinity Corporation at the port of Leith, where such dues shall cease to be levied so soon as provision shall have been made, by sufficient accumulated funds, for all annuities, pensions, and obligations which have been lawfully granted, or in which a vested interest, absolute or contingent, has been lawfully created before the 15th day of March, 1861.”

The hon. Gentleman said, that such great objections had been felt to the manner in which the Trinity Corporation disposed of its funds that the people of Leith resisted payment of the tax by force. The result was that the Corporation was obliged to procure an Act of Parliament, which was granted them for twenty years. That period happening to expire about this time, the community of Leith were anxious that their case should be an exception to the general arrangement which the Board of Trade had made with the Trinity Corporation of the kingdom. The clause was drawn in very liberal terms, and he hoped that it would be agreed to.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he must resist the exception on the ground that an arrangement had been come to with the various Trinity Houses, and the Trinity House at Leith was represented in that arrangement. The Government certainly entered into an agreement with it as well as with the Trinity Houses of Hull and Newcastle. Under these circumstances, it was impossible to make a different proposal with regard to Leith from that which was submitted to the House.

MR. BLACK said, the proposition of the hon. Member for Leith appeared to him exceedingly reasonable. From the reports upon the subject, it appeared that the Leith Trinity House was entitled to levy a penny per ton upon all goods imported, and it was further stated that the Corporation was not in debt, and that its property was sufficient for all the charges upon it. Supposing that the funds were properly applied, and that this £2,000 was to be given to the poor mariners, all the poor mariners in the neighbourhood would flock to Leith, and the consequence would be that a large number of paupers would be thrown upon Leith and Edinburgh, whereas by agreeing to this proposal there would be no occasion for the House to provide for anything whatever.

MR. DUNLOP said, that the very Amendment which was now proposed showed the wisdom of the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and he saw no reason for departing from that course.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. LINDSAY urged that the dues should not be allowed to go on increasing, and for the purpose of preventing such increase, he proposed to add at the end of Clause 7 the following words, "but the amount of such dues shall not exceed the amount levied in 1860."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he could not agree to the introduction of the words, because their insertion would interfere with the general construction of the clause. If there should be a surplus, it was to be applied under the provisions of the clause in payment of such pensions as should subsist after the expiration of ten years.

MR. LINDSAY remarked that if any of the pensions should be payable after the expiration of ten years there was power given in the Bill to make provision for the payment of them.

MR. HEADLAM did not think that, practically, the Amendment could be carried into effect.

MR. DUNLOP said, that if at a future stage of the Bill the hon. Member should bring up a clause to accomplish the object he had in view he should willingly give him support.

MR. LINDSAY said, he would endeavour to prepare a clause, and would submit it to the President of the Board of Trade.

The Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 8 and 9.

Clause 10 (Compensation for Differential Dues, when to cease),

MR. LINDSAY proposed to omit the words "1872," and insert "1867." By the first Bill it was proposed to give to the parties who now received differential dues five years' compensation, or in round numbers £250,000. By this Bill the time was extended to ten years, and the amount doubled, so that the parties would receive about £500,000 more over and above the £1,000,000, they had received for compensation since the reciprocity treaties were passed. He could not see any reason why these parties were entitled to receive so large a sum, considering that they had received five times more than they could consider themselves entitled to. When the reciprocity treaties were passed there were about eighty places recipients which had a right to levy those dues. Of these fifty seven had ceased already to receive them. He concluded by moving that "1867" be inserted for "1872."

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 9, to leave out the words "seventy-two," in order to insert the words "sixty-seven," instead thereof.

MR. HORSFALL denied that either this Bill or the first one gave the parties who levied the duties one farthing to which they were not entitled. They were entitled to levy the dues in perpetuity under the guarantee of that House, and now they were willing, in accordance with the proposal made by the President of the Board of Trade, to relinquish these dues at the end of ten years, instead of levying them in perpetuity. This was, therefore, no compensation at all. He also denied the accuracy of the statement formerly made by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) relative to the Liverpool pilots.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, it was very true that if the dues had been abolished in 1826 the arrangement might have been made at less cost than now; but that no arrangement was made with the owners when the reciprocities came into force was no pretence for confiscating them now. The parties levying the dues had done so under the sanction of Parliament, and in virtue of charters, and they were clearly entitled to full compensation. He questioned whether, in a court of law, compensation for twenty years might not have been obtained instead of ten years. The pilotage dues of Newcastle, to which the hon. Member had referred on a former occasion, went to maintain the pilotage service of various other places, and had been of great public value; so that the people of Newcastle were not open to the charge made against them that they did nothing for the money they received.

MR. HODGSON also supported the clause.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought that the clause would grant an extravagant compensation.

MR. DUNLOP said, he was in favour of making a fair arrangement with the parties interested in these dues, though he must admit that they had made a very good thing of it already.

LORD LOVAINE said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was either wrong in giving compensation at all, or his present proposal was fully justified. He was persuaded that if the right hon. Gentleman had not extended the amount of compensation to a period of ten years, there would have been no chance of passing this Bill this Session. He thought the course taken was a wise one, and he hoped it would be carried out.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, his constituency were only interested in this question as taxpayers, and he should, therefore, support the Bill, as it would relieve several burdens that now pressed very heavily on the shipping trade. If the House delayed the passing of the Bill it would only increase the claim for compensation. The real question for them to decide was, was ten years a sufficient time for that purpose? He thought that it was; and he also thought that the Government deserved great praise for the great consideration that had been given both to taxpayers and tax-receivers.

COLONEL FRENCH thought the parties interested had received a million of money already more than they were entitled to. He objected to the way in which the sum now proposed to be given had been doubled since the Bill was first brought in.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR hoped the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) would not press his Amendment, as it was of great importance that the present Bill should pass, and it would be endangered if his Amendment were carried.

MR. CLAY thought that the bargain made by the Bill with the Corporations was an advantageous one for the country, and it would, therefore, have his support.

MR. BUCHANAN thought the question was one of expediency, and he believed the parties concerned had received quite as much as they were entitled to. He thought the proposal of the Government was a most liberal one, and for his part he must express his thanks to the hon. Member for Sunderland for having brought forward the question.

MR. LINDSAY should not be doing his duty to his constituents if he did not divide the Committee on this Amendment.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID believed that the President of the Board of Trade had substituted Bill No. 2 for Bill No. 1, because he could not resist the pressure brought to bear upon him by the parties interested in these dues. As he believed the refusal of this compromise would endanger the Bill, he was not prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

Question put, "That the words 'seventy-two' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 28: Majority 100.

MR. CAVE proposed to add at the end of Clause 10—

"Provided, that in the case of any body of proprietors paying a dividend to shareholders out of the profits made by them, or of any company paying a like dividend, or of any private individual entitled by reason of a private proprietary right, adequate compensation shall be made in such manner as may be determined by arbitration or otherwise."

He rose, he said, to advocate the rights of private parties whose interests were affected by the Bill. They were a feeble body, incapable of exercising the pressure upon Government that more powerful corporations could, and, therefore, entitled to a scrupulous measure of justice from that Government. He chiefly advocated the interest of Shoreham Harbour, though he believed there were others in the same category. He might be permitted to say that he had no personal interest in the matter. He was a Commissioner appointed under the Act. The office conferred simply certain duties, and he believed he was discharging one of those duties in protesting against what the proprietors looked upon as a confiscation of their property. Shoreham Harbour was originally made by a body of private individuals who raised money by shares, and by that means constructed, and have since maintained it. They had great difficulties to contend with, as they had to carry on a constant struggle against nature, unassisted by any public money, as in the case of Newhaven. For a long period they paid no dividend, and the sum received as compensation under the Act of Parliament which had been so often referred to had, for that time, gone simply in expenses for public benefit. He considered that private shareholders in such an undertaking as this were in the same position as creditors of public bodies. They bought their shares as the others lent their money, on the faith of the property which belonged to the company or corporation; and, as the rights of the latter were always saved, so ought the rights of the former. Hon. Gentlemen who spoke on the opposite side proved his case. They said that this compensation ought to have been bought up years ago. That admitted the right; but then they said, because this was not done, we had received more than we were entitled to, and, therefore, ought to have nothing more; but, what sort of justice was that? Supposing the hon. Member for Glasgow had an opportunity of buying up an annuity (with which he was charged) for five years' purchase, which he refused, thinking the recipient would not live so long, would he have the right to come to him ten years afterwards and say, you have already received the annuity five years longer than you ought, and, therefore, I will pay you no more? Again it was said Committees had always insisted on the surrender of this compensation when the parties holding it came for fresh privileges. Did not that prove that the claim was a valid one, not to be given up without consent? An hon. Member had said this ten years' compensation was the price they had to pay for the Bill. He (Mr. Cave) contended that the surrender of a perpetuity at the end of ten years was the price the Government made other people pay for public good. He agreed that private rights should give way to public, but he thought the principle might be carried a little too far. The right hon. Gentleman had recommended them to recompense themselves by raising the tolls, a recommendation rather inconsistent with the allegation that they had benefited by the tolls having been lowered. He, for one, could not consent to the tolls being raised. Such a measure would drive away the trade to other harbours; and, without benefiting the shareholders, would injure the town of Shoreham and country round, which had as great, though a more indirect, interest in the harbour. He approved generally of the Bill, but he was sorry to see it tarnished with this injustice; and, without prejudging the question, or fixing any amount of compensation, he begged to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. MILNER GIBSON trusted that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment. He saw no difference between the case of proprietary harbours and those held by corporations, and he did not see why there should be any distinction in the mode of dealing with them. He thought that ten years' payment from the Consolidated Fund was an adequate payment, and the parties ought to be satisfied with it.

MR. LYALL supported the addition.

MR. MILNER GIBSON hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion, and said he could make no difference between public bodies and bodies of private proprietors.

MR. CAVE, in reply, said, he wondered at this, because in the Bill as it originally stood this distinction was admitted, as it had been on all previous occasions. However, as he found private interests were so unpopular, he would not make them more so by giving the House the trouble of dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 11 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 17 (Transfer of Ramsgate Harbour to Board of Trade),

MR. MOFFATT said, it was proposed in this Bill to transfer the duties and responsibilities of the trustees of Ramsgate Harbour to the Board of Trade. He wished to know what it was proposed to do with the compensation fund to which they would be entitled.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that now that they had abolished passing tolls he was given to believe that the trustees of Ramsgate Harbour desired to be relieved of the duty of looking after the harbour for the future. The funds will be applied to the support of the harbour, and it would be the duty of the Government to manage the harbour in the way best calculated to secure the interests of the public.

MR. MITCHELL was of opinion that the funds of the harbour would be amply sufficient, under proper management to maintain it, without transferring it to a railway company.

MR. MACKINNON said, that the transfer of the management of Ramsgate Harbour from the trustees to the Board of Trade would, in his opinion, be of great advantage to the public. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the funds were sufficient to maintain the harbour.

MR. LIDDELL said, that the harbour had cost £2,000,000, when the trustees' own engineer, Sir John Rennie, agreed that it might have been constructed for £700,000, a fact not very complimentary to the trustees, and he (Mr. Liddell) was glad that the harbour was to be withdrawn from their management.

MR. MOFFATT said, possibly it could be constructed at the present time for £700,000, but it should be remembered that at the time when the works were erected the same appliances were not then in existence which were now in use.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 25 struck out.

Clause 26 agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 30 struck out.

Clause 31 agreed to.

Clause 32 (Board of Trade may sell Property),

In reply to MR. LIDDELL,

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the object of the clause was merely to enable the Board of Trade to make any changes in the nature of their investments that might seem expedient.

MR. DEEDES AND MR. LINDSAY were strongly of opinion that the clause required alteration, otherwise the Board of Trade would have power under the clause to transfer the harbour to any company.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that if the clause were passed, he would undertake to remove any possible difficulty.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 33 to 41 agreed to.

Clauses 42, 43, and 44 omitted.

Clause 45 (Power to Warden and Assistants to levy Rates),

MR. MILNER GIBSON proposed the omission of the clause, in order to insert clauses constituting a new Dover Harbour Board, as follows:—

"The said Dover Harbour Board shall consist of seven members, four of whom shall form a quorum; the said seven members shall be the Lord Warden for the time being of the Cinque Ports, who shall ex officio be chairman of the said Board, two burgesses of the borough of Dover, elected by the town council every three years, and to be eligible for re-election, a member to be from time to time appointed by the President of the Board of Trade for the time being, a member to be from time to time appointed by the First Lord of the Admiralty for the time being, a member to be from time to time appointed by the South-Eastern Railway Company under their common seal, and a member to be from time to time appointed by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, under their common seal; and the said Lord Warden shall from time to time nominate, under his hand, one of the members of the said Board to be his deputy, to preside at all meetings at which the said Lord Warden shall not be present; and in the event of an equality of votes at any meeting of the said Board, the chairman at such meeting shall be entitled to a casting vote; provided that in the event of either or both of the said railway companies failing or declining to appoint a member of the said Harbour Board within one calendar month after having been required so to do by the President of the Board of Trade, then such president shall, from and after such default, be entitled thereafter to appoint from time to time another member or members in lieu thereof, as the case may be."

MR. DEEDES complained that the Dover Commissioners had not been consulted with reference to the proposed change in the management of the Dover Harbour. He could not but regard this as a most uncalled for change introduced in a most unusual manner, and in these circumstances he and his brother Commissioners had to consider how they ought to act. The Commissioners had been summoned to meet at Dover to investigate the claims of eighty persons who were candidates for the office of harbourmaster at Dover. On seeing the change that was contemplated in the constitution of the Board, he thought it his duty to call the attention of his brother Commissioners to that change, and they all felt that pending this change it would be unfair and improper in them to exercise any patronage in regard to the harbour. They communicated their views to the Lord Warden on this subject, and hoped to hear from him some expression of opinion on the subject of the proposed change; but in their interview they failed to elicit from him any opinion on the subject of the constitution of the Board of Management. They had intimated to the Lord Warden that it was their intention to abstain from any act that was not imperatively called for by the interests of the harbour, and that they had only been prevented from placing their resignation in his hands from a fear lest the interests of the harbour should suffer before the present Bill could be passed, and that they thought it their duty to remain in office till their successors could be appointed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON could assure the hon. Gentleman that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Government to show any disrespect or neglect to the Commissioners of Dover Harbour. When the Bill was introduced it was not the intention of the Government to make such a change in the constitution of Dover Harbour as was now proposed; but the people of Dover, and others interested in the harbour had, through their Member, expressed a strong desire for some change, and the hon. Member for Dover gave notice of an Amendment proposing an alteration in the constitution of the Board. It was not till after consideration that the Government consented to the proposal of the hon. Member for Dover, and it was not possible to have that communication with the Dover Commissioners on the subject which might have been desirable. He could assure his hon. Friend, however, that there was not the slightest intention to show any discourtesy towards them.

LORD LOVAINE protested against the Amendment. It was the first time that the constitution of a Board which had existed for centuries had been changed at the suggestion of a private Member.

MR. LINDSAY said, that instead of a Board consisting of eight gentlemen not connected with the place it was now proposed that there should be a Board consisting of two members of the Town Council, one appointed by the Board of Trade, one by the Board of Admiralty, and one by the South Eastern and the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Companies, both of which had a very great interest in the proper management of the harbour. He thought, then, that the right hon. Gentleman was only doing a public service by adopting the proposed change.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES said, that notwithstanding the explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had given the Board had a right to complain of the treatment the Assistants had received.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS had the greatest possible respect for the Assistants in their individual capacity; but he thought the condition of Dover, as compared with Hastings and the other southern ports, was not such as to render the proposed change undesirable.

Clause omitted as was also Clause 46.

On the Motion of Mr. SOMERSET BEAUMONT, a clause was inserted giving power to town Corporations to transfer shipping dues to harbour authorities.

MR. NICOL moved clauses providing for a new constitution for the management of the harbour of Dover. The following is the constitution of the new Board:—

“The Dover Harbour Board shall consist of seven members, four of whom shall form a quorum; the said seven members shall be the Lord Warden for the time being of the Cinque Ports, who shall ex officio be chairman of the said Board, two burgesses of the borough of Dover elected by the town council every three years, and to be eligible for re-election, a member to be from time to time appointed by the First Lord of the Admiralty for the time being, a member to be from time to time appointed by the South Eastern Railway Company, under their common seal, and a member to be from time to time appointed by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, under their common seal; and the said Lord Warden shall from time to time nominate, under his hand, one of the members of the said Board to be his deputy, to preside at all meetings at which the said Lord Warden shall not be present; and in the event of an equality of votes at any meeting of the said Board, the chairman at such meeting shall be entitled to a casting vote; provided that in the event of either or both of the said railway companies failing or declining to appoint a member of the said Harbour Board within one calendar month after having been required so to do by the President of the Board of Trade, then such President shall, from and after such default, be entitled thereafter to appoint from time to time another member or members in lieu thereof, as the case may be.”

Mr. DEEDES said, there was no adequate provision made for the liquidation of the debts that had been incurred under the sanction of Parliament. He ventured to say, from the accounts given by the official manager of the harbour, that the mode in which it was expected to pay off the debt was not so simple, or likely to be so successful, as was expected. He was perfectly satisfied that, after the income from passing tolls ceased, great difficulty would be found in meeting the obligations that had been incurred. He believed it would be found that the advantages derived from the establishment of this new Board would not be so satisfactory as seemed to be anticipated.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN defended the constitution of the new Board, and observed that the new constitution had the unanimous approval of the people of Dover.

LORD LOVAINE observed that it would be useless to discuss the clauses, but he must again protest against the unprecedented step of making such sweeping changes without notice.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN replied that the notice of the hon. Member (Mr. Nicol) had been on the paper for several days. He had no doubt, from conversations which he had had with gentlemen in the neighbourhood, that the change was most earnestly desired by the inhabitants of Dover.

Clauses agreed to.

MR. THOMPSON moved the following clause:—

"(Vessels using Whitby Harbour to pay toll for support of tide lights.) On and after the 1st day of January, 1862, all vessels exceeding ten tons entering or leaving the harbour of Whitby shall pay to the trustees of Whitby Harbour such sum or toll, not exceeding 1d. per ton, as such trustees may from time to time direct to be paid to them, for the support, maintenance, and improvement of the existing or any future tide lights at the entrance of the harbour: provided always, that any vessel which shall have paid such toll on entering the harbour may again leave the harbour without further payment of toll."

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 196.]

ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH.

QUESTION.

MR. NORTH said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is intended to contribute Public Money towards the maintenance of the fabric of St. Margaret's Church, the religious service of this House being already provided for by an expenditure on St. Stephen's Chapel? And whether it might not be preferable to take steps for removing to another spot St. Margaret's Church from the Abbey Yard?

MR. COWPER said, St. Margaret's Church had for many years been the place of worship used by both Houses of Parliament on public occasions, and there were also seats reserved in the Church for Members of both Houses at the usual services on Sundays. On those grounds it had been the practice for many years for Parliament to make grants whenever extensive repairs were made in that Church. During the last 100 years there had been six occasions on which considerable sums were voted by the House of Commons to aid in the repairs of the Church. It was not in his contemplation to propose any grant for that purpose, because a sum was voted in a former year, and the sum to which the hon. Member had alluded was one which had already been voted. There had been some difference of opinion among persons of taste as to the general effect of the removal of the Church. It served as a foil to enhance the beauty and size of the Abbey, and it concealed the junction with Henry VII.'s Chapel. However, a Committee of this House some years ago recommended that the Church should be removed, and an estimate was made by the late Sir Charles Barry of the cost of another site and of re-erecting the Church. That estimate was a very large one, and nothing had been done, and he had nothing under consideration with regard to that question.

AFFAIRS OF NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, now that the rebellion in New Zealand is suppressed, the Government are taking such steps as will tend to extricate this Country from any future implication in Native Policy; and whether they will now advise Her Majesty to give assent to the Native Council Bill sent by the New Zealand Legislature for Her approval?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, a new Governor, Sir George Grey, had been appointed, and had been desired to report to the Government upon the whole subject. It would, therefore, be wrong to fetter his discretion by advising the Crown to assent to the Native Council Bill. Her Majesty's Government had no disinclination to assent to that Bill, but they would reserve their final decision until they had received the Report from Sir George Grey.

PENSIONS TO COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, in the absence of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Dunne) he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it has been determined by the Government to grant Retiring Pensions to Governors of Colonies; and, if so, after what period of service, and on what scale?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the question of granting retiring allowances to Governors of Colonies had been considered by the Government of Lord Derby when they were preparing the Superannuation Bill, it having been suggested by the Colonial Office that some provision of that nature should be included in that Bill. Nothing, however, was done, and the present Government had not renewed the consideration of the question.

ROYAL ATLANTIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Galway, If he is prepared to-night to name the Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the termination by the Postmaster General of the Postal Contract with the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company.

MR. GREGORY said, he had been perfectly ready for several days to name the Committee, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to know why he had not nominated it, he begged to refer him to the Secretary of the Treasury. He certainly should name the Committee to-night. If he could not come to terms, he should select five Members whose names would be a guarantee for their intelligence and impartiality, and add to them the Secretary of the Treasury and himself. He should take the sense of the House on each name on Monday next.

NAVY—THE "HIBERNIA."

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Messrs. Palmer of Newcastle-on-Tyne, the builders of the Hibernia—which was pronounced unseaworthy by the Admiralty before making a voyage—are the same parties who are constructing an Iron-cased Frigate for the Admiralty?

MR. WHITBREAD said, it was a fact that the Hibernia was pronounced unseaworthy by the Surveyors of the Admiralty, and that the firm of Messrs. Palmer of Newcastle-on-Tyne, were constructing an iron-cased frigate for the Admiralty; but, at the same time, it was only fair to say that in all cases in which that firm had supplied iron cases for the Admiralty they were of the best quality.

NAVY—THE CHANNEL FLEET.

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, he wished to ask, Whether it be the intention of the Government to send the Channel Fleet to Great Yarmouth this year, and there to remain for some days, as was believed to be the intention last year?

MR. WHITBREAD said, it was not intended to send the Channel Fleet to Great Yarmouth this year.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any, and, if any, what assurance from the Government of Spain that it will not take advantage of the events which have lately occurred in the eastern portion of the island of St. Domingo to introduce Slavery or the Slave Trade into any part of that island?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he could best answer the question of the Member by reading to the House extracts from two Despatches which had recently been received. In a Despatch, dated April 22nd, Mr. Edwardes stated that Marshal O'Donnell had told him—

"You can tell your Government that which it will be pleased to hear—namely, that whatever may be our decision, whether or not we accept the annexation of St. Domingo, no slavery shall exist there, because I consider it contrary to existing treaties and not in accordance with civilization. It exists in Cuba and in Porto Rico because the land requires it."

Again, in a Despatch of date May 2nd, Mr. Edwardes wrote—

"As to the question about slavery, Marshal O'Donnell stated to him that 'he had given no assurances which he was ready to repeat, and His Excellency did so in the same terms that he used on two previous occasions, which I have already had the honour to report to your Lordship.'"

ORANGE RIOTS.—IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received any information of proceedings reported to have taken place upon the occasion of an Orange Riot at Lisburn, on Wednesday last, when several of the Constabulary and Townspeople were assaulted, one man named Megan having been stabbed, from the effects of which he now remains in a very precarious state?

MR. CARDWELL said, the event having only taken place two days ago, there had not been time for Government to receive any official information.

DISTURBANCES AT ST. JOHN'S, NEW-FOUNDLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have received complete information as to the disturbances at St. John's, Newfoundland; and if he has any objection to lay a Copy of the Papers on the Table?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE stated that information had been received at the Colonial Office of disturbances having taken place at Newfoundland, in consequence of excessive party feeling during the last elections. The occurrences were now under investigation, and when a Report on the subject arrived, he would lay it on the Table.

THE RED SEA TELEGRAPH. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is not advisable that the question of the Red Sea Telegraph should be referred to a Select Committee in order to inquire whether it may not be worth while endeavouring to render it available?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had stated on a former occasion that if there was a disposition to examine into this contract he should not have the smallest objection to the appointment of a Select Committee; but with regard to the subject mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member, it appeared to him that to appoint a Committee would be to devolve upon the Executive Government, which it was their duty to undertake, and which, though it was a difficult duty, they had greater advantages in performing than a Committee could have. He would inform the hon. and gallant Member of the position in which the matter at present stood, so far as the Government was concerned. The question was to be considered, in the first place, in regard to the financial engagements of the Government; and in the second place with regard to the material of the cable itself which had been laid, and the practicability of turning it to advantage. As regarded the financial part of the question, they had at present under examination the mode in which they might come to an arrangement with the persons who at present formed the Company and had charge of the Telegraph, and upon that they should be prepared very shortly to proceed to some measure, because it did not appear, nor so far as he knew to the parties themselves, that there was any particular advantage in retaining the Telegraph in the hands of those parties. On the contrary it would appear, on various grounds, to be desirable that they should be divested of all further concern in it. Then, with regard to the Telegraph cable, and the possibility of turning it to account, they had referred to the Board of Trade, and that Board was now preparing a Report on the best method of making an examination of the different parts of the cable on the spot; and it was obvious that it was only upon such an examination that they could found any plan for the future dealing with that cable. Of course the expense of the examination and the mode of conducting it were matters for consideration, but those matters were at present in the hands of competent persons connected with the Board of Trade.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I understand that the private business of the Session is now nearly concluded, and I would, therefore, suggest that it may be convenient to the House that public business should during the remainder of the Session commence at a quarter past four, instead of at half-past four, on those evenings when the House meets at four o'clock.

On Motion to go into Committee of Supply,

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

DUBLIN REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN complained of the great accumulation of arrears of business at the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin, and of the vexatious delays which occurred in consequence. He begged to ask the Secretary for Ireland whether he will produce a copy of the Report of the Commissioner appointed to inquire into the subject, and whether the Government intend to introduce any Bill during the present Session to obviate the delays which at present exist in performing the duties of the office?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE rose to order. There were several names before that of the hon. Baronet on the Notice paper, and he wished to know from the Speaker whether Members in making Motions on going into Committee of Supply were not to take precedence in the order in which they stood on the paper?

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member's question was one to which he had already given a reply. The hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin on rising, as he stated, to ask a question, had caught his eye, and he did not consider the hon. Member out of order in proceeding. At the same time it was certainly a desirable course, and one to which he was anxious to adhere, that the hon. Member whose name stood first should have precedence.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the question to which the hon. Member had referred was a very important one, and the state of the registry for deeds in Ireland was such as required very careful consideration. A Commissioner had been appointed by his noble Friend who preceded him in office, and that Commissioner had visited all the various register offices. He (Mr. Cardwell) had received from him a very elaborate report, which contained, however, certain references to individuals such as rendered it not desirable to be laid on the Table of the House. The report had been returned, in order that it might have those passages of a private nature removed from it, and when it was re-delivered, if his hon. Friend would move for it, he (Mr. Cardwell) should be very happy to produce it. With regard to the question as to whether any legislation was intended on the question this year, he begged to inform his hon. Friend, that amongst those who had carefully considered the question great differences of opinion prevailed as to the best mode of effecting the important object in view; and, therefore, no legislative measures would be proposed until the Report had been well considered, both by that House and by the public of Ireland.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE rose to move a Resolution—

“That the Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Civil Service Examinations proves that the System of Examinations should be modified, in order to meet the requirements of the Public Service.”

The hon. Member said that the importance of this subject was proved by the fact that there were 105,000 Government places in this country, which were now almost in the hands of the Civil Service Commissioners, and it was, therefore, doubly important to consider the effect which these examinations had produced on the different professions. The Committee on this subject, which was presided over by the noble Lord, the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), had reported very fully: and as to the result of the evidence taken before that Committee, two very different opinions had been formed. The noble Lord and those who thought with him were of opinion, as the result of the evidence, that previous to 1855 the Civil Service of this country was very inefficient, but that the system of examination, up to the present time, had been attended with great advantages, and that, although the proposal of throwing open all situations under Government to open competition was not desirable at the present moment, they looked forward to a time when that proposal might be carried into effect, and anticipated that the result would be for the benefit of the country. He (Mr. Cochrane) had read the same evidence very carefully, and he had come to precisely the opposite conclusion—that there was no evidence to show that the Civil Service prior to 1855 was inefficient; that no practical advantage but, on the contrary, great disadvantage had arisen to the public service from the system of examination; and that if the system of open competition was introduced, it would terminate in the ruin of the public administration of the country. He could not comprehend how the Committee could have adopted such a Report as they presented to the House. Twenty-five witnesses were examined by the Committee; of these he struck off six as being Civil Service Examiners themselves, and, therefore, subject to view the matter with partiality. Of the remainder, eleven gave their evidence in opposition to the present system of examination: and there were only four who distinctly stated that they thought it had been beneficial to the country. Mr. Arbuthnot, the auditor of the Civil List, was of opinion that the effect of the competition had been to exclude objectionable men; but that, in the case of the supplementary clerks of the Treasury, it had introduced a class of men above their work, and thus gave rise to discontent and inconvenience. Mr. Trevor said that the present class of clerks were superior in social position, but he did not know that they had been superior for the purposes for which they were wanted. Sir Thomas Freemantle, Chairman of the Board of Customs, said that in the appointment of inferior officers too much stress had been laid upon intellectual attainments, and too little attention had been paid to physical qualifications. Mr. Tilley, the Assistant Secretary of the Post Office, said that the introduction of the competitive system had not made much difference. Mr. Romilly and Sir Richard Bromley gave similar testimony. Sir Thomas Freemantle issued a circular to the heads of departments and the collectors of the outposts, and he received from many of them reports by no means favourable to the new system. The Surveyor General stated that the examination had failed to supply a more valuable class of persons to the service. It was not a superior test of fitness to that which was previously in operation, and many persons might be rejected for deficiency in mere book learning who possessed qualifications which would be of infinitely greater value. The Inspector General said that no doubt under the present system many men of intelligence and energy had been appointed, but it was equally true that such men were by no means excluded under the former system, nor were instances of superior zeal, intelligence, and efficiency more unfrequent then than they were now; and the experience of the new system went far to establish the fact that a man's general usefulness would not always be on a par with the amount of school education he had received. From one office the Report was—

"I am rather disappointed at finding myself compelled to admit that the clerks in this department who have undergone an examination by the Civil Service Commissioners do not evince more talent, nor display greater energy and aptitude for business, than those appointed within the six years preceding the institution of such examinations."

From another—

"Having had several clerks under my supervision who have been admitted into the service since May, 1855, and also several who were appointed within the six years preceding the examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, I am enabled to state that I have not found the former display any greater energy or aptitude for business than the latter; and although generally tractable, I have experienced both personally and towards the public a self-sufficiency and presumption, from an imagined superiority in having undergone such examination, and also a desire for literature in business, that I have been obliged to check."

Of twenty-five Reports, all but one were against the system of examination. One gentleman said that the officers appointed possessed a better education, but less usefulness, than formerly; another, that the clerks appointed under the new system were better educated, but had not as good business habits as those who entered the service before 1855, and were not so easily managed. Why did not the Committee quote other witnesses than those who were referred to in their Report, such, for instance, as Mr. Waddington, Mr. Timm, and Mr. Hammond? Mr. Hammond stated that under the old system no clerks were appointed whose conduct during the first six months would not have insured their confirmation. Lord Elgin also gave evidence strongly against the new system, or, at all events, to the effect that the public service had derived no advantage from it. He could scarcely find in the evidence a single sentence in support of the principle of open competition in favour of which the Committee had reported. He could not comprehend how this Report had been drawn up, or how the Committee were able to state that it was based on the evidence which they had received. The only hypothesis which he could form was that several of them had only attended at long intervals. This system, at which Lord Brougham said everybody in the streets held up his hands, had not been introduced in consequence of any dereliction of duty on the part of public officers. Distinguished men declared that at the time there never was such a body of civil servants. Among those who made that declaration was Sir James Stephen. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Oh, oh!] Did the right hon. Gentleman doubt that such an opinion had been given? Sir James Stephen said—

"In all seriousness, I think that the man whose name stood half-way down the examination list of merit would probably make a better clerk than he whose name stood first. Is this system founded on a truth so evident and on maxims of such universal application that we ought to apply it to 16,000 public officers at once? It is at least a perfect novelty; it is a rule hitherto never enforced in any republic except Utopia; it does not prevail in the legal, or medical, or sacerdotal, or mercantile professions; it is unknown to the great commercial world and municipal corporations among us."

Lord Herbert was a very good authority, and he said—

"A young man who comes fresh from a cramming tutor and answers a few unintelligible questions is not the same thing as a young man who has gone through a regular professional course, and who becomes immediately available for regimental duty."

Mr. Chadwick stated that—

"Some of the most eminent members of the professions, as well as of the Civil Service, have gained their start in actual life—not away from it, but in the midst of practice, so early as to preclude academical accomplishments. The first entrance into life of an eminent civil servant, high in the civil class of the Order of the Bath, was, as he says, in being when a boy pushed through the porthole of a ship into the midst of a coil of rope."

It always astonished him how, with opinions such as these, given at the time these gentlemen could be quoted as upholding this extraordinary system of examination. He was afraid the right hon. Gentleman would feel indignant with him for again referring to the questions put by the Civil Service Commissioners; but, notwithstanding the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that any schoolboy could answer them, he believed they had improved very little since last year. He had been taunted with being the friend of ignorance, and he was aware that he was taking the unpopular view; but he had never denied that a test examination was necessary. What he objected to was that a man's career should be made to depend on the number of marks which he obtained in different branches of science. He would take the examination papers for 1860 and 1861, and he would ask the House whether they really tested the power, the intelligence, and the merits of the young men by whom they were answered—

"Out of what other languages has the English language been formed? What difference does the English of the Spectator present as compared with that of the authorized version of the Bible? What do you understand by the words 'a good English style?' Give rules for writing such a style."

Why, there was nothing with regard to which persons differed so much in opinion as upon "a good style." Essays might be written on the subject. Again, the candidates were asked—

"What do you understand by a 'figure of speech' in English? Write a series of short sentences, each containing an example of a figure of speech."

They were next required to write an essay on winter, mentioning its duties and amusements. Winter amusements differed with the country in which they prevailed; in Scotland, curling; and in England, hunting possibly were the chief amusements.

"Give a list of English historians, characterizing each of them by a single epithet."

"Compare the influence of the ballad writer in early times with that exercised by the press at the present day."

"Sketch briefly the course of the chief wars waged by Great Britain in Hindostan."

All these questions, it would be borne in mind, were to be answered in the space of two hours. As if they were not sufficiently comprehensive the next had an even wider scope—

"Of what use to Great Britain are its several colonies and dependencies?"

Then it seemed as if some sentimental examiner took the matter in hand, for giving the verse,—

"Few the words that I have spoken ;

"True love's words are ever few ;

"Yet by many a speechless token

"Hath my heart discoursed to you ;"

he required it to be translated into Latin! The next thing required was that the candidate should

"Write a short sketch of the origin of Parliaments in England, and show how their power has progressively increased."

[Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed at these questions; it was very natural that they should do so, but he could truly state he had no wish to throw ridicule on the gentlemen of great ability by whom these questions were framed. It might be said that all these were matters which young men should know, but within the time limited and for the object which was in view they seemed to be unnecessarily comprehensive. The Examiners next required the young man to "Write a letter describing the overland route to Calcutta via Marseilles, and containing information on the natural productions of the States through which the writer is supposed to pass, and on their commercial relations with other nations."

Why that was not a question, it was a volume.

"Write a short life of the Emperor Napoleon I."

And then came a question which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer could probably answer better than most persons—

"Enumerate the struggles which England has entered into with the Chinese Empire since 1830."

He also found a question which might lead to some awkward discussions—

"Give the names and essential characters of the minerals which enter into the composition of the building stones ordinarily employed."

Why, that was a question very interesting just at present to the Houses of Parliament; and another followed of hardly less importance—

"From what class of substances are the noxious odours of the Thames likely to originate; what conditions are most favourable to their development, and what means ought to be resorted to in order to destroy them?"

LORD STANLEY inquired whether the questions selected by the hon. Member had reference to Civil or Military Examinations?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, they were some of the questions set on the part of the Council of Military Education. What he contended was that the competitive system, whether applied to the Military or Civil Service, was equally objectionable. Young men were not only required to answer questions of the class which he had illustrated by selections, but they were also obliged to write essays. For these one of the subjects given was "a panegyric on Garibaldi, General Havelock, and Sir Isaac Newton." That particular question was intended for Civil Service candidates. Among the other subjects given for these essays was "The Recent Visit of the Queen to Germany;" with a suppositious case, "How it would be most advisable that a young man should spend a two months' holiday from a public office?" The Commissioners were very particular about "Garibaldi's expedition to Sicily," and repeated that subject no less than five or six times. But perhaps the most remarkable of all the headings for essays which he had encountered was "The late Fight for the Championship between Tom Sayers—[Great laughter and cheering, which interrupted the conclusion of the sentence.] Many Gentlemen were interested in geological inquiries, and differed in the views which they entertained on those subjects, but an entirely new idea was started for the benefit of the young men about to be examined—

"Give the evidence for the submersion of the British Isles at several periods. State when the last of these submersions took place, and by what phenomena it appears to have been accompanied."

He thought he had sufficiently proved to the House that he was justified in declaring, first, that the Report was not maintained by the evidence; and, secondly, that the Civil Service Commissioners still continued the same description of questions as those to which he had last year called the attention of the House. He believed the system required modification. He lamented that the Committee had not secured gentlemen well able to give the information; that they had not examined old diplomatists like Sir Hamilton Seymour or Lord Stratford de Redcliffe; or military men of station like his Royal Highness the Command-in-Chief, and ascertained from them what the effect of those examinations had been on the class of men entertaining those respective services. The British army was proud of being officered by gentlemen. The Crimean war did not prove that our officers had deteriorated, or that they were incompetent for the discharge of their duties. Then what a number of first-class diplomatists we had at this moment representing Her Majesty in foreign countries. He had no hesitation in saying that this was a dangerous principle which we had introduced into the public service; and we ought to inquire into and weigh it well before we broke up the old system. Quia non movere—it was dangerous to tamper with the old system, under which such admirable officers had been obtained for the service of the country, unless it could be clearly shown that the new would be productive of greater benefit to the country. Hon. Gentlemen knew what the opinion was out of doors. Persons did not like to express that opinion in public; but, privately, men competent to form an opinion on the subject would tell them that the public service was deteriorating under the new system, and it was with a view of preventing such deterioration that he begged to move—

"That the evidence taken before the Select Committee on Civil Service Examinations proves that the system of examinations should be modified, in order to meet the requirements of the public service."

SIR HENRY TRACEY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"The evidence taken before the Select Committee on Civil Service Examinations proves that the system of Examinations should be modified, in order to meet the requirements of the Public Service."

—instead thereof.

MR. HENNESSY wished to explain that when he put on the paper his Amendment to the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. B. Cochrane), he expected that that Motion would come on in a different form. But, according to the rules of the House, it was not competent to him to move that Amendment now, because his hon. Friend made his proposition as an Amendment on the Motion for going into Supply. He hoped, however, that within the next two or three weeks he should be able to submit to the House a Motion affirming the same principle as that embodied in the Amendment—namely, that the best mode of procuring competent persons to fill junior clerkships in the Civil Service would be through a system of competitive examination, open to all subjects of the Queen who fulfil certain conditions as to age, health, and character. For the present he should confine his observations to a partial defence of the Report of the Committee. The noble Lord the Chairman of that Committee (Lord Stanley) was present, and would be able to answer his hon. Friend; but, as he had the honour to move for the Committee, he was anxious to say a word on its constitution. His hon. Friend had charged the Committee with having framed a report which was inconsistent with the evidence taken before it. Now, who were the Members of that Committee? Among them were Sir William Hayter, Sir William Jolliffe, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Monckton Milnes, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Bright, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Collins, Colonel Sykes, Mr. Maguire, Mr. Tite, Mr. Clay, and himself. The House would observe that he had nominated Gentlemen who were not supposed to favour the system which he advocated. He appealed to hon. Members whether the Committee was not one which fairly represented the various opinions entertained in that House on the subject of competitive examinations? The Committee examined witnesses, not, as his hon. Friend seemed to suppose, chosen for any particular views to promote the object which he and other Members entertained in regard to open competition; but they examined witnesses who, to some extent, were prejudiced against the views which he and others entertained. They examined permanent Secretaries and heads of Departments; they examined gentlemen who had entered the Civil Service under the old system, and who, if they had a prejudice, would have had one in favour of that system under which they had obtained admission, and under which they had worked. They examined gentlemen connected with the Civil Service Commission—the Commissioners themselves, the Examiners, and the Secretary; but it would have been idle for them to go into an inquiry as to what the public opinion—"the educated public opinion"—was on this subject. They already knew what that opinion was, and that it was generally believed that open competition would be the result of the system which at present prevailed. There were two branches of inquiry into which the Committee could not enter—the one, the effect of the present system of patronage on the public service and on the Members of that House; the other, how far throwing open the Civil Service would affect the public education of the country. Though the Committee did not feel at liberty to enter into those branches of the inquiry, he believed they were as important as any that could be discussed in reference to this subject. But taking the narrowest ground and looking at the question merely as it bore on the efficiency of the public service, he had no doubt that if hon. Members perused the evidence with attention, they would arrive at the conclusion to which the Committee had come. The gentlemen whom they examined declared, he thought unanimously, that the present system of examination, if it did nothing else, excluded inefficiency. What was the meaning of that? His hon. Friend had passed very lightly over this part of the case; but if the system did nothing more than provide a check against the admission into the public service of inefficient men, that alone would be a sufficient ground on which to defend it. But it did more. The public service was conducted at a great cost to the country, its efficiency was of enormous importance to the State, and we ought to get the best men we could for the money. How were we to accomplish that? The Committee were told by the most trustworthy and competent witnesses that, under the existing system, the country did get the best men. His hon. Friend had amused the House by reading some of the questions put to gentlemen who proposed to serve in the Artillery and the Engineers, for whom peculiar qualifications were necessary. One of these was a question about the submersion of Great Britain, which his hon. Friend thought exceedingly amusing; but for the Engineers an examination in geology was thought necessary, and every hon. Member must be aware that if the Examiner entered into the most superficial view of that subject he must ask questions of that kind. For the Indian Civil Service an examination in chymistry was deemed right, because it was thought advisable that gentlemen in that service should have been instructed in the various branches of a first-class education. He would put it to his hon. Friend whether his Parliamentary avocations had not prevented his paying that attention to natural science which these candidates might be expected to have given? Certain tests of ability and intelligence were required, and the Civil Service Examiners had only selected those tests which were common not only to the public Universities and schools of this country, but also to those of all Europe. He was unwilling to enter upon the defence of the Report of the Committee, because the noble Lord who presided over it was present; he could not, however, refrain from protesting against the course which the hon. Gentleman had, upon the Notice which he had placed upon the paper, taken in impugning the examination papers and denouncing the whole system of examination for the public service and the scheme of public competition, instead of frankly and boldly bringing his opinions forward and taking the sense of the House upon it.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: I think the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) has not quite laid sufficient ground for so important a Motion—because if he brings it to a division he calls upon us to reverse the decision of a very important Committee upstairs, which the House will hardly be prepared to do upon the reasons he has submitted. Although this is the longest day of the year, yet it was hoped this would be one of the shortest of Sessions; and the House is, I think, hardly in a state of mind to enter upon the merits of a somewhat abstract question. Having sat upon the Committee upstairs, I am bound to say that the Resolution to which the Committee came represented rather the state of mind of the majority of the Committee than the result of the evidence. The hon. Member (Mr. Hennessy) has read the names of the Members of the Committee, and any one cognizant of the opinions of those hon. Members must see that he went into the Committee with a very well-secured majority. I do not impugn the fairness of the Committee, but I may appeal to any one who will read the evidence to say whether it justified the Report? The Committee was composed of Gentlemen who attached more importance than I do to the system of competitive examination. I trust that in nothing that I have done either here or elsewhere have I ever been the advocate of ignorance. I am in favour of instruction, and of giving encouragement to education in every possible manner. But the position I hold is that an undue prominence has been given to these Civil Service Examinations, that results have been expected from them which are not likely to be realized, and that they cause an enormous degree of individual trouble and even suffering without any correlative public good. It must be remembered that in this Civil Service examination you have established a new and expensive branch of the public service. It is impossible that among the body of gentlemen thus employed there should not be a strong esprit de corps, that they should not exaggerate the importance of their functions, and induce others to believe that the whole efficiency of the public service depends on a set of clever boys answering a set of clever questions. But the clever boys will not necessarily make the best public servants. Every one's experience furnishes him with instances of the little adequate success in public life of those who have gained the highest University distinctions. It does not follow that those youths who give evidence of the power of fixing their attention and acquiring knowledge must necessarily make the best public servants. I am not prepared by voting for the hon. Gentleman's Motion to join in a vote of censure upon the Select Committee, but I think he is justified in bringing the matter before the House, and I should be glad if hon. Members will take down the blue book from their dusty shelves and run their eyes over the evidence taken by the Committee; I wish they would read the evidence given, for example, by Mr. Waddington—a man who combines the knowledge of the scholar with the acuteness and administrative faculties of the best men of the world—and then contrast that with the evidence given of casual failure on the part of certain officers whom it was necessary to bring together on a sudden—say ten years ago, on the collection of the census. Hon. Members would then be in a condition to say whether the Committee have given fair weight to the evidence before them. We, the minority, protested against the interpretation of the evidence, and that, I think, will be the decision of any one who reads the blue book. The Committee were presided over by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) with great judgment and ability. I do not wish to throw any slur upon their fairness. The majority availed themselves of their privilege, and they made the Report in which the noble Lord illustrated his opinion in an able manner, but in which the Committee did not, I think, give all the weight it deserved to the opinion of such witnesses as Mr. Waddington. One plain result of your system of examination is that it has effected one good purpose of excluding great inefficiency; but it does not necessarily follow that you ought to carry it much further, or that you should go on to institute a competitive examination for all the offices of the State. A competitive examination is, in fact, the most uncertain of all examinations. Take the case of three young men competing for an office. If two out of the three happen to be men of ability, the test is a good one for the third, but if they happen to be men of little or no ability he may gain an easy victory. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer prefers the system of examination that prevails in another country, and which was recently illustrated by a Chinese gentleman who resides in this country, and who is the Chinese Examiner for the Civil Service Commission. This gentleman mentioned with pride that in his native country he came out of an examination where there were no less than 8,000 candidates. I do not know whether the aspirations of my right hon. Friend would bring about such a result. I should not myself desire to see it, nor do I think our present system of competitive examination compensates for the annoyance it causes to individuals by the benefit it confers upon the State.

LORD STANLEY: I congratulate my hon. Friend who has brought forward this Motion on having at last succeeded, after four or five unsuccessful attempts, in bringing this subject fully and fairly before the House. I can only say that if any one of those gentlemen in whom he takes so strong an interest, and who have not been fortunate enough to satisfy the requirements of the Civil Service Commissioners, had shown half as much industry and perseverance in supporting their pretensions as he has on their behalf, I do not think there would have been any grievance or failure on their part. My hon. Friend has raised two questions which, though connected, are at the same time quite distinct. On the general argument I am ready to meet him—namely, as to the merits or demerits of a system of public competition. But he has also made a specific charge against the Committee, that the Report to which they came is contrary to the evidence on which that Report professes to be founded. Now, a charge of unfairness against a Committee is one of a grave character, and I wish that my hon. Friend, if he thought himself justified in preferring such a charge, had gone more into detail, and had furnished more ample proof in support of his assertion. Because, when you are dealing with evidence extending through 400 folio pages, it is not a very satisfactory way of giving the general effect of that evidence to look for any sentence you may find here or there in favour of your own view, instead of collecting the general sense and purport from the perusal of the whole. I have not been able, in the short time that has passed since my hon. Friend addressed the House, to refer more than cursorily to the evidence which he professed to cite; but I have seen enough to enable me to say that, even in regard to the witnesses referred to, the statements of my hon. Friend are not entirely borne out by the evidence. My hon. Friend began by quoting Mr. Arbuthnot, and made a great point by representing that, according to Mr. Arbuthnot's evidence, certain clerks coming into the service by the competitive system are, from their position, dissatisfied with their appointments. Now, going rapidly over the evidence, I find that Mr. Arbuthnot has given the following answers:—

"Q. 795.—That being the case, do you think it is fair to ascribe what you call the discontent in that class to the system of competition?—Certainly not.

And he goes on to state what, in his belief, is the real cause of this alleged discontent—

"Q. 796.—Do you think that the fact of holding those offices up to competition does to some extent induce men to think them more valuable than they really are?—I cannot say. I think that the salaries are fixed much too high for the class of work that is required, and that that has tempted men of superior intelligence to compete for them."

Therefore, according to Mr. Arbuthnot, whatever may be the reason of the discontent to which my hon. Friend referred, the competitive system is not the cause. I quote this instance, not because it is in itself particularly important—for the class alluded to is a very limited class—but I refer to it because it is an example of the manner in which the evidence has been dealt with by my hon. Friend.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Will the noble Lord read Questions 772 and 805?

LORD STANLEY: I do not think it is my business to read over such portions of the evidence as my hon. Friend may select; I am only endeavouring to show that his own witnesses do not support his attack on the Report of the Committee; but if my hon. Friend thinks I am doing injustice to his argument, other hon. Members who take the same view with my hon. Friend will be able to reply to my remarks. I am simply defending the Report of the Committee. With respect to the evidence of Mr. Tilley, I do not find any fault with the manner in which it has been used by my hon. Friend. That evidence is, on the whole, unfavourable to the system of competition; and, unfavourable as it is, it will be found summed up in the Report. And here let me say once for all, that, whatever other fault may be found with our Report, there is one part of it to which I believe my hon. Friend can take no objection, and that is the summary given of the evidence of the witnesses. The fairness of that summary may be relied on, and I will tell the House why. All parties were represented on the Committee; there was considerable difference of opinion on the abstract question of competition or no competition; every proposition which admitted of dispute, and a good many which I should have thought admitted of no dispute, was controverted, yet it will be seen that those paragraphs in which the evidence was summed up were passed without any division, or with not more than one division. That is a sufficient proof that the summary fairly represents the bulk of the evidence taken before the Committee. I now go on to the case of Mr. Romilly. That gentleman was quoted by my hon. Friend as being one of those whose evidence was hostile to the principle of these competitive examinations; but, in answer to questions put to him, he stated (Q. 2,749-50) that the effect of the examinations before the Civil Service Commissioners had been to increase the efficiency of the clerks, and that previously to the Civil Service Examinations certain clerks, totally inefficient, came into his office, but that since that time no such case had occurred, and that he thought there was now a marked difference. That gentleman went on to say, at Q. 2,810, that many years since, before the Civil Service Commissioners were in existence, a gentleman was appointed in his office who could hardly read or write—he was, in fact, almost an idiot, and there was the greatest possible difficulty in getting him out of the office. I think, therefore, that it was not a very wise proceeding on the part of my hon. Friend to call Mr. Romilly as a witness in his favour, if, as he said, he wanted to prove the deterioration of the service in consequence of the examination test. I proceed to the case of Mr. Waddington. Everybody knows that he was a strong opponent to the institution of the Civil Service Commissioners, and my hon. Friend quoted evidence formerly given by him to that effect. He is not now favourable to the system of unlimited competition; but, from his answers to questions put to him before the Committee, the House will see that it is not reasonable to cite him as being one of those whose evidence is entirely opposed to the system of competition; for he answers the questions put to him thus—

“Q. 3,013.—Taking into consideration the system of limited competition among a certain number of candidates, do you think that that system has decided advantages over one of simple nomination?”

“Answer.—I should prefer it, undoubtedly; and I think it is not open to any objection on the score of inconvenience, and that it does give some additional chance of having superior men.”

And in the next answer he goes on to add, that—

“Within the limit where no great inconvenience is produced by the number of candidates, he should prefer a more extended competition.”

Yet the hon. Gentleman quotes Mr. Waddington as one of the witnesses to whose evidence justice has not been done. I do not wish to weary the House with extracts; but still, as we have been charged with misrepresenting the evidence, it is necessary to show that the charge is without foundation. Mr. Hammond is my hon. Friend's last witness, and he says (Q. 3,433) that he is—

“Perfectly satisfied with the clerks who have been appointed since competition has been established; he has no reason to doubt that they will come up to the standard required.”

And now I think I have done something to refute the charge brought against us if I show that four out of the five gentlemen cited by my hon. Friend have given answers which, in a more or less degree, are favourable to the system of competition, while the fifth, whose evidence is partially unfavourable, is quoted at full length in the Report. I now pass on to a minor matter, and I do not think my hon. Friend dealt quite fairly with the House when he read out the list of questions which excited so much amusement. They were not questions put by the Civil Service Commissioners, or to candidates for the Civil Service, and, therefore, have nothing to do with the evidence taken before this Committee, but they were introduced in the present discussion because it was thought that they would throw ridicule or odium on the system. It is not my business to defend the aptness of every particular question asked by every Examiner, and in the list read by the hon. Member there were some which, perhaps, had better not have been put. At the same time I think that, even in reference to these questions, justice has not been done by the manner in which they have been quoted, because anybody who heard my hon. Friend read them out would suppose that these were questions which every candidate was expected to answer. So far from that I find that the five or six subjects for English composition which excited so much amusement have been selected, not at random, but very ingeniously for his purpose, from a list of sixty-nine subjects, on any one of which a candidate might write his essay. If you are to have a test of English composition, a considerable latitude of choice must be given, and it cannot affect the general character of the examination that some out of a long list of questions had better not have been put. Then my hon. Friend says, "Why did you not examine other witnesses besides those which you called?" I do not think that either members of the diplomatic body or military officers are at all likely to know so much of the requirements of the Civil Service as those witnesses whom we did examine. I deny most strenuously that we refused to call any witnesses on the ground that their views were hostile to the views of a majority of the Committee. I know enough of the feeling of those with whom I sat to feel assured that if there was any bias in the matter they would be more scrupulous of hearing in the fullest extent the case of those who constituted a minority rather than the case of those whose views they themselves supported. Both parties were fairly represented. Our discussions were animated, and not brief, and no complaint was ever made by any Member of the Committee that material evidence was excluded. With regard to the more general question of limited or unlimited competition, I almost hesitate to go into arguments which have been so often reiterated. But I must just observe that my hon. Friend cuts the ground altogether from beneath his feet when he says—not very consistently with his former remarks—that he does not object to a mere pass test, however severe. The strongest argument for a competitive examination is that a mere pass test can never be kept up. When there are the interests of the candidate on one side and only the interest of the public on the other, there is always an inclination to lower the test, and make the admission easier; and thus a test which at the beginning is very strict often ends in being no test at all. But the moment you introduce the competitive element that difficulty altogether vanishes, because, although an Examiner may be inclined to show tenderness to a candidate who ought not to pass, he has no possible motive to favour one candidate in preference to another. My hon. Friend complains that when a competitive examination is the mode of entering the service a man's career depends on the accident of his examination being successful. No doubt, no test that you can devise, whether intellectual or otherwise, can be absolutely conclusive. Accident plays a large part in all human affairs. All men do better at one time than they do at another. But when it is said that a man's career may turn on an accident, let us look at the matter on the other alternative. Is it not better that a man's career should depend on the accident that he has done a little better or a little worse on one particular day than on average occasions, than that it should turn on the accident of his having been born in a small constituency, whose representative is intimate with a Minister having a good deal of patronage at his command? It has often been said, and may be said again to-night, that the system gives irresponsible patronage to the Examiners. But, replying to that in advance, I say that I can as little conceive that the system gives to the Examiners an irresponsible patronage over the Civil Service appointments, as I can conceive that the Judges of the land have an irresponsible power over property because they decide the disputes of those who come before them as litigants. The hon. Gentleman has proved that the Examiners are not irresponsible; for he, and another hon. Friend of mine on a former occasion, have given ample proof of willingness to criticise whatever they may do amiss. Their decisions—I do not mean in individual cases, but the general principles upon which those decisions are formed—are subject to the criticism, and, if need be, to the censure of the House, and that responsibility is much more likely to be enforced than the responsibility of a person holding a judicial office. We do not complain of the irresponsibility of a magistrate or a County Court Judge when they judicially decide on cases which come before them; and yet it is very difficult to say that the magistrate who sentences a man to imprisonment, and the County Court Judge who tries claims to considerable property, do not exercise quite as important powers as the Examiners when they decide that a man shall or shall not enter the Civil Service. Then, there is the old objection of "cramming." If, when the word is used, it is meant to apply to a candidate who learns for the purpose of the examination by rote something which he does not understand, then, in that strict sense, cramming is one of the rarest things possible to happen, because it is much more difficult for a man to learn that which he does not understand in order to reproduce it from memory on paper, than to learn that which he does understand. If all that is meant by cramming is that candidates acquire a good deal of knowledge for the examination which they afterwards contrive to forget, I do not deny that cramming takes place; but to it I see no objection. We all of us at some period of our lives do the same. Counsel, who have to get up briefs, or Members of this House who wish to speak on questions of the day, must prepare themselves in much the same manner; and I believe there is no better test of a capacity for business in its higher branches than the power to acquire accurately, and to reproduce easily, knowledge which has been gained for the occasion. A good deal has been said as to the test being an intellectual test, and not a test of moral character. My answer to that is that in the case of the Civil Service Commissioners there is precisely the same test of moral character as in the case of patronage exercised by a Minister. Any one against whom anything is known is not admitted; and it is idle to say that the knowledge of a Minister as to the persons whom he is appointing goes further than that. I do not defend the system of competition merely on the ground that it is an assistant to public education. Of course, the object is to get the best men to carry on the work of the Civil Service; and we ought not to sacrifice that object to any other consideration, however important. But there is one point which we ought to consider, and it is this:—I believe that any person who is interested in our Parliamentary form of Government and in the purity of public life must be glad to do that which in him lies to diminish—I do not say that kind of patronage which is exercised before the public, the right of appointing to high and important places, because that right is generally exercised in a very fair spirit—but to diminish or restrict that kind of patronage which, from its unimportance, is not exercised under any check or control from public opinion, and which, nevertheless, in some constituencies, may be as effective a means of demoralization as the most open bribery. I do not mean to dwell upon that. I should have been prepared to go into a general discussion; but before doing so I should have preferred to hear more fully what can be said on the other side. My chief object is to vindicate the fairness of the conclusions to which the Committee came, and to show that the Report is fairly founded upon the evidence before us. And if the House will only bear in mind the instances which the hon. Gentleman has himself selected, and the comments which I have made on those instances, I think they will not come to the conclusion that we have abused the important power which the House reposes in every Committee—that of investigating and reporting upon facts which from their multiplicity and minuteness cannot possibly be examined in detail by the House itself.

MR. BENTINCK maintained that the opinion he had on a former occasion expressed—that the Civil Service Commissioners possessed an irresponsible power—was a correct one. He had heard nothing at present to confute it. The noble Lord who had just resumed his seat had compared them to County Court and other Judges; but he saw no affinity between them; the one had to decide upon a right, the other upon the merits of a candidate. The Commissioners were not only completely irresponsible, even to public opinion, but they contended that if they were once made responsible their utility would be gone; and, therefore, it was that they declined to give the grounds on which they arrived at their decision, contending that nobody had any right to make any inquiry into the course of proceeding which they might have followed; yet on that decision rested the patronage of all the public offices in this country. He asked the House was that a position which could be maintained for one moment? and whether the Government could point to any other body of men who were totally irresponsible? He had ventured to impugn that position last year, and inasmuch as it had been now alluded to, he had thought fit to revert to this question of responsibility, and to show that by their own language they would consider that if once they were made responsible they would be rendered useless.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not rise to trouble the House with anything like a reply to the speech of the hon. Member who introduced the subject, for it would be quite superfluous to do so after the able speeches of the hon. Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Hennessy) and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). The hon. Member who has just sat down has very judiciously avoided any defence of the statements of the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane), and has raised another issue which forms no part of the proposition in the Motion. I really must appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton as to the manner in which he has treated this question. I believe him to be the last man in the House who would be guilty of wilful misrepresentation; but, through the inveteracy of the prejudices—I might almost say of the passions—with which he has approached the discussion of the subject, he has certainly fallen into unconscious misrepresentation. For instance, my hon. Friend cited Sir James Stephen as a witness to the admirable condition of the Civil Service in the golden age prior to the introduction of these abominable examinations; but the passage which he quoted refers to a totally different matter, and embodies Sir James's opinion on the competitive system, which, as all the world knows, was unfavourable in the last degree. Sir James Stephen, in his evidence, divided the civil servants in the Colonial Department into three classes:—The first class, he said, comprised the narrow circle of men of admirable abilities; and the second the men who performed their duties diligently and faithfully. Sir James went on to say—

“The members of the third class, who formed the majority of the members of the Colonial Department in my time”—ranging from 1812 to 1848 or 1850—“possessed only in a low degree, and some of them in a degree almost incredibly low, either the talents or habits of men of business, or the industry, zeal, or knowledge required for the effective performance of their appropriate functions.”

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I believe I copied accurately the passage which I read from Sir James Stephen's evidence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no doubt my hon. Friend did so. What I say is that it referred to a different point from that on which he claimed the support of Sir James Stephen's opinion. Sir James, however, told us further how the large class of inefficient men whom he had described came to hold office. He said—

“The members of that class to which I have given the designation of the third class were, without exception, men who had been appointed to gratify the political, domestic, or personal feelings of their patrons—that is, successive Secretaries of State.”

I am somewhat surprised that my hon. Friend should presume to challenge the fairness of the Report of the Committee, regardless of the fact that it was composed of men to whom the House gave their confidence, that it embraced every shade of opinion, and that the view adverse to competition was backed up by the support of two Secretaries to the Treasury on opposite sides of the House, who found no reason to appeal against the decision of the Committee. Yet my hon. Friend comes down armed with a great blue book, reads certain passages, selected in the manner of which the noble Lord opposite has exhibited the fairness, and calls on the House to reverse the decision of the Committee. A stranger proposal I have in my Parliamentary experience scarcely ever heard. I regret for the sake of my hon. Friend himself, but also for the sake of others, the keenness and warmth with which he presses this question. I cannot think that he is sufficiently mindful of what we owe to the Civil Service Commissioners. It is beyond dispute that these Gentlemen are engaged in the performance of a duty which is in itself a very difficult one, and which, moreover, they have to fulfil in the face of great pressure from personal and selfish interests. They are the friends and champions of the public interests against interests of another character—very watchful interests, which, without the countenance which they receive from the hon. Member, are always sufficiently vigilant and determined in carrying out their purposes. I think that Gentlemen in that position are entitled to be spared being made the subjects of ridicule and sarcasm, especially of ridicule and sarcasm founded upon selections of questions made with so much, I am sure involuntary, but substantial unfairness as those of my hon. Friend. What

I think most unfair in his mode of dealing with this subject was that in the early part of his speech he led us to suppose that he was dealing with questions asked of candidates for situations in the Civil Service, strictly so called, and proceeded to quote a number of questions which we imagined were to be put to letter carriers, clerks, or tidewaiters; and it was not until he was interrupted in a very timely manner by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn that he, with apparent reluctance, disclosed that the questions as to the component parts of stone and the submersion of the British islands were not to be asked of letter carriers, tidewaiters, or clerks, but of gentlemen who were intended for the service of Engineers, and who, therefore, absolutely required a knowledge of those subjects. The perseverance of my hon. Friend is so great that I have no doubt that even, although his Motion is negatived to-night, he will return to the charge; but I do beseech him, if he does so to make his attack, if he pleases, with so much courage and as determined a spirit as he has shown to-night, but, at the same time, with greater care, with greater fairness, and a more anxious desire to do justice, not merely to the feelings, for that is but a small matter, but the efficiency of those gentlemen who were engaged in most important duties. My hon. Friend is very zealous for a test examination; but I am afraid that the reason he is so fond of such an examination is that for which other persons dislike it. If we could really keep a test examination up to the mark, I do not think that there is much to be said against it. That, however, is impossible; and, knowing that defection is the necessary law of test examinations—that they are perpetually tending downwards, therefore it is that my hon. Friend professes his inclination and admiration for them. I will not enter more at length into this subject, which has been succinctly, but very ably treated by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn; but I must tell the hon. Member for Honiton that he quite misapprehends the case when he speaks of the discussion in which he has been engaged, and the system which now exists, as one of competitive examination. The truth is, it has been only to a very limited degree a question of competitive examination. It would, indeed, be absurd to think that such a system could be brought to a final test and judgment upon the evidence which is now in our possession. It appears to me that the Committee upon the whole took a judicious course in not attempting to make any great change of principle in this system, but endeavouring to make it what it professes to be, and to provide that it shall be really, even though to a limited extent, a system of competition. The main object of the Committee was to provide that the competition which now exists should have a certain foundation which should be given to it by a previous test examination. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) has said, the competition under the present system is in many cases almost nugatory; it may, in some instances, happen that all the candidates are unfit to stand. At all events, we cannot judge fairly of the principle of the present system until by some such means as are recommended by the Committee a test examination shall be introduced, in order to insure the reality of the subsequent competition. I think that the evidence which has been quoted, especially that of Mr. Waddington, who, though formerly an opponent of, has now given his sanction to, the principle of a limited competition, shows that this system, as far as it has gone, has upon the whole done good. If we desire to prevent a recurrence to the intolerable abuses of the old system, and to secure the full benefit of the new one, we must proceed in the spirit of the cautious and judicious recommendations of the Committee; and if we do not try anything of a broader character let us at least endeavour to insure the reality of that competition which we have adopted as the condition of first entrance into the lower offices of the public service.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that after the language in which the right hon. Gentleman had addressed his hon. Friend, the Member for Honiton, and the severity with which he had challenged his statements, he should not be acting fairly to his hon. Friend as one who thought with him if he did not say a few words upon the subject. The reference of the right hon. Gentleman to the opinions of Sir James Stephen was a fair sample of the mode in which Motions of this kind were always met. They urged that this system was causing the decay of the Civil Service, and were answered by being told that before that system was introduced there existed great abuses. It was true that Sir James Stephen had spoken in severe terms, which were indignantly protested against at the time, of the old Civil Service as it existed in his time; but it was equally true that he had spoken in terms still stronger and still more contemptuous against the system of competition. The right hon. Gentleman, the noble Lord, the Member for King's Lynn, and his hon. Friend, the Member for the King's County, had all relied much upon the verdict of the Committee; but, constituted as that Committee was, consisting as it did of ten eager competitionists, of four who were opposed to competition, and of one Gentleman whose opinions were not decided, its Report could not be held to be a fair representation of the opinion of the House of Commons, nor was it a tribunal to which any one could appeal with confidence. Nothing could have been more unjust than to charge his hon. Friend with garbling the extracts which he read from the evidence, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, taking the opinions of the whole of the witnesses, his hon. Friend had not rather understated than overstated his case? The opinions which Sir Thomas Fremantle obtained from public servants engaged in the Custom House would show whether or not his hon. Friend had misrepresented the facts. One gentleman said that there was about the clerks who had been appointed under the new system a self-sufficient presumption arising from imagined intellectual superiority. Another gentleman spoke of "a desire for literature in business." Another complained of "a fondness for discussion, argumentative display, and private reading and writing during office hours." One head of a department complained that his clerks looked upon their duties as beneath their abilities, and another stated that "the clerks possessing more intellectual abilities than their duties require become dissatisfied with the monotony of their occupations, and are less valuable than clerks of sufficient though less attainments." These were strong and important statements, especially coming as they did, not from private individuals, but from heads of Departments, who suffered from the defects of which they complained. His noble Friend complained that a charge of unfairness had been impliedly made against the Committee, and had not been substantiated by evidence in detail. The Committee had certainly not given to the evidence of the Custom-house officers the weight which they deserved; but there was a far stronger point against them.

The Committee reported directly in favour of open competition; while, with the exception of Mr. H. Chester, who was a member of the Society of Arts, all the heads of Departments had pronounced an opinion strongly against it. Sir Thomas Fremantle, Mr. Tilly, Sir Benjamin Hawes, Mr. Romilly, Sir Richard Bromley, Mr. Sargeant, and Mr. Waddington had, among others, said that open competition would be injurious to the public service, and some of them had used the strongest terms in expressing their opinion; yet the Committee had, despite that fact, reported that the evidence which they had received was in favour of open competition. Now it appeared to him to be impossible to adduce a stronger case of a verdict against evidence. But if he were to make any positive charge of unfairness in the matter, it would be with respect to the composition of the Committee, who, not unnaturally, drew up a Report in accordance with the opinions which the majority of its members were from the first known to entertain. He had risen to repel the attack made upon his Friend, the Member for Honiton, and would not, therefore, further pursue that subject. But he would express his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Oxford, should, with his experience, have endorsed the opinion that test examinations were incapable of being maintained at the level on which they were originally placed. That the noble Lord, the Member for King's Lynn, who was a Cambridge man, should entertain that view he should not be so much astonished; but, be that as it might, there was at Oxford a certain standard fixed to which every candidate was expected to come up, and, although that system had been going on for the last thirty or forty years, he had not the slightest complaint that the standard had been lowered either in deference to the wishes of the parents of the candidates, or from other causes; the complaint, on the contrary, being that it had risen year by year. It was, he might add, unjust to charge those who took the same view of the subject under discussion as he did with being animated by a desire to set themselves in opposition to merit or to protect ignorance. The first question in reference to persons seeking public employment should be as to their merit; and for his own part, he was ready to admit that examinations properly conducted were, to a certain extent, a very efficient means of ascertaining merit. While, however, he made that admission he could by no means concede that because a man was found to possess some scholarly and literary merits, he was, as a matter of course, fitted to be appointed to a clerkship in a public office, or to be nominated to an ensigncy in a marching regiment. There ought, he maintained, to be some sort of connection between the examination to which a candidate was subjected and the profession which he was about to adopt. The supporters of the present system discovered that a youth could compose an eloquent panegyric on Garibaldi, or turn love verses into the form of a Latin elegy, and then they were ready to make him a clerk in an office, to post up accounts, or send him to govern a whole district in India. To proceed upon that system was, however, he should contend, just as absurd as it would be to appoint a man Archbishop of Canterbury because he happened to be a good rifle shot, or to give him the command of an army in the field because he was able to preach an effective sermon. It was this incompatibility to which the opponents of this system objected. It was said that this system worked equally well for the candidates as for the public service, and that there was nothing so onerous or burdensome to a candidate for a public appointment as to have to loiter in ante-chambers seeking for the patronage to great men. Now, for his own part, he was far from desiring that that should be the case; but having adverted to the point, he might be permitted to draw attention to the injury which was inflicted on the candidate under the present system. Great eulogiums had been passed on the Civil Service Commissioners, and he should be the last to seek to detract from their merits; but he must, at the same time, remind the House that those eulogiums were beside the question. Parliament, in dealing with the subject under discussion, was legislating, not for a few years but for all time, and it might be that new Commissioners with very different characters from the present might be appointed under very different circumstances. Bearing those considerations in mind, he should endeavour to point out to the House the injury which was by the existing system inflicted on the candidate. That system had, he should contend, been justly called a system of irresponsible patronage. It was, indeed, sought to be maintained that the Judges of the land might, with as much propriety, be called irresponsible as the tribunal to which he was adverting. There was, however, the striking difference between the Judges and the Commissioners—that the former transacted their business in the light of day, and that their proceedings were published in the newspapers and freely commented upon by the community at large—so that if it should happen by any chance that one of their body was found to be corrupt or incapable, public opinion might immediately be brought effectually to bear upon the matter; the Civil Service Commissioners, on the other hand, conducted their proceedings in the dark, ascertaining from written papers what the merits of the several candidates were, deciding upon those merits without any publicity, and pronouncing a decree from which, though it might involve the success or ruin of a young man, no appeal was allowed, either to a superior Judge appointed to revise the verdicts of his inferiors, or, as was proved by the experience of last year, even to the House of Commons itself. Without, therefore, wishing to say one single word which could be construed as offensive to the Commissioners, he could not help declaring it to be his opinion that such a system as that of which he was speaking was fraught with danger in a constitutional country like England. They had no right to hand over that patronage of the Crown which escaped public attention to men who judged in the dark, who had no check from publicity, and from whose decision there was no appeal; and he believed the House of Commons would before many years be disposed to look upon the question in a much more serious light than was at present the case. There was as yet, he was aware, no chance of inducing hon. Members to set aside a system on behalf of which it might, perhaps, with some reason be urged that it had not yet had a fair trial; but he could not, at the same time, help saying that he did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer was justified in charging those who held opposite opinions on the question from himself with being neglectful of the public service, because they had deemed it their duty to point out the vices of a tribunal which had no parallel in England.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that if the remarks of the noble Lord could be said to be directed against any body in particular that body was the House of Commons, who had, he contended, appointed an unfair Committee. If, he might add, the noble Lord was so strongly opposed to the composition of that Committee as he seemed to be, he, among other Members, ought to have objected to its appointment. He thought, however, that the fairness of the Committee was to be inferred from the modification of its Report, which did not go to the full length of either opinion. The noble Lord was evidently very much dissatisfied with that Report; and, for himself, as a pledged competitionist, he might say that he also was, in a certain degree, dissatisfied, or rather unsatisfied, with the extent to which it went. The Committee stated that they were undoubtedly of opinion that the evidence which they took made strongly in favour of open competition, but that they were anxious to avoid such precipitancy in the adoption of the system as might lead to a reaction in public feeling. They then proceeded to advise the adoption, not of a system of open, but of limited competition, founded on nomination. The evidence which they received from the public servants, he might add, was to the effect that the present system was successful so far as it went, that it required to be developed, but that they regarded it as not having been sufficiently tried to enable them to speak with sufficient confidence with respect to it. Of the witnesses, of whose impartiality there could be no doubt, an immense majority was favourable to the present system. Seven or eight gentlemen holding high office—Mr. Hammond, Sir Benjamin Hawes, Mr. Romilly, Mr. Sargent, Mr. Trevor, and Major Graham—in the different departments, all spoke of the system as having worked well; the evidence of two other witnesses did not touch the particular question; and there were but four witnesses who, on the whole, objected either to the system of examination or to that of competition. Mr. Lingden of the Education Board, who objected to competition, confined himself entirely to theory, and did not adduce any facts in support of his arguments. Mr. Arbuthnot of the Treasury was peculiarly placed, being, in fact, the representative of the old body of civil servants. In his opinion the system worked well with regard to the superior clerks in the Treasury, and, no doubt, it excluded dunces; but, with reference to the supplementary clerks, he thought it had worked unfavourably. Happening to know something of the condition of the supplementary clerks he cross-examined Mr. Arbuthnot, and elicited that the discontent prevailing among them was in no way caused by competitive examination, but arose from the erroneous and false system of salaries which was adopted. Sir Thomas Fremantle, though favourable to the system in one or two points, was, on the whole, decidedly opposed to it, and that fact was in no way disguised by the Report of the Committee, but his evidence was fully and fairly set forth. However, as additional opportunities were afforded of investigating the statements made anonymously by officers at the outposts, the extraordinary stories about persons physically unfit for duty who were appointed by the Civil Service Commissioners, to the exclusion of others in every way qualified, had entirely broken down; for it turned out, as would be seen by reference to the last Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, that every one of the incompetent persons was originally nominated and recommended by these very officers at the outposts who now complained of them. The Civil Service Commissioners recommended a scheme in which physical qualifications would be the test, and Sir Thomas Fremantle, he believed, adopted that scheme. His noble Friend stated that some of the gentlemen appointed were very high and mighty, and altogether above their business. But in the good old times, when men were selected by patronage, he had known a case in which a man was appointed a tidewaiter who was son to an influential voter in a certain borough, which had the honour of returning a Cabinet Minister. He soon found that the post was very much below his deserts, and he declared that he would get his influential friends to remove him; but in the meantime he became so insubordinate that he had to be dismissed. He went to his right hon. Friend and succeeded in getting appointed to another situation, which he held for two or three years; but ultimately he had to be again dismissed for insubordination by the successor of the right hon. Gentleman. Yet this had happened under the patronage system—that golden age, which was now broken up. Mr. Tilley, of the Post Office, said the effect of the Civil Service Examinations was to render it impossible to get proper persons to execute the duties of sorters, letter-carriers, and other inferior officers. But, on cross-examination, he admitted that the best remedy would be in open competition, and that no difficulty whatever existed in getting men from a similar class for the police. The Commissioners wrote to the Postmaster General, proposing that the system, which was apparently favoured by Mr. Tilley and Mr. Trollope, should be adopted. The Duke of Argyll, who was then locum tenens at the Post Office, approved the suggestion, and, physical qualifications having been adopted as the test, the minor appointments were thrown perfectly open to competition; but on the accession to office of Lord Stanley of Alderley, without a single reason assigned, the open system and the physical test were abolished, and the appointments at the Post Office were replaced on their old footing. He did not mean to impute anything improper to Lord Stanley of Alderley, who might have had very good reasons for the course which he adopted; but it was unfair in the same breath to complain of the educational qualifications required by the Civil Service Commissioners as impediments, and to repudiate the improvements which they suggested. The matter ought to be treated in a different spirit. The Commissioners had no wish to interfere with the Departments, but they entertained a belief—which he was persuaded was the right one—that if good men were wanted the appointments should be thrown open to competition. Sufficient evidence had been obtained to show that there was not the slightest inconvenience or danger in open competition, and were it adopted the absurd difficulties which arose from the attempt to enforce a test examination would cease to exist. The way in which the evidence and opinions elicited by the Commissioners had been quoted was most extraordinary. He wished to call the attention of the House to what Sir James Stephen said in evidence, which, in the report of Sir Charles Trevelyan, himself was described as the “evidence of an eminent public officer.” In that statement he said that he remembered only four instances in which young men had been introduced into the public service on the ground of eminent fitness. After having attacked the system of open competition, Sir James went on to say that in order to provide a remedy for the evils which existed in his time he would subject each nominee to an examination, to be conducted by strangers to the Government, by men of indisputable learning and integrity, who would admit every candidate who had attained a certain standard of knowledge and reject those who had not. [Mr. B. COCHRANE: He says more.] It was quite true that Sir James Stephen did speak of the rashness of plunging into deep dark waters without first making an experimental attempt; but such an attempt had been made. A Committee was appointed last year on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy), and after a full inquiry the Committee made a conscientious Report which, while not going the length to which the private opinion of certainly a large majority of the Members extended, recommended a small tentative experimental advance on the existing system. One witness spoke strongly against the competitive system. He alluded to Sir Richard Bromley, who was in favour of preserving nominations, and said he trusted the system would never be carried to open competition; adding that, as an old public servant, he hoped he should never see the tie which existed between Members of the House of Commons and the public service severed. But what did Sir Richard Bromley say in 1854? Why, he complained that in some branches of the public service there was a want of that moral tone which was so essential in the common affairs of life; and he spoke of men of talent seeing their inferiors advancing before them. Sir Richard Bromley's principal objection to the abolition of the nomination system seemed to be that it would deprive Members of that House of the advantage of putting their relatives and friends into public offices. He believed that to be at the bottom of the whole thing. His hon. Friend had read the titles of some of the essays which candidates were required to write; but there were others which he might have read with equal advantage. One of these was “Write a letter as to a friend describing the nature and duties of the office for which you are a candidate, and the qualifications you have for it.” Another was “Write a letter applying for any place or situation, and mentioning any reason you have in support of your application.” Under the existing system there might be a number of able young men, fit to enter the public service, but who could not get nominations because the party with which they had influence did not happen to be in power. Such young men watched every division in that House, and every election; but perhaps the change did not come till they were too old. That was a state of things which we should put an end to as soon as possible.

He believed we should never get rid of it till we adopted that which we must soon come to—a system of open competition.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was a Member of the Committee, and he quite admitted that the Report of the Committee was not so strong as he could have wished. At the same time he fully admitted the fairness and impartiality with which the noble Lord had summed up the evidence. The hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to establish that great injury was being done to individuals by the present system. In reply to that he would refer to the evidence of Major Graham, who was appointed the chief of a new office, which was improvised in 1836, that of the registry of births, marriages, and deaths. Mr. Graham said that on the occasion of the establishment of that office many persons were appointed to situations in it who were very objectionable, through age, broken health, bad character, or want of proper qualifications. One person had been a fraudulent debtor, another had been guilty of fraudulent acts, a third was unable from ill health to associate with his fellow-clerks—he had been obliged to live in a separate room, and afterwards died; others were inefficient. The deputy registrar performed no duty for fifteen months; the duties of another officer were transferred to the solicitor to the Treasury. Twelve of the least efficient had been dismissed in 1852, eleven or twelve had been removed afterwards, and four had been dismissed for disgraceful conduct. Now, a new system might have to be improvised any day; but a competitive system would exclude some of the least competent and worst qualified. If a Government were to remain in office, say for ten years or longer, a large class of the community would be deprived of advantages which ought to be open for the benefit of all. He (Mr. Maguire) had been asked over and over again for nominations. But he was compelled to refuse, knowing that in order to obtain them a Member must be a thick and thin supporter of the Government, and if he were to obtain a place the Secretary of the Treasury would look extremely black if he happened to see him in the opposite lobby. This was not only degrading to a Member of the House, but it impeded his free action. The noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) had said that the present system made the members of the service dissatisfied. But he (Mr. Maguire) had inquired into this, and he found that in no case had this dissatisfaction led to insubordination; men gradually became satisfied with the positions they occupied. Mr. Fremantle, in his examination, was obliged to admit that the Government themselves were not anxious for the exercise of this power. But though it was a source of inconvenience to them, they were unwilling to give it up, as a source of power. Even in the case of candidates who failed, the education and examination which they went through was no loss to them; a class of better educated men was an advantage to the country; they had an increased stock of intellectual power, and were animated by a spirit of emulation. He cordially hoped to see the question carried further by the House.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE wished to explain that the noble Lord had misunderstood his statement with regard to Sir James Stephen's evidence. What he meant to say was that Sir James Stephen preferred the system which prevailed in 1855 to the system of competitive examination, which it was then proposed to introduce. The noble Lord complained that he had not proved his assertions from the evidence; but he had been unwilling to trespass on the time of the House by quoting his authorities, and his statement that the Report was not justified by the evidence, had been borne out by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes). In the present state of the House, so many of his hon. Friends having left their seats, he would not trouble the House to divide. He would, therefore, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

Put, and agreed to.

SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether accounts have been received that M. de Lesseps has induced the Viceroy of Egypt to employ large numbers of natives by forced labour in the construction of the Suez Canal? and expressed his opinion that the noble Lord, in his desire to oppose a plan which he deemed injurious to this country, had, in fact, given indirect encouragement to it; for to say that the execution of such a work would give other European powers the start of us in the way to India, rendered the enterprise at once attractive in the eyes of the French. Twenty years ago it was the noble Lord's policy to reduce a rebellious vassal of the Porte, who had made himself almost master of Egypt, to the state of a dependent Pasha, and ever since that period French policy had found favour in the eyes of the Pashas of Egypt. The result was that the present Pasha had been induced to enter into the enterprise to which his Question referred, and to employ, it was said, forced labour, which was nothing but slavery under another name. He condemned the interference of England between Mehmet Ali and the Sultan. Had the Pasha of Egypt been allowed to establish his independent power, the influence of England in Egypt would have been much greater than it was now with the country under the nominal but illusory government of the Porte. But he did not think the noble Lord, in similar circumstances, would venture to repeat that policy of interference for which he, rather gratuitously, set France at defiance. He did not complain that the noble Lord the Prime Minister should be of opinion that the Suez Canal was extremely difficult and almost impossible—for in that opinion he himself had always concurred—but he did complain that the noble Lord should have characterized it as a “bubble scheme,” which was an expression conveying gratuitous offence to the promoters. It was not likely to realize any profits for the shareholders; but that might be said of many great English works, such as the Thames Tunnel and the Great Eastern. And yet nobody applied to them opprobrious epithets on that account. He approved the recent policy of the Foreign Secretary in reference to Syria. The honour of France was satisfied by the occupation of Syria; and that the occupation had been terminated was satisfactory also. The hon. Member concluded by asking the First Lord of the Treasury whether accounts had been received that M. de Lesseps had induced the Viceroy of Egypt to employ large numbers of Natives, by forced labour, in the construction of the Suez Canal; and by moving an Address for copy of any despatches that may have passed on the subject of forced labour of Natives of Egypt in the construction of the Suez Canal. He begged to ask the noble Lord whether he could justify his policy of the past, and give some assurances for the future?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he rose to a point of order more than to answer the question.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that the noble

Mr. Darby Griffith

Lord could only speak to the Motion before the House, and that Motion was that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND. QUESTION.

COLONEL DICKSON said, in pursuance of notice, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What he considers the position of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to be with reference to the Government of that Country, and whether the Earl of Carlisle intends to retain that office? As to the office itself he (Colonel Dickson) thought the Irish people generally wished for its continuance; and if the opinion of the individual who filled the office was properly considered, and he desired to pursue a wise policy in regard to that country, it might be one of great utility. He believed that the noble Earl who at present filled that office was thoroughly imbued with the desire to promote the prosperity of the country. It was absolutely necessary, however, that the person filling that office should be consulted, and whatever opinion was entertained by him with respect to the welfare of the country ought to be fully carried out. It had been a reproach to the Government that they had not in their councils a single Irishman; but at the present time that ought to be considered more as a necessity than as a subject of reproach, because, after what had lately happened, no candidate could show his face on the hustings in Ireland with much chance of success as the regular supporter of the present Government. The present Chief Secretary for Ireland could have no very intimate knowledge of the opinions, or, if they chose to call them so, the prejudices of Irishmen. Nevertheless, unsupported as he was by even an Irish Lord of the Treasury, he stood forward on the present occasion, utterly ignoring the existence of a Lord Lieutenant, and acting more as a Minister for Ireland than as that noble Earl's secretary. He (Colonel Dickson) had no wish to open again the question of the Galway contract, but that contract which had been agreed to by hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, had been steadily opposed by hon. Members opposite, until the hostility to it culminated in its abrupt annulment by the Postmaster General, who stood notoriously before the public as certainly a strong partisan. The Government had taken upon itself to adopt this proceeding and to share the responsibility of the conduct of their colleague. The Secretary for Ireland called it a departmental question, and deliberately stated that he did not think there was any occasion to consult the Lord Lieutenant in the matter, because he had nothing to do with it. If this were so he should like to know what could not be called a departmental question? If the Government acted in a similar manner to the Governor General of India or the Governor of a colony he would resign immediately. In his opinion the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ought to have the immediate control of the government of that country—of course with the assistance of his colleagues. In saying this he spoke as an Irish representative, and asked that the same treatment should be accorded to that country which was given to other colonies or dependencies of this country. He hoped the noble Lord would distinctly state what he considered was the proper position of the Lord Lieutenant. He could not conceive any more contemptible position for a British Peer than to be the puppet of his own Secretary, while he appeared in the borrowed plumes of mock royalty, and aped the pageantry of a Royal Court, while he had not an atom of power to carry his own views into effect, or to do anything that he considered would benefit the people.

INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, In what manner the provisions of Clauses 35, 36, and 58 of the Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, and of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 27, which guarantee that "all advantages as to pay, pensions, allowances, privileges, promotion, and otherwise, shall be secured to the Military Forces of the East India Company, in any plan for the reorganization of the Indian Army," are to be carried out in respect to the 1,225 officers (more or less) of the Local Armies of India who will be thrown out of employment by the reduction of the former fixed establishment of twenty-six European regimental officers to six only, to serve for the future with a Native Regiment, as directed by the Amalgamation Order published in the Calcutta Government Gazette, dated the 10th of April, 1861? The hon. and gallant Member said that the amalgamation order would convert the whole Native army of India from regular into irregular troops, reducing the fixed establishment of officers in each regiment from twenty-six to six. Originally the Native regiments had a very small number of European officers, their complement being one captain, one lieutenant, and one ensign; but, gallant as those troops were, they were found comparatively inefficient from the paucity of European officers. The history of the services of the Bengal army by Captain Williamson, show that successive additions of officers to Native regiments were deemed indispensable, and from the year 1770, to within a recent period the strength of European officers with a regiment had gradually increased to twenty-six. Now, however, the old defective system was about to be revived, and a vast body of officers would be thrown out of employment. Under the Acts of Parliament quoted the existing officers of the Native regiments were guaranteed against any loss of emoluments consequent upon the reorganization of the local army; but by the conversion of the troops from regulars into irregulars many of the officers must suffer great pecuniary as well as other disadvantages, they would lose the command allowance of a regiment, cavalry or infantry of £40 a month; the captains of cavalry would lose their "troop" allowances; and officers of infantry entitled to command companies would lose their company allowance. The appointment of quarter-master and interpreter would cease, and these losses and changes involved unquestionably a breach of faith with the army. Would the Secretary of State for India like to have a thousand actions at law brought against him for compensation by these officers? That might, however, be the case, if those gentlemen could prove that they had sustained any loss by the change. Is it not as ungenerous as unjust to forget the services of these troops. On the colours of the different Native regiments at least a hundred victories were inscribed. Until driven to rebellion by outraging their religious prejudices they had always stood faithful to us. The Madras Native army, which was wholly free from the late mutiny, was once, too, on the brink of rebellion in 1806, from Sir J. Craddock's dangerous orders interfering with the religious usages of the Madras Sepoys, but it was happily saved by Colonel Montessor, who commanded the Hyderabad subsidiary force, consisting of one European and six Native regiments. His firmness of purpose, and his courage in daring to disobey Sir J. Craddock's orders averted the mutiny; and ever since the Madras army had remained staunch in its loyalty. The Secretary of State for India had had the misfortune to impose an income tax, which created discontent, if not hostility, among the bulk of the people of India. Now he was also carrying out a measure which degraded the Native army, and caused the discontent if not hostility of the Sepoys and their European officers, while, at the same time, he was raising a feeling of discontent by the manner in which he proposed to handle the Civil Service of India. He (Colonel Sykes) lamented that he could not look with satisfaction to the probable future of our position in India.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was glad that it lay in his power to relieve his hon. and gallant Friend from the apprehensions which he had expressed. The hon. and gallant Member complained that, in consequence of the conversion of the Native army of India from regulars into irregulars, the guarantee of the Act to officers would be broken. The conversion however, had nothing whatever to do with that guarantee; in point of fact the conversion had, as far as the army of Bengal was concerned, been effected long before the amalgamation took place. Out of seventy-five regiments, sixty mutinied, were disbanded, and ceased to exist. Irregular levies were raised in their place, and were officered on the irregular system. The armies of Madras and Bombay had not yet been changed into irregulars, and whenever that operation was performed, it would be done gradually, without displacing any officer, or depriving him of any promotion, pay, or emoluments which he now enjoyed. The hon. and gallant Member also set forth the advantage of regular troops over irregulars; but the irregulars had played a distinguished part in the whole of the recent campaigns in the North of India and had displayed great gallantry and efficiency. He maintained, therefore, that his hon. and gallant Friend was mistaken in asserting that the irregular system had proved a failure. As to the Commission appointed to carry out the details of the amalgamation in India, he was very sorry it had ever been appointed, for he believed it had produced considerable mischief. No better proof of that could be afforded than the publication of the Report of the Commission against the will of the Government. That Report was based on the assumption which, as he had said, was entirely devoid of foundation, that the armies of Madras and Bombay were at once to be placed on the irregular system. That put an end to one half the case of his hon. and gallant Friend. The Commander-in-Chief had undertaken to provide employment for all the officers for whom it was stated in the Report of the Commission that no places could be found, with the single exception of the senior field-officers, who were not very competent for active service. To meet the case of these, a certain number of officers would be superannuated. There would, doubtless, be some allowances which officers now received to which they would not be entitled under the irregular system; but there would be no substantial alteration in their position. To say that the whole of the officers should retain all their emoluments and allowances was tantamount to saying that the Indian army should be kept up to its former establishment, in order to provide emoluments for the officers, without reference to the public service; and he was sure his hon. and gallant Friend was not prepared to recommend such a measure.

RECRUITING AND CLOTHING OF THE ARMY.—OBSERVATIONS.

GENERAL UPTON said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Royal Commission on Army Estimates, and to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if it be intended to adopt that portion of the Report of the Royal Commission on the present system of Recruiting the Army, which recommend that a pair of regulation boots, two shirts, two pair of socks, and one towel shall be supplied every year to the soldier; and one pair of summer trousers, one forage cap, one stock and clasp, every alternate year, at the public charge; and if so from what date such alteration will take effect? He certainly thought that two of the recommendations of that Committee deserved the attention both of the House and the country—namely, that portion which had reference to the getting rid of all the lying and quibbling, and sometimes almost kidnapping that formerly prevailed in the army, but which had now been put a stop to, as well by the recommendation of the Committee as by the order of the Commander-in-Chief? The other point was one which was of great importance to the soldier, and the hon. and gallant General contended that the best of all substitutes for increase of pay to the soldier was the finding him good clothes.

FORTIFICATIONS AT PORTSMOUTH, &c. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the nature of the Fortifications about to be erected at Spithead with reference to the very great changes now taking place in Naval Armaments; and to inquire if the Government intend to reconsider the question, whether Floating Batteries would not prove more effective for the defence of the Arsenal than the Forts proposed to be constructed on the shoals? He did not wish to deprive the Government of the money necessary for the defences of the country, but simply to induce them to reconsider their determination; because, as it appeared to him, the construction of stationary batteries at Spithead was a great mistake. The question now at issue is, whether the proposed sea-forts, in conjunction with a small auxiliary floating force and other adjuncts, will protect the roadstead and dockyard of Portsmouth; or whether in lieu of these forts, at no greater expense, iron ships, as proposed by Admiral Sir Richard S. Dundas, may be substituted; and putting us thereby in possession of an infinitely superior force, able to effect that which the forts might fail to do. The letter of the Admiral clearly shows and recommends that available ships of the line could be fitted with engines and converted into iron-cased ships, for this local purpose, carrying thirty of the heaviest guns, at £60,000 per vessel, thus giving fourteen of these vessels for the sum estimated for the three forts (namely, £840,000), or if it should be expedient to take vessels already fitted with engines, they could be converted for £40,000 or £45,000 per ship, giving 20 or 19.6 vessels for the same cost as the forts. The Admiral concludes his letter with the following remark:—

“Taking into account, therefore, all the expense and all the difficulty which must necessarily attend the construction of batteries upon the shoals at Spithead, and looking also to the contingency that stationary batteries alone might not be sufficient to prevent the passage of iron-cased ships, and would imperfectly defend the entrance of Spithead against vessels so protected, I am of opinion that any immediate outlay of money to be expended in the course of the ensuing financial year would be more profitably employed upon the equipment for purely defensive purposes of ships of this description, and it might be proper that the attention of the Secretary of War should be called to the subject in order that reports if necessary from the Comptroller of the Navy may be called for without loss of time.”

The objection that the vessels would be of too great a draught might be met by the observation that if any attack was to be made it must be made by vessels of equal draught; and the question of speed did not arise, because the proposed floating batteries would be simply for the protection of that part of the coast where they were placed. He reminded the House that stationary batteries were of no use while ships kept out of their range; and from the situation of Portsmouth it could be shelled from a position on which it could not bring its guns to bear. Again, it was admitted that those fortifications would not prevent iron ships passing them; so that, practically speaking, they would be useless. Another of the recommendations of the Commissioners was the use of explosive machines; but the late Russian war had proved the worthlessness of such means of defence as these. They also advised the construction of a number of iron-cased forts on the shoals at Spithead. It should be remembered, however, that Spithead was practically Portsmouth harbour, because vessels of war could not enter Portsmouth except at certain tides. And what would happen if the enemy's iron-clad ships came in and attacked the merchant vessels and ships of war? Why, that the forts could not fire at all; for if they did so they would inflict as much injury on friend as foe. Moreover, it was well known that such was the smoke arising in an action that soon after the commencement of a battle no objects were seen. He contended, therefore, that the dockyard might be shelled without the forts being of any use at all. The question was, then, whether they were spending the public money for the protection of the right place? Would Portsmouth dockyard be in future what it had been in the past, when ships of war were of comparatively light draught? Being adapted only for the repair of wooden vessels, was it likely to be continued hereafter for the repair of iron vessels? He believed that with forts, auxiliary ships, and explosive machines, and all these acting together, the only result would be to paralyse one another and create confusion. In his opinion ships were preferable; for they could choose their position, act as steam-rams, and board the enemy. Another objection which he entertained to batteries on the shoals was that they would serve the purposes of buoys. He appealed to the Government, then, not to act precipitately in carrying out the Commissioners' recommendations. He had endeavoured to ascertain what were the opinions of many eminent men in both the army and navy on the subject; and all had agreed that neither of the Commissioners' Reports was based upon practical data, and that the Government were not justified in proceeding to incur such an enormous expenditure upon Reports so made. They might depend upon it that recourse to this Chinese mode of defence and painting of tigers' heads would not do for us. The French knew well how far these forts were an adequate defence; and if they would be able to effect all the mischief they desired, just as if the forts were not erected, then the fact that these defences were not what they were intended to be—namely, a means of absolute and perfect security—would prove the justification of the Government in hesitating to adopt the recommendations of the Commissioners.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: If he had correctly understood the view of his hon. Friend, it appeared to be that he thought the defences of Portsmouth should be entirely confined to ships of war of some kind, and that land defences or forts on shoals would be useless; and he grounded his case in some degree on the difficulty which he fancied the defensive batteries would have in seeing an object after firing once or twice owing to the smoke of the guns. But that was an objection which would apply with equal force to the attacking party, as it would, indeed, to every battery along the coast. His hon. Friend also complained that the second Report on the proposed Fortifications and system of defence had been made by the same Commissioners who drew up the first Report; and, perhaps, it might have been more satisfactory had other Commissioners been employed; but whilst he (Sir Frederic Smith) had objected to many of the recommendations in the first Report, he did not object to any of those which were in the second. The arguments of the Commissioners, indeed, had only confirmed him in the opinion he had long held, that forts on the shoals ought to be erected. For twenty years past he had been considering officially the question of the defence of Portsmouth and the Solent, and he had never doubted for a moment that the forts now proposed should be constructed for the defence of Spithead and Portsmouth Harbour. It was intended that these works should be covered with iron of considerable thickness, though what the thickness should be was still doubtful. Experiments at Shoeburyness showed that 10-inch iron was not shot-proof; and that being so, was it probable that enemy's ships clad in  $4\frac{1}{2}$  or 5-inch iron would dare to venture within reach of these forts? Firing was accurate from a fort at even the distance of 5,000 yards; but that from a ship was inaccurate at so long a range. His hon. Friend said that objects would not be seen from the forts after the first round. He (Sir Frederic Smith) contended that they would be seen, unless it were a calm, and then the enemy's ships would be as much enveloped in smoke as the forts, for they must bring too, or anchor to obtain any accuracy of fire at long ranges. Under these circumstances the argument that Portsmouth dockyard could be destroyed by ships, whilst the ships themselves were safe, at once fell to the ground. Further, he would ask if the batteries in Stokes Bay were to count for nothing? As he understood, the whole line of that coast was to be furnished with strong and powerful batteries; and if that were so, they would have a range equal to the ships which proposed to bombard the dockyard. He hoped, then, that the Government would act on the determination they had already formed to construct these forts with all despatch. It was, of course, a work of time and expense, and he believed they had greatly underestimated the cost; but even if the cost were doubled, he should prefer seeing those forts erected rather than those which had been projected for Portsdown Hill, which he considered an useless waste of the public money. He would now ask the Secretary to the Admiralty under what department the experiments now being made were conducted? Were they under the War Office or the Admiralty—or both? If of both, these departments were certainly very slow in their operations, for as yet they had only come to this conclusion, that 10-inch iron was not shot-proof at 400 yards. They ought to have discovered by actual experiments long since what was the minimum thickness of iron required to resist shot of a certain weight. If 10 inches of iron were not shot-proof against a 120-pounder, what would be the effect of a 300-pounder of 2,000 yards? With a range which we should shortly have, he should like to know what ships of war would stand a 300-pounder. A fleet might come into the Solent, but they could not remain longer there than they were master of the seas.

Sir Morton Peto

He firmly believed that if we had even powerful shore batteries alone, no fleet would ever venture there, but he strongly urged the noble Lord that no time should be lost in completing these forts, which would render Spithead a perfectly safe anchorage for British ships. The question of the thickness of iron was not very pressing, because the iron could be prepared when they knew the thickness it was required to be. But the formation of the foundations under water was a very tedious operation, and should be entered upon without delay and prosecuted with vigour. He believed that 10 inches would not be sufficient; but if these forts were to be of the curve form, they would not require the same thickness as if they were straight lined. What he complained of was that the experiments were not pursued with sufficient earnestness. They were building ships cased with iron  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches thick, which was ridiculous if they expected these ships to be shot proof.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE, notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. and gallant General, thought that at the present moment Government would not be justified in going to great expense in the erection of forts, and for this reason, that only a few weeks ago they were led to believe that iron plates,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches thick, would be sufficient to withstand shot, whereas they were now told that 10-inch plates would not be sufficient. He had no doubt that his hon. and gallant Friend would be delighted to see a magnificent fort erected, but they must remember that forts would buoy ships into Spithead. His firm belief was that ships would be of equal advantage, and in time of need they could be removed elsewhere.

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed that every inch thickness of the iron plates with which a ship was covered required 1,000 tons of measurement, and if they had plates seven or eight inches thick they would require the ship to be 7,000 or 8,000 tons burden. Then, again, he differed with the gallant General in his depreciation of the Committee. The Committee had now sat three months, and what had been done? They had shown that the whole of the expenditure which France had incurred in iron ships had been thrown away, and that we must be careful not to waste our money in the same way. Sir Howard Douglas had been spoken of as having been the encourager of these iron vessels, but if there was one man more than another who had been against the building of these ships it was Sir Howard Douglas. He felt perfectly conscious that the Government would not be goaded into having so many ships because the French had that number. They would act with caution, as they had done with regard to ordnance, in which we were far ahead of any country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) has adopted the views of a very intelligent officer, Captain Cole, and no doubt prima facie there is something very plausible in them; but I confess that, after full reflection, and after hearing the arguments on both sides, I cannot concur in the conclusion at which the hon. Baronet and Captain Cole have arrived. It is somewhat remarkable that in this very short discussion we have had military men arguing in favour of forts, and naval men arguing in favour of floating defences. So it will always be; and that was one of the difficulties which the Government experienced in coming to a decision upon this matter. But I think the argument is entirely in favour of forts as against ships. Let us just consider for a moment what the object is which we have in view. That object is the security of Portsmouth. What is it that Portsmouth is to be attacked by? By a fleet coming into Spithead. Now, that fleet, as may be supposed, would be the strongest fleet that the enemy, whoever he may be, could concentrate upon that point. It would consist of ships of the largest size, and of the most formidable armament; and to meet those ships we ought to have a fleet of equal strength. Does my hon. Friend propose that we should have permanently stationed at Spithead ten iron-cased ships of the largest dimensions and of the most formidable armament, equal to any fleet that might be brought into Spithead for the purpose of attacking Portsmouth? Why, unless your fleet were equal in force to any fleet that might be brought there you would only lay in store for yourselves defeat and disaster. You are, then, for the defence of an arsenal which is useful only for the creation of a fleet, which fleet is to operate wherever required, to lock up another fleet equal in size and strength to the one produced at the place which it is your object to defend. Again, you could never reckon upon having your floating defences on the spot when they were wanted. If there was an alarm upon another part of the coast do you imagine that the Government would allow these ten formidable ships—ships which must necessarily be of the first class—to remain at anchor at Spithead? Public opinion and the exigencies of the service would infallibly cause these ships to be sent elsewhere; and then, when the enemy, having made a feint at Plymouth, or in some other direction, came to Spithead, your floating defences would not be there. Take the expense. The forts we propose will, probably, not cost so much as the large fleet which, according to the theory of Captain Cole, should be permanently stationed at Spithead, for the purpose of defending Portsmouth. Moreover, the ships would decay; they would require constant repair; they would require a large body of sailors to man and work them. A much larger number of men would be required in the ships than in the forts we propose to construct. In point of economy, therefore, either in first construction, or in maintenance, or in permanence, the balance of opinion is in favour of forts as against ships. They would require less money to make them, they would require less money to keep them in repair, they would require fewer men to man and work them, and they would be always on the spot. My hon. Friend says that ships could not be hit from the points at which these forts are to be built. I doubt that statement. There seems to be scarcely any limit to the power of modern artillery: but there is a limit to the resisting power of ships, because there is a limit to the capacity of ships to float with a certain weight upon them; and I defy you to construct a ship covered with iron coating of sufficient thickness to repel the heavy shots which are now sent from cannon, and yet to be buoyant enough to float on the water. But that is not the case with a fort. There is no floating in a fort. You may make the walls of your fort as thick as experience may show to be necessary to resist the attack of the heaviest ordnance. Then, ordnance of a certain weight is unmanageable in a floating ship. You may have your guns upon deck; but upon deck they are exposed to the fire of the adversary, and may be soon disabled. In the embrasures of a fort they are protected. You may have any amount of ordnance in a fort. You are limited in regard to the weight of ordnance which you can put on board ship, whereas you may have in these forts guns of any calibre; and I venture to say, in spite of all the calculations that have been made, that if the forts at Spithead were to be constructed and armed with such cannon as Sir William Armstrong and others are able to put into them, any ships which might come to attack Portsmouth would very soon be sent to keep company with the Royal George. Therefore, though I quite agree with my hon. Friend that in a matter of this sort, in which repeated experiments are necessary to enable you to feel sure that what you are doing will answer your purpose, you ought to proceed with the utmost care and circumspection, yet, on the other hand, I concur with the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) that no time should be lost beyond what is necessary for seeing your way clearly, and I am quite sure that the course which the Government have determined to adopt with respect to the construction of these forts is the course which ought to be pursued. My hon. Friend says, truly enough, that there are defects in Portsmouth arising from an insufficient depth of water, and that some other place may be found better adapted for the building and repair of an iron fleet. That is one of the considerations which led the Government to think that Chatham might be made useful to the public service. I only make that observation in passing, hoping that my hon. Friend will bear it in mind when we come to discuss the question about the dockyard at Chatham. Upon the whole my opinion is, in spite of the ingenious arguments which Captain Cole has urged in favour of floating as against permanent defences, that permanent defences are indispensable. I do not mean to say that they may not be assisted by floating defences—we cannot rely upon permanent defences alone—but, no doubt, you would always have at Portsmouth a certain number of ships to assist your forts, and your forts and ships together would be sufficient. It is said that these forts would serve as so many buoys to guide the ships of the enemy into Spithead. Does anybody really imagine that any naval Power on the Continent or elsewhere would require the assistance of these forts to find their way to the anchorage at Spithead? We have charts which indicate with the greatest nicety the course which ships ought to pursue. We know well that all foreign Governments which have navies are in possession of these charts. We also know that visits of vessels of war belonging to foreign Powers have not been unfrequent, and that there is no part of our coast which has not been accurately surveyed, and which is not as familiar to the naval officers of other countries as to the officers of our own service. So much, then, for the subject to which my hon. Friend has called attention. I am bound to say that there is nothing in his arguments or his figures which leads me to think that the Government have arrived at a wrong conclusion in proposing permanent defences. Before sitting down I may be allowed to answer a question put by an hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Dickson) with respect to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The question is what are the relations between the Lord Lieutenant and the Government, and whether Lord Carlisle intends to continue in the performance of his duties in Dublin. Without going into the question of the Galway contract, I may say that the relations between the Lord Lieutenant and the Government are the relations fixed by law and by usage, that the relations actually existing between Lord Carlisle and Her Majesty's Ministers are of the best possible description, and that I have no reason for supposing that my noble friend is not willing to continue his valuable public services.

MR. BENTINCK remarked, that if the House had had to consider the question whether some corrupt borough should be allowed to continue practices of corruption 500 or 600 Members would have been present; but when the defence of the country was brought forward there was a large amount of empty benches. This showed a defect in a portion of our representative system. He had just heard with the deepest regret an opinion expressed by the head of the Government in favour of building these forts; for he believed that every shilling of the expenditure might as well be chucked into Spithead. The opinion of Captain Cole was borne out by the opinion of naval officers throughout the country. Government ought to remember that the Commissioners had reported twice, and that signal and glaring contradictions existed between the two Reports. The noble Lord had talked of the enemy sending his best fleet to take Spithead; but he (Mr. Bentinck) hoped that we should always have as fine a fleet as any the enemy could bring against us. The question was whether Spithead could be best defended by forts or ships; but if we had as good ships, and as numerous as the enemy, there was no argument in favour of forts. As to smoke, ships would sail out of their own smoke, which forts could not. As to the comparative expense of the two modes of defence, ships would be less expensive than forts, especially when the forts would be built without foundation. The estimated expense of £840,000 would probably be doubled or trebled.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that he had heard naval men say that no fleet could put into Spithead if the buoys were taken away. The noble Lord had said no limit was to be placed to the power of modern artillery, and that it was impossible to say how far artillery might be made to carry. But it was stated that the object in building those forts on sandbanks was to get them as closely as possible to any enemy's fleet entering Spithead, and, therefore, if the argument of the noble Lord were to prevail, that for building those forts on sandbanks must fall to the ground. Why not build them on shore at Portsmouth, or on the Isle of Wight? He was disposed to place more importance in the training of our men in arms, and if they had volunteers on sea as well as on land, for his part he believed the country was safe.

MR. T. G. BARING thought the fair way to put the question was this: If a foreign commander had his choice, would he rather have the forts to show him the way into Spithead or not? A naval officer, who was reckoned one of the ablest surveyors afloat said that with a simple chart he could pilot a fleet into Spithead during the greatest fog which was ever known in the Channel. With regard to the apprehended inconvenience from smoke in casemated forts, experiments showed that no difficulty of that kind need be feared; and he might also state that a tender had actually been received for the construction of one of the forts, at a price less than was originally estimated. Hon. Gentlemen who were disposed to under-rate the labours of the Commission forgot that two of the most distinguished officers in the navy, Admiral Elliot and Captain Cooper Key were upon that Commission, and brought to its inquiries the advantage of their great experience in scientific knowledge. In reply to two questions which had been addressed to him in the course of the discussion, he wished to mention that £20,000 would be taken this year for the supply of additional articles to the soldiers; it was not proposed to give all the articles which had been recommended at once, but when these were all issued there would be equal to an extra pay of 1*d.* a day. The Committee on Iron Plates carried on its experiments under the joint authority of the War Office and the Admiralty, both these Departments being interested in the result of its investigations.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee, Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

(1.) £179,407, Civil Buildings at Home and Abroad.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, at that hour (five minutes to twelve o'clock) it was too late for discussion; and he, therefore, begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. T. G. BARING hoped the hon. Gentleman would allow the first Vote to be taken.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH objected to the sum of £2,000 and odd for constructing a new cement store. Cement never should be stored at all, but should be taken from the manufactory and used immediately.

MR. W. WILLIAMS objected to the expenditure of £6,000 on account of the Pimlico clothing establishment. He thought the change which had taken place in this respect had been most unfortunate, so far as expense was concerned.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that increased room was required in the storehouse at Pimlico clothing establishment. It had also been strongly recommended by every able officer that a storehouse should be built for cement.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he should not oppose that motion; but he hoped hon. Gentlemen would recollect that there were 203 votes in Supply, and that they had made very little progress.

MR. HENLEY said that there was a great stir at the beginning of the Session to give Tuesday for Supply, but the Government had not availed themselves very much of the advantage thereby afforded to them.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought that a whole evening should be given to Supply. This evening had been consumed in the delivery of speeches, several of which were left unanswered; so that the discussion had been of a very desultory character.

COLONEL DICKSON had asked a question on the subject of the functions of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to which he had received no further answer from the noble Lord at the head of the Government than the statement of a mere truism. He should take care to renew the subject on a future occasion.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again on Monday next.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

DEATH OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I trust it will not be deemed presumptuous in me, after the event which has just happened under the dispensation of Divine Providence, and which has taken almost from the very midst of us the noble and learned Lord who, up to the last moment of his life, presided over our deliberations, if, as a friend and colleague, I venture to ask your Lordships to agree to the adjournment of the House and of the further consideration of the business on the paper for the day. I do this apart from any political feeling, as a mark of respect for the personal qualities of the noble and learned Lord; as a mark of respect for the position which, as Speaker of this House, he held, and, I may add, as a mark of our submission to the chastening hand of God. The death of the noble and learned Lord has been singularly sudden. Many of your Lordships saw him taking a part in the proceedings of your Lordships' House up to a comparatively late period of Friday evening. On Saturday I had the honour of meeting him in the Cabinet, and of seeing him take his usual part in the deliberations of that body. In the evening I met him in his own house in social intercourse, showing that kindly and friendly feeling, and that affectionate demeanour towards his family, for which he was particularly remarkable. I was struck with the lively pleasure with which he received while at dinner from a noble Lord now present the announcement of the birth of a grandchild, more than four score years younger than himself. The noble and learned Lord lived long before the public: his life was one eminently known to all his fellow-countrymen. It is not for me to attempt to pronounce anything like an eulogium on that noble and learned Lord; but I will say that the distinctions and honours which he attained will ever be an encouragement and an example to all in this country, by showing how a man, by indefatigable industry and by the exercise of those personal qualities which God has given him, is able to attain the highest positions in the State. He has died full of years and honours, apparently in full possession of vigour both of mind and body. I believe there can be no doubt that a mind like his was as fully prepared for a sudden as for a lingering death. Indeed, I happen to know that on Saturday afternoon he said to a valued friend of his in conversation, alluding to the long illness of a common friend, that there was a prayer in our Liturgy against sudden death; but that he thought there might very properly be a prayer against an extremely prolonged existence. I venture to ask your Lordships to give a unanimous assent to this Motion; and unless I felt convinced that that unanimity would be displayed, I should have abstained from asking you to agree to a Motion which has no precedent, because the case itself has no precedent that I am aware of in the annals of your Lordships' House. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble Friend in every word he has said upon this melancholy occasion. I can bear besides a professional testimony, which my noble Friend could not, to the great legal qualifications of the noble and learned Lord. Every one who was acquainted with his professional career, his long experience, his indefatigable industry and power of work, was perfectly convinced that from the moment of his elevation to the Bench he would distinguish himself in his judicial capacity; and accordingly he has completely fulfilled these general and confident expectations. He had all the qualities which distinguish a great Judge; he had indefatigable industry, great professional experience, long practice in the Courts in the various branches of the profession:—all these qualities he brought to the Bench with him—I will not add strict integrity, because no man on our Bench makes an exception to the rule which distinguishes all our Judges, of perfect impartiality between party and party, and between the Crown and the subject, upon all occasions. It is not so in all countries. It is our happiness to possess that inestimable blessing. I can answer for my noble and learned Friend having been in the fullest possession of his great abilities up to the very last period of his life. We sat together on Friday morning from between ten and eleven o'clock till the rising of the House as a court of justice, my noble and learned Friend presiding, and showing his usual acuteness and his usual determined attention to every branch of the cause before him. I may add, that this House is in a peculiar manner qualified to judge of the great judicial talents which were possessed by my noble and learned Friend; for I believe there is no instance of such despatch of business as that which he exhibited—not that which Lord Bacon calls “affected despatch,” but real, substantial, and useful despatch; and there never, as far as I am aware, was so little arrear in the causes which await your Lordships' decision. I ought to apologize to your Lordships for discharging so superfluous a duty as that of seconding the Motion of my noble Friend; but I thought it was due to the memory of him whom we have lost by this sudden visitation of Providence that I should speak upon this occasion on behalf of that profession to which he belonged, and of which he was so great an ornament.

LORD ST. LEONARDS: I entirely concur in the Motion of the noble Earl opposite. I think we owe it to ourselves and to the noble and learned Lord whose loss we deplore, that we should show every possible mark of respect to his memory. The great eminence of my noble and lamented Friend as a common law lawyer is admitted by every person in this country. He presided for a long time in a court, of the business of which he was a perfect master, with a knowledge of the law which probably has never been exceeded, and with a patience and industry which all must have admired. As Chief Justice of England he occupied as proud a position as any man could desire. When as Lord Chancellor he came to preside over the deliberations of this House, and to administer another, and to him in a great measure, a new branch of the law, I confess I thought he had undertaken a perilous task which he could scarcely adequately perform. But, with a just reliance on his great powers, he was induced to accept the office which was tendered to him. Your Lordships have seen the manner in which he conducted the business of that great office, and it is no small honour to him to be able to say that, in his capacity of Lord Chancellor, he maintained the great reputation which he had acquired as a common law Judge. I could not reconcile it to myself to remain silent on this occasion.

The Entry in their Lordships' Journals is as follows:—

The LORD PRESIDENT acquainted the House, That it was his painful Duty to inform their Lordships that The Lord Chancellor, after having presided at their last Sitting on Friday, and while apparently in the full Enjoyment of Health, had died Yesterday; he trusted that their Lordships, having regard to the extreme Suddenness of this Event, to the high Character of his Lordship the Speaker of this House, and as a Mark of Submission to the Will of God, would agree unanimously that no further Business should be proceeded with this Day, and that all the Orders of the Day should be put off, and the House adjourned.

Agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Buildings for schools and residences at South Kensington Museum, for which a Vote of £15,000 is proposed in the Education Estimates, are to be erected after the plan designed by Captain Fowke, which plan includes the commencement of an ornamental architectural elevation, thereby deciding the style of architecture to be adopted for the whole of the Buildings?

MR. LOWE said, that the best answer which he could give to the question of the noble Lord was to read the following paragraph from the Report of the Committee of last year, of which the noble Lord was a member:—

“Your Committee are by no means anxious to involve the revenue in large expenses for mere ornament. The Museum is yet in course of formation, and they think it unwise to commit the country to a heavy expense in anticipation of its wants. The Committee recommend that any plan which may be adopted for the buildings to be erected should be capable of being worked into a general plan which would at once fully occupy the ground, and be susceptible of a proper amount of decoration. Such a plan has been laid before the Committee by Captain Fowke.”

If Parliament granted the money which was to be asked for it was intended that the buildings should be erected according to the plans of Captain Fowke; but that would not determine the style of architecture of the Building of which those erections would form part.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, that the schools would occupy nearly the whole of the western front, and, therefore, their elevation must determine the character of the Building.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney-General, Whether, in the event of the Courts of Justice Building Act (Money) Bill being read a Second time, he will refer the question of Site for the proposed Buildings to a Select Committee?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in all the discussions and inquires upon this subject there had never been any difference of opinion as to the site for the New Courts, except on the part of some proprietors of houses in Lincoln's Inn Fields, who naturally desired that their property should become more valuable. The Commission for which we were indebted to the noble Lord, and which had conferred great public benefit, were unanimous in the opinion that the site recommended by them should be adopted. Under those circumstances he did not think that he should be right in risking the postponement of the measure by referring this question to a Select Committee.

THE ACCIDENT IN THE HAMPSTEAD ROAD—STEAM ROAD CARRIAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to an accident in the Hampstead Road, caused by a Locomotive Steam Road Carriage, which, in going along the road, removing the débris from the old Reservoir, snorting and blowing off steam, caused the horses of an omnibus to take fright, rush on the pavement, and capsize the passengers, breaking arms and legs, and doing shocking injury to the passengers; and whether he is of opinion that such Locomotives could safely run in future on the public roads?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS stated that a Report had been made to him on the subject by the Commissioners of Police, at his request. The nature of the accident was substantially that reported in the public papers, but the injuries were confined to one man having his collar-bone broken and to several others receiving bruises. At the same time, though the accident was not so serious as had been imagined, there could be no doubt that considerable danger was caused by the passage of such a vehicle; the Superintendent of Police, who reported on the matter, stated his opinion that the employment of such an engine on the public roads was dangerous. Under the present state of the law the only remedy, in addition to the civil action which might be brought by persons suffering injury, was the indictment of the proprietors for a public nuisance.

PAUPER CHILDREN IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. MACEVOY said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to certain proceedings alleged to have taken place at the Sligo Board of Guardians, on the 4th of June last, by which it appears that two children named Caulfield, whose parents were both Catholics, had been illegally registered Protestants, and that, although the uncle of the children had applied on the 21st of May last for their discharge, the Sligo Board of Guardians had refused his application; and on the 4th of June a majority of the Board passed a Resolution to give them up to their grandfather, who then also, at the suggestion of the Protestant Chaplain, made a claim for them for the purpose of at once transferring them to a Protestant Orphan Society, and what steps he intended to take in the matter?

MR. CARDWELL said, that six years ago two children born of Roman Catholic parents were taken by the directions of their paternal grandfather to the Sligo Workhouse, and were registered as Protestants. The Guardians did not, he was informed, know that they were Roman Catholics until an application was made the other day that they should be given up to their uncle. Another application was made to have them given up to their paternal grandfather. The Guardians gave them up to him, and in doing so he believed that they complied with the requirements of the law.

THE HIBERNIAN MILITARY SCHOOL.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that a Protestant Orderly of the Hibernian Military School, Dublin, named James Harrisson, did not, when feeling himself to be in his last sickness, express a wish to see the Catholic Chaplain of that institution; whether the resident authorities of the School did not refuse to take any steps to ascertain if Harrisson really desired to see the Priest; and whether, in point of fact, notwithstanding the urgent entreaties of his wife, he was not left to die without any religious ministrations whatever, whether Protestant or Catholic; whether there is any objection to the production of the Correspondence between the Catholic Chaplain and the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Lieutenant and the authorities of the School in reference to this case; and whether an investigation has been ordered by the Lord Lieutenant, with the view of ascertaining the real facts respecting it; and, if so whether there is any objection to state its nature and result?

MR. CARDWELL said, that it had come to his knowledge that circumstances of some such kind as those to which the hon. Gentleman had referred had occurred, and that a correspondence on the subject was about to be laid before his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

RIOT IN THE COUNTY OF LIMERICK. QUESTION.

MAJOR GAVIN said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a riot that took place on the 14th inst. in the village of Pallaskerry, in the county of Limerick, caused by the posting of a placard alleged to be offensive to the religious feelings of the people of that village; and whether he will take steps to prevent a repetition of conduct which may be calculated to excite angry feelings?

MR. CARDWELL said, he understood that, by the exertions of the Roman Catholic clergymen, the excitement which existed among the people had been calmed, and that peace was entirely restored. The Protestant clergymen had on his part undertaken not to repeat the publication of the placard which had produced the excitement.

EXPORTATION OF SALT. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any arrangements have yet been made with the Government of France for the admission of British Salt into that country; and, if not, whether there is any probability of such arrangements being effected?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that no arrangement had yet been made for the reduction of the Import Duty in France on British Salt, but an inquiry was going on, and he might say that not only was there a probability, but he had every reason to believe that that inquiry would be soon completed and would be followed by a reduction of duty on British Salt exported to France.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: What is the nature of the inquiry, and where is it going on?

MR. MILNER GIBSON: It is going on in France. It is a matter which in their view of the case is a difficult one, and an inquiry is being conducted by the French Government, which we have reason to believe will be followed by a reduction of the duty.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES. QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, For how long a time the money proposed to be taken on account for Civil Services will enable the Public Service to be carried on, and whether he can name a day when the Miscellaneous Estimates will be proceeded with?

MR. PEEL said, that the sum proposed to be taken on account would not be sufficient to pay more than the salaries and pensions which would fall due at the expiration of the current quarter, and to meet other demands which would probably be made in the course of the first week in July. Not having been able to see his noble Friend at the head of the Government since the hon. Baronet gave him notice of his question, he could not name a day on which the Miscellaneous Estimates would be taken, but as the money to be taken on account would not be applied to defray the cost of any of the services which were included in Class I., and as it was extremely desirable that the authority of the House should be given to the execution of the works comprised in the Votes of that class, he thought it important that the Miscellaneous Estimates should be proceeded with on as early a day as possible.

CASE OF MR. KING HARMAN.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, on a former day I made reference to the case of Mr. King Harman, who was convicted by Mr. Arnold, the Police Magistrate, and whose sentence received some mitigation. I stated that a second information issued by the Police had been laid against Mr. Harman at the suggestion of the Police Magistrate, and that it would not have been laid by the Police if they had been left to the exercise of their own discretion. Mr. Arnold has, subsequently, made a communication to me on the subject, and he states that no intimation of the alleged reluctance of the Police to lay that information had been made to him. I think it right that the House should be made aware of that fact. A Report which has been made to Sir Richard Mayne by the Police Inspector is to this effect. It is dated on the 11th June—

"With reference to the case of assault previously reported, I beg to state that on Tuesday, the 5th instant, a Report of Inspector Humphries was handed to me, stating that it was the opinion of the Magistrate that a Warrant should be taken out for the assault upon the Police. Accordingly, I gave instructions to go to the Police Magistrate to get a Warrant, which was done. At that time no steps had been taken beyond the execution of the Warrant for the assault upon Mr. Adams."

This Report shows that the Police did not initiate the second information, but that fact was not made known to the magistrate himself.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR CANADA.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that in order to make a statement which he deemed absolutely essential, he begged to move the adjournment of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] He was aware that this was an exceptional course, not to be taken without reasons of great urgency, and which should be resorted to with reluctance by any one in as humble a position as himself. But it was, nevertheless, a course which, in exceptional cases, the Committee appointed to consider the business of the House desired to preserve in the hands of Members. Having given notice of his intention to bring a question before the House that evening with regard to the reinforcements under orders for Canada, he desired to state the reasons why he could not be content to wait for his proper place on the paper. Whether the Motion of which the hon. Member for Cork county had given notice on going into Committee of Supply were negatived or agreed to, it would equally deprive him of the opportunity of bringing forward his Motion. When he informed the House, on information which he believed to be correct, that the troops under orders for Canada were to sail on Wednesday next, it would be seen that if this were a question on which an opinion should be expressed, no time ought to be lost in bringing it forward. On Friday night he had not been fortunate enough to obtain precedence on the paper, and, even had he been able to do so, Members were not present in sufficient numbers to give any effect to his observations. He feared recurrence of exactly the same thing that evening, and he, therefore, threw himself on the indulgence of the House. He assured them that in doing so, he was not actuated by any motive of personal vanity; but the subject was of such immense importance, and the step which was about to be taken might lead to ulterior consequences of such magnitude, that he thought the House ought to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion with regard to the policy of Her Majesty's Government before the step was irretrievably taken.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY rose to order. The hon. Member had given notice of a Motion on going into Committee of Supply which stood in a certain position on the paper of the day. He wished to know whether the hon. Member, by his present Motion for Adjournment was in order in seeking to anticipate the discussion which would take place on his former Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: A question was addressed to me the other day with regard to taking Notices in the order in which they appear on the paper. I did not enter very fully into that question at the time; but perhaps it would be proper that I should state that, on what are called days for Notices of Motion, every Gentleman who has put his name down for a Notice of Motion is called upon by me in his turn. But on Order days, the Orders of the Day are called on in their turn, and if Gentlemen have given notice of their intention to move Amendments on those Orders, then it is not my duty, and it has not been the habit, to call upon those Gentlemen. But if they present themselves and rise to move the Amendments of which they have given notice—as I stated the other day—it would be my desire, as far as possible, to give Gentlemen, when they rise, precedence according to the order of their Notices—because it is obviously of no use to give notice on the paper unless some consideration is attached to that Notice. The only doubt which I have with regard to the character of the step taken by the hon. Member is this. He has given notice that he will call attention to the recent augmentation of our military force in Canada. Had he given notice of a Motion on that subject, the course which he is now pursuing would, undoubtedly, be out of order. It is for the House to consider whether they will permit a Gentleman who puts his name down to make observations on going into Committee of Supply, and whose name stands tenth or twelfth on the list, to rise before the public business is concluded, and before some Gentlemen who wish to move for unopposed Returns have had an opportunity of doing so, and to move the adjournment of the House in order that he may bring forward the subject in which he is interested out of its due course? I consider such a proceeding highly injurious to the conduct of business in this House. I am not empowered to say that an hon. Gentleman may not make the Motion for the adjournment of the House; but I consider the Motion now made extremely injurious to the conduct of public business, and one which should be greatly discouraged by the House.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he had overlooked the fact that the unopposed Returns had not been granted. But, believing that would be the last opportunity of discussing the subject, he had been led to adopt what he was aware was a very exceptional mode of seeking to bring the matter forward. In rising he had expressed his sense of the great indulgence he was asking at the hands of the House, and he could assure hon. Members that he was only actuated by the sense he entertained of the importance of the question to which he sought to invite attention. But after the opinion which had been expressed from the Chair, he felt that he would neither be consulting the feelings of the House nor the duty which he owed towards its rules, if by persisting he ventured so very near an infraction of those rules as the Speaker had held that his doing so would be.

On Motion that the House go into Committee of Supply,

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE DERRYVEAGH EVICTIONS.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY, in pursuance of Notice, rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty representing—

"That Mr. John George Adair, one of the Justices of the Peace for the County of Donegal, had recently ejected all the inhabitants from a tract of land in that county under circumstances which appear to this House to affect seriously the general peace and well being of the district; and praying that She may be graciously pleased to direct an Inquiry, with a view to consider whether it was fitting that Mr. Adair should continue to hold Her Majesty's Commission."

The hon. Member said, that on the last occasion when he ventured to call the attention to this subject he was met by the suggestion of the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the House of Commons had no power to address Her Majesty upon the subject of removing one of her officers from the commission of the peace, or of inquiring into his fitness to hold that office. He (Mr. Scully) hoped his Motion would not be decided upon any such narrow ground, and he could not conceive any other answer of a plausible kind which could be made to it. The House was in fact the proper tribunal to address Her Majesty in case of a neglect or abuse of duty by one of the superior Judges, praying Her to remove him: he did not, therefore, think that the Government should set up that answer. He was not going to contend that a landlord might not do as he liked with his own, nor was he going to originate a personal charge against Mr. Adair. He was there to give Mr. Adair an opportunity of justifying the charges he had put forward as the grounds for acting as he had done, and because he believed those charges to be a libel on the country if they were not true. He had not taken up the case lightly, but had done all he could to ascertain the facts, and he had taken care that Mr. Adair should know the information which he had obtained, so that it might be corrected if incorrect. The House was already aware that on the 8th, 9th and 10th of April these evictions, by order of Mr. Adair, took place. The official Returns showed that "28 houses were unroofed or levelled; 46 houses evicted; 47 families, comprising 37 husbands, 35 wives, 159 children, 13 other inmates; making a total of 244 persons." On the day after the evictions Sub-Inspector Henry wrote to the County Inspector as follows:—

"I proceeded on 8th, 9th, and 10th inst., in command of a force of one Sub-inspector and 200 men, accompanied J. A. Dillon, Esq., R.M., to protect the Sub-sheriff while executing a writ of habere on the property of Mr. Adair. There were forty-seven families, comprising 244 persons, evicted. Many of their houses were levelled, There was no breach of the peace."

Now these were the occurrences which took place on Mr. Adair's property; but it was not to those acts, or to their terrible consequences, that he intended to allude. It was true fifty persons were driven into the poor-house, one old man died within a few days from the hardships he had suffered, and two other men had become lunatics. It was not, however, on account of these things that he brought forward the Motion which he had to make, but because Mr. Adair had put forward, as grounds for the evictions, that those people had been participators in the most serious crimes, including murder. Now, he challenged Mr. Adair to give the slightest proof of such charges, and he would not only say that full inquiry had satisfied him that such statements could not be established, but that he (Mr. Scully) could prove them to be incorrect; and, further than that, he would show that the means of knowing them to be incorrect were all in Mr. Adair's own immediate possession. Perhaps Mr. Adair, if he were listening to what were said, after he found that there was not the slightest ground for imputing any of these crimes to any of the unfortunate persons charged, would set himself to right the wrong which he had done, and withdraw the allegations which he had thrown out. In order that the House might understand the case, it was necessary that he should read the exact words of Mr. Adair in making the accusations. They were contained in two letters written to the Under Secretary for Ireland on the 8th and 16th February, and were more tersely given in a letter which Mr. Adair afterwards wrote on the 6th April to two clergymen of the parish—the Rev. Mr. Kane, and the Rev. Mr. Maturin. These were the statements, every one of which he (Mr. Scully) alleged to be utterly unfounded as connected with the inhabitants of Derryveagh. He said first of all—"A previous proprietor of my estate, Mr. Marshall, was murdered." And he made the same charge in his letter of the 16th Feb. Again, he says:—"On these lands I was myself attacked by a large armed party, most of whom I recognized as inhabitants." Again—"About the same spot my manager, Mr. Murray, was murdered." A fourth charge was—"While I was at the House of one of you (Mr. Maturin), investigating this murder, the offices were maliciously burned down." A fifth charge was—"Two or more of the coroner's jury, in Murray's case, who found a verdict of wilful murder, were attacked." Again—"Large numbers of my sheep have been from time to time made away with," And "My dogs have been, on two occasions, poisoned." A further charge was, that a system of intimidation, with threats of murder, had been carried on towards Mr. Adair and his servants, although in his management of the property there had not been a single eviction among a numerous class of tenantry, nor even an acre of commonage taken from the people; that almost all the crimes of which he complained were in some way connected with Derryveagh, and that the perpetrators of many of them must have been known to the people of the district. Mr. Adair further stated that he had purchased the property, enchanted by the beauty of the scenery, and that he could not suffer himself to be diverted from his design of improving the condition of the people by the infernal combinations of the Ribbon Society. Now, he (Mr. Scully) was prepared to disprove every one of the charges contained in that letter. He defied Mr. Adair to prove that any one of the crimes alleged could be brought home to any of the people living on the Derryveagh property; and further, he (Mr. Scully) had not been able to trace the slightest semblance of Ribbonism among the inhabitants of that property, though Mr. Adair spoke of it as having "fatally spread itself over the whole country." On the other hand, the statements of Mr. Adair were wanting in candour, as the House would see on a careful comparison of dates. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had moved for a return of the number of outrages for each of the ten years commencing the 1st of January, 1851, but he (Mr. Scully) did not see how that return bore upon this case. Derryveagh was a district containing about 12,000 or 13,000 acres in the parish of Gartan, which contained about 44,000 acres, with the greater part of which Mr. Adair was connected, either as landlord, or occupier, or as head landlord with the right of sporting and shooting. There were four estates in the parish. The first property, called Glenveagh, was occupied by Mr. Adair, and the unfortunate Mr. Murray was murdered upon it. But the Derryveagh people had nothing to do with that property; or, indeed, with either of the other three estates which composed the parish of Gartan. Mr. John Marshall was a former owner of the Gartan estate. He was fired at in 1840, upwards of twenty years ago, not "a few years" as Mr. Adair stated, nor by people in connection with Derryveagh. He died in October 1840, partly from his wounds, and partly in consequence of a full habit. Mr. W. Marshall, who succeeded him, died on the 2nd of February, 1849, leaving the present Samuel Marshall his heir. On December 31, 1855, Samuel Marshall conveyed the Gartan estate to W. C. Cornwall for £5,900. On August 22, 1857, Mr. Adair for the first time made his appearance in the county, and bought a portion of the Glenveagh estate from Pitt Skipton, and on the 31st of December he purchased the remainder of the estate. He then purchased in the Incumbered Estates Court a fee farm rent of £25 Irish out of Glendoan; also a fee farm rent of £60 Irish out of Derryveagh, with the right of sporting, in both cases, reserved to the grantor and to his heirs—not his “assigns”—and Mr. Adair’s exercise of this right led to disputes, and was indeed the root and origin of these evictions. On the 30th of April he purchased the Gartan estate of W. C. Cornwall for £8,000. Mr. Adair had no sooner purchased this property than he applied to the Government to erect a police barrack upon it, professedly for the purpose of putting down illicit distillation. That was done, and then close to it he put up a pound, and made it a source of terrific annoyance to his tenants and the adjoining estates by putting into it all goats, sheep, horses, and cattle trespassing on his mountains. And yet he had declared that he had never deprived his tenants of any privileges of pasturage. In September of the same year, 1858, Mr. Adair was appointed a magistrate of the county of Donegal. On August 21st and 22nd Mr. Adair set up a claim to sport over Derryveagh which belonged in chief to Mr. James Johnston, and was occupied by James Corrin and others. As soon as the shooting season commenced, he went to shoot over the property in order to assert his rights, which had not been exercised for 150 years, and which Mr. Johnston disputed. One of Mr. Adair’s gravest charges was that he was attacked on these lands by a “large armed party, most of whom I recognized (he said) as inhabitants.” The fact was that in August, 1858, Mr. Adair’s claim to sport over Derryveagh was resisted by James Corrin and other tenants of James Johnston. These parties were indicted by the grand jury, and Corrin then brought an action against Mr. Adair for assault and battery and malicious prosecution. The jury found that there was an assault by the defendant, Mr. Adair, but that it was in the exercise of a lawful right of sporting. A verdict, therefore, passed for Mr. Adair, but notice of motion for a new trial was given. Mr. Adair’s imputation of crime against the inhabitants, and his complaint that he was attacked by a large armed party on these lands, wore a very different aspect when it was known that he claimed to sport on these lands under a fee-farm rent which was not one-fourth of the value of Johnston’s interest. These parties were armed with sticks and other weapons, but it was not alleged that they had any firearms. They were defending the supposed rights of their landlord, and there was nothing in the proceeding calculated to put any man in bodily fear. Notice of motion was given for a new trial, but before the new trial came on, Mr. James Johnston and Mr. Adair came to an agreement, in accordance with which Mr. Johnston gave a fee-farm grant of Derryveagh (11956 acres) to Mr. Thomas Cooke Trench, in trust for Mr. Adair, at £225 a-year, being about £40 above the existing rents of the occupying tenants. Mr. Johnston placed these parties in the hands of Mr. Adair, not conceiving that the latter would revenge himself on them for defending their landlord’s rights. This agreement was carried out on the 10th of October, 1859, Mr. Johnston having on the 7th of October taken his tenants’ notes or I O U’s for their Derryveagh rents up to the 1st of May, 1859, which were all paid in full on the 25th of November. On the 29th of December, Mr. Adair received his Derryveagh half-year’s rents to the 1st of November, 1859; and on the 20th of January, 1860, he served notices to quit on his Derryveagh tenants, with the avowed intention of re-arranging the holdings and putting them in a more convenient form. On the 1st of November, 1860, the notices to quit were supposed to expire, and the tenants gave up formal possession. Afterwards, for the first time, in order to clear the land, Mr. Adair turned round and made these charges of murder and of other crimes. If the tenants had chosen to take defence, Mr. Adair could not eject any of them until the spring assizes, but they gave up possession on the 2nd of November, under the impression that he was to make a new arrangement with them. On the 13th of November, 1860, James Murray, his steward, left Glenveagh Cottage at ten o’clock in the morning, and on the 15th was found murdered on the Glenveagh estate, two or three miles from the Derryveagh property. Yet it was insinuated that some of the persons who had voluntarily given up possession of their Derryveagh holdings, had been guilty of the murder, though there did not exist the slightest support for such a suggestion, and though the Rev. H. Maturin stated that there were more grounds for suspecting other parties. More had been done to annoy the tenants of Gartan, Mr. Adair having lent his boat to pursue some of those tenants to an island where they were suspected of smuggling. He did not, however, think that the charges against them were worth attending to. Mr. Maturin gave the Derryveagh tenants the highest character, and more than insinuated mysterious motives for the commission of the murder. He (Mr. Scully) would not go further into that subject, but the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew to what he alluded. It was the common talk of the district; and it was communicated to him (Mr. Scully) over and over again, and he was at perfect liberty to state it as a fact, but he should prefer to abstain from doing so. Mr. Adair said he had ejected these people on public grounds, and that he expected to lose £200 a-year for some years, by the lands being in a state of waste. He (Mr. Scully) was not going to assert that that was not Mr. Adair's belief, but it was not his (Mr. Scully's) belief. The way to make the land more profitable was to clear out the tenants, put sheep upon it, and make it another Sutherlandshire. Whatever might be Mr. Adair's motive, or his fear or apprehension, it was the way to make money of his property. Mr. Adair had employed forty-two policemen to serve his ejectments, at an expense of probably £100 to the public, and, at an expense of not less than £1,000, he moved 200 policemen on the day of the census, for the purpose of executing the haberes on the 8th, 9th and 10th of April. He (Mr. Scully) asked if the public money should be misapplied for such a mischievous purpose? Were the Irish police to be the instruments for effecting those clearances? Were the poorhouses to be erected for the reception of those outcasts, whom the landlord would not venture to cast out if there were not those receptacles for them? It behoved them, on every ground of public policy, to see that the public money was not wasted in this manner. He had read the report of the inquest on the body of Mr. Murray in a newspaper that had hitherto advocated Mr. Adair—the Dublin Evening Mail—and, on considering the nature of the ground, it seemed most probable that a person who knew of Murray's coming in and going out, and could walk behind him without suspicion, was the most probable person to commit the murder. The place where the murder was committed was upon the side of a bare, open hill, at an angle of forty-five degrees; and armed as Mr. Murray was, with a revolver, it was absurd to suppose that any one could have sprung upon him unawares. If, therefore, suspicion was to attach at all, it must attach more to a person who had an opportunity of committing the murder than to one who had not. With regard to the burning of the outhouse, which was another of Mr. Adair's charges, Mr. Maturin, the clergyman to whom it belonged, did not allege that it was burned maliciously, and the constable in charge of the police force in the neighbourhood, who was the first person at the fire, stated that it was accidental. Then it was also said by Mr. Adair, that two or more persons who were on Mr. Murray's jury were attacked; but the facts were, that the attacks alluded to were mere trifling and foolish affairs, arising from a drunken quarrel, and having nothing to do with the matter in question at all. Then Mr. Adair said that two of his dogs had been poisoned; but there was every reason to believe that they were poisoned by Mr. Adair himself, who was in the habit of setting poison in his grounds with a view to the preservation of his game. Mr. Adair stated that there were 100 sheep of his maliciously destroyed, and in a subsequent letter that 600 sheep had been destroyed. It appeared, from a memorial which had been addressed to the Lord Lieutenant, that one William Doherty, being in gaol, accused of destroying and stealing sheep, Mr. Adair went to the gaol and there took the information of Doherty against four persons, two of whom were tenants of Colonel Humfrey. Upon a written order of Mr. Adair the police arrested those men, but after being imprisoned for five days, and marched sixty miles to and from gaol they were liberated when the case came before the bench of magistrates. The men brought an action against the police for the arrest; the case was tried before Mr. Henn, Q.C. It was proved that the men were arrested by the written order of Mr. Adair, and a verdict was found against the plaintiffs. Then Colonel Humfrey made a representation to the Lord Lieutenant, and the answer he received was, that there appeared to have been some misunderstanding, and his Excellency felt that any further inquiry could not be prosecuted with advantage. He (Mr. Scully) had received a letter that morning from Colonel Humfrey, stating his readiness to produce all the written documents and to go before a Committee of the House. That very matter, if nothing else, was a reason for the appointment of the Committee which he asked for. With respect to the case of the 85 sheep which Mr. Adair stated had been maliciously destroyed, an inquiry took place and the whole matter was investigated. The bench on that occasion came to the unanimous and almost indignant resolution that they were of opinion no sheep of Mr. Adair's were maliciously injured or made away with, and that it appeared from the evidence of the constabulary that 66 sheep were found dead from the inclemency of the weather, and with no mark of injury upon them. Mr. Adair had put forward that charge again; but his own opinion of that charge was shown by a letter he wrote to the London-derry Journal, on the 29th of February, 1860, in which Mr. Adair stated that the case was put forward by his steward, without his sanction. He added that he did not believe any ill-feeling existed against him among the people of the county of Donegal. The fact was Mr. Adair had stood for the county of Limerick as an extreme tenant-righter. The people would not have him there, and then he sprang up in Donegal, not to assert landlord right but landlord wrong. If a landlord would assert his rights he must not shelter himself under false excuses; and if he became a disturber of the public peace it became a fit subject for inquiry whether his name should be retained in the commission of the peace. Mr. Adair had no right as a landlord to confound the innocent with the guilty—he had visited the alleged sins of the father upon their children; for among those whom he evicted were 159 children. He thought he had entirely disproved the various charges brought against these unfortunate persons. The clergy of all denominations in the district were all of opinion that if a stop were not put to such proceedings Mr. Adair would excite the people to madness. Indeed, two fathers of poor families had already been driven into insanity, and were now inmates of the lunatic asylum. In conclusion, he was not wedded to the particular terms of his Motion. If it was thought that, instead of an inquiry under the authority of the Crown, it would be better to have an investigation before a Committee of that House, or in any other form, he had no objection to modify his Motion accordingly. The Government had frequently instituted inquiries into the conduct of magistrates where the circumstances were far less grave than the present. He was anxious for no arbitrary or unfair proceeding. He had known strong steps to be taken to put down political agitation—the Repeal movement for example; and several highly honourable gentlemen and deputy lieutenants of counties, one or more of whom, indeed, he now saw in that House, were summarily deprived of their commissions of the peace without there being any slur whatever on their character. The power which his Motion contemplated, therefore, existed, and he proposed that it should be exercised in the mildest possible shape. He did not bring this matter forward in any way as a public prosecutor, but he felt it his duty to afford Mr. Adair an opportunity of having his conduct fully inquired into. If the case were his own he should be glad to have such an opportunity, and, as one of the landlord class, he could sincerely say that no man would more rejoice than he should do if Mr. Adair was able satisfactorily to vindicate himself, and to show that he was worthy to retain his commission as a magistrate. He trusted that Mr. Adair, when he came to take a cooler review of all the circumstances, would perceive that his only escape from the position into which he had brought himself was to admit that he had been wrong, to retrace his steps, and restore these unfortunate persons to their holdings. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"An humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that Mr. John George Adair, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Donegal, has recently ejected all the inhabitants from a tract of land in that county under circumstances which appear to this House to affect seriously the general peace and well-being of the district; and praying that She may be graciously pleased to direct an Inquiry, with a view to consider whether it is fitting that Mr. Adair shall continue to hold Her Majesty's Commission."—instead thereof.

Mr. HENNESSY begged to second the Motion of his hon. Friend on the broad ground that an Irish landlord and magistrate had done an act which his brother magistrates and the clergy of his parish, as well as those in Ireland who had investigated the case, all condemned, and which the accused had himself attempted to justify in a singular letter that he sent to Dublin Castle. That letter contained a passage in which the writer said the law recognized the principle that in cases of malicious injury to property, the district should be made responsible, and asked whether the addition of murder did away with that responsibility? The letter proceeded to request that his Excellency should be informed that the writer would with pleasure abandon his intention to evict these people if the Government would suggest to him any other means of safety for himself or his servants, or would give him that protection which it was its first duty to afford, but which it had hitherto so entirely failed in affording. In the absence of that, however, Mr. Adair added that he could not hesitate to do, at any cost, what he felt the state of the country made it his duty to himself and to society to do. The plain meaning of that was that Mr. Adair set himself above the law, and usurped the position, not of the Executive merely, but of Parliament itself. He accused the Executive of neglect; and such an accusation ought to be met by inquiry. Without entering into details, a great act of inhumanity had prima facie been committed. 244 persons, of whom 159 were children, had been driven from their homes and turned out upon a bleak mountain side. The people were tenants whose fathers had held the property long before Mr. Adair became a landlord in Ireland. That gentleman had been proprietor of the estate for three years, but many of the tenants had lived upon it from their infancy. One old man of eighty, who had been born on the property, was transferred to the workhouse. When such acts were perpetrated and defended on the plea that the law was defective, and that the Government had not done its duty, the matter imperatively demanded inquiry. He thought that the Executive had done all in its power, and that Mr. Adair had acted in a manner disgraceful to the class to which he belonged. Therefore, while he was the last person to countenance undeserved attacks upon Irish landlords, he cordially seconded the present Motion.

Mr. CONOLLY said, that nothing could be more painful to him than to take part in this discussion; but as a representative of the county in which the occurrence called in question by the hon. Member had taken place, he felt it his duty to give a statement of facts. In the first place he must ask the House to distinguish between the county of Donegal at large and that portion of it where the crimes which had excited Mr. Adair's indignation had been committed. The particular district on which that gentleman's property was situate was so tainted with crime that for the last ten years it had been regarded as the most criminal district in all Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had moved for an inquiry into Mr. Adair's conduct, and had made a statement with apparent candour; but he had given the go-by to the most important feature of the case—he had omitted to notice the serious matter which had led to all the evictions complained of—namely, the existence of the fearful Ribbon Society. That society was at the bottom of all the outrages which had disgraced the county; and he was convinced that it was at the bottom of Mr. Murray's murder, which was the chief cause of the occurrences concerning which an investigation was now asked for. That being so it was not fair to Mr. Adair, or to the House, that the question of these evictions should be submitted to the House without any reference to crimes which were the direct fruits of the Ribbon Society in that county. He was certain that the Irish Government were fully aware of the widespread organization that prevailed in that district of Donegal, which, it was but justice to say, was but one sixth part of the whole county, the remaining five-sixths of which were in a perfectly orderly and peaceful condition. Some hon. Members might not remember former descriptions of the Ribbon Society, and, therefore, he might state for their information that it was a combination of a most fearful character to carry out an agrarian law, enforcing its views by murder and most dreadful alternatives—beatings, waylayings, and burnings. English and Scotch Members could hardly believe that so awful an engine of terrorism could exist in these days; but, having attended the grand jury of the county for the last ten years, he could state that upon every occasion there was some fearful crime which could not be brought home to the perpetrators, as convictions could not be obtained owing to the terrorism of the Ribbon Society, which prevented persons from giving evidence of facts within their knowledge. The unfortunate farmers where the combination existed, even if they were not members of the society, could take no steps to clear the county of the stain because of the threats held out by the secret committees. Even where persons had been waylaid and beaten they had refused to give evidence against their assailants, so great was the terror caused by the warnings of the society. The great number of crimes that had disgraced that part of the county were all attributable to that horrible conspiracy. About a month ago he (Mr. Conolly) moved for a return of all the crimes reported by the police in that county during the last ten years; but the return which had been furnished was very meagre, and the amended return had not yet been presented; and he must, therefore, read to the House from a private report that had been furnished to him by a magistrate of Donegal, the facts of which could be compared with those of the amended return when produced. This gentleman stated that it had been his duty to take part in several fruitless investigations into serious outrages committed in the district of which the townland in question was the centre, and that it had been found impossible to vindicate the law or obtain convictions, though some of these outrages were committed in the presence of numerous witnesses. The hon. Member for Cork took exception to Mr. Adair's bearing in mind the murder of Mr. Marshall in connection with the more recent murder of Mr. Murray. It was no falsehood in Mr. Adair to say that his predecessor in the estate was murdered. Mr. Marshall was shot down in broad daylight, on his way from church; and from that time to the present there had been a succession of similar crimes. A preceding proprietor of one of the estates now held by Mr. Adair—a Mr. Chambers—left the country on account of his life having been frequently threatened. But before stating the fearful atrocities that had been committed in Donegal under the Ribbon system, he would quote the opinion of one of the greatest ornaments of the Irish Bench—Chief Justice Burton. He said—

“ If a crime so awful as murder is capable of yet further aggravation, it is when committed by previous conspiracy. To my imagination nothing can be more shocking than that persons should commit this crime by premeditation, and if any addition can be supplied beyond this horror, it is only to be found in the disposition of a considerable part of society to screen the criminals from justice; it is a mental, if not an actual, participation in the crime.”

If he could show that in this district there had been several consecutive outrages, no doubt in connection with Ribbonism, all escaping detection, though witnessed by numbers of the population; if he could show that Mr. Adair had reason to believe that many of these people were accomplices after the fact in the murder of his steward—these would be grounds on which Mr. Adair was morally, if not legally, justified for resorting to this severe mode of punishing them. The magistrate of Donegal he had alluded to went on to say that Mr. Marshall was murdered on a Sunday in the presence of 200 witnesses. Though numbers of them saw the shot fired, they let the murderer walk quietly away. A

Mr. Conolly

Mr. Moore was cut to death with reaphooks, close to his own house. A man named Johnston had his horse shot, and his own life was placed in great danger for many days. A Mr. Nixon was attacked when returning from church, with the female members of his family, by three men disguised as women. A bailiff of Mr. Adair's predecessor was shot on his return from market. Then came the murder of Mr. Murray. There had been numerous other outrages, attended by less fatal consequences, that could all be traced to the Ribbon organization. The terror of it was complete, and, as a necessary consequence of impunity, this fearful system was extending. In many cases farmers had applied to the authorities to have it put down; but all the exertions of the magistrates and police during five years had failed to do so. The sons of the farmers were drawn into the society, or forced to join it, for their own protection. Jurors and witnesses were threatened; and assaults and attacks were concealed, rather than run the risk of prosecuting. [Mr. Burr: What is the name of the magistrate?] He was ready to give his name to the hon. and learned Member in private; but, considering what was the system of the Ribbon conspiracy, and that Mr. Murray's life was threatened several times before he was murdered, he objected to give the name publicly. A more desperate state of things than that in which these murders could occur could not be imagined; and if anything could justify the extreme steps taken by Mr. Adair, it was these assassinations. The system had grown to a fearful extent; the well-being of all classes in the district was affected by it; and it had compelled Mr. Adair to resort to the only plan open to him to show the Ribbon conspirators that they should not tyrannize over the country. When his steward had been murdered, and his own life threatened more than once, Mr. Adair had to consider what steps he ought to pursue. After the murder of Mr. Murray, Mr. Adair caused strict inquiry to be made as to all the inhabitants of Derryveagh who were out from their houses on that day, and it was found that every individual who had been absent returned to a particular house in the village. This was the identical house in which Mr. Murray himself found a gathering of people two days before the murder took place, on which occasion he stated to Mr. Adair that he was certain bad work was going on by reason of the congregation of people there. Mr.

Adair's own life had been threatened by Derryveagh men, and though the evidence which he had been able to collect was not sufficient to insure a legal conviction, it produced a moral certainty in his mind that every individual who had arrived at man's estate in Derryveagh was more or less in complicity with regard to this murder. The hon. Member (Mr. Scully) had made no allusion to the fearful Ribbonism which prevailed there, and to the outrages which had paralyzed all law and defied almost all detection; and, instead of their being nothing to connect Derryveagh with the murder of Mr. Murray, there was a distinct combination in the village for the purpose of murdering that gentleman. Sir James Stewart, a gentleman of high character and position in the county, writing on this case, said that the line of conduct pursued by Mr. Adair in consequence of the murder of Mr. Murray, though very severe, was absolutely necessary, and was not the least more severe than was required by the magnitude of the offence committed. If Mr. Adair (added Sir James) had never evicted a single tenant, neither his life nor his property would afterwards have been safe; the same system of violence would have been carried into adjoining parishes, and would eventually have pervaded the entire mountain district of this county. The evictions here, although severe and perhaps extreme, were necessary under the circumstances, for Mr. Adair was so hemmed in by the Ribbon conspiracy that if he had not taken some such step he must either have given up his estate entirely or have held it subject to the control of these assassins. Similar cases had occurred. Lord Lorton found upon a portion of his property a state of crime analogous to that which prevailed in Derryveagh, and, the law having completely failed to bring the culprits to justice, he was obliged, after the commission of a number of crimes in Ballinamuck, to evict the whole of the inhabitants of the village, 162 in number. This step had been attended with the best results, for from that day to the present not a single murder had disgraced this particular district, the people finding that when the criminal law failed the law of property came in for the vindication of justice. Lord Templetown adopted the same measure after the murder of Mr. Bateson. By his orders the whole of the townland in which the murder took place was cleared of its inhabitants, and from that day the district had been peaceable and orderly. Nothing could be more painful than the idea of turning out a multitude of poor people into the road; but there was another idea quite as painful—the existence of such a state of terrorism as prevailed in that part of Donegal. Landlords were bound to exert themselves to the utmost to put an end to such a dreadful state of things; and, much as Mr. Adair's conduct had been decried, he believed he had acted the part of a courageous and independent man. It was not Mr. Adair who drove the people to desperation, but it was the people who drove him to extreme measures. This was a plain statement of the case, and he would not flinch from it.

MR. BUTT said, that if the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down meant anything it was a charge to every landlord in that part of the country, in the event of any disturbance arising upon his estate, to carry on a war of extermination and death against the inhabitants. ["No, no!"] He was glad to hear that sentiment disowned, but how would the speech of the hon. Member be read in Ireland? Mr. Adair had turned every human being in one particular district out of home upon the mountain-side, and he was not surprised to hear hon. Gentlemen shrink from the inferences which must be drawn from such conduct. He questioned the statement of the hon. Member that the murder of Mr. Murray was committed in the presence of hundreds of persons.

MR. CONOLLY: What I stated had reference to the murder of Mr. Marshall.

MR. BUTT said, that he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. But at any rate the hon. Member had stated that Mr. Adair's life had been repeatedly threatened. He challenged that statement. Had Mr. Adair ever made such an allegation? Was it true that the people of Derryveagh were steeped in crime? He had the testimony of impartial witnesses that that was not so; Colonel Humfrey, the owner of a neighbouring property, and as high a Conservative as any Gentleman in that House, sent to the clergyman of the parish a contribution of £5 towards the relief of the sufferers, and bore testimony to the "inoffensive and excellent" character of the inhabitants of the district. Then, again, the Protestant rector of the parish and the parish priest joined in urging Mr. Adair to reconsider the matter, on the ground, as they alleged, that there was no such thing as combination in Derryveagh. He (Mr. Butt) denounced as utterly false the allegation that any terrorism had been resorted to to coerce Mr. Adair, and he trusted full inquiry would be made into the state of the district, in order that the truth of the matter might be elicited. He trusted his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Vincent Scully) would withdraw his Motion, in order that such inquiry might be made. What was Mr. Adair's testimony with regard to the inhabitants of the district? He stated that he had been attacked in Derryveagh by a body of armed men, some of whom he recognized. Now, what was the fact? Mr. Adair had a dispute with Mr. Johnston, the occupier, about certain sporting rights; and Mr. Johnston, who was the deputy lieutenant of the county, told his tenants that they should prevent Mr. Adair from shooting on the property. The tenants did so, and the matter ended in a civil trial, which terminated upon some technical point in favour of Mr. Adair. Could there be a more atrocious lie and scandal than to say that that was an armed attack upon Mr. Adair? Then there was the statement that his sheep were killed; but that statement had been declared by the magistrates of the district to be without foundation. The circumstance that some of his dogs were poisoned might be accounted for by his having set poisoned baits for poachers' dogs, and to his own dogs having eaten them. As this Motion was one of importance to Ireland, he would ask the House to recollect how a great deal of the land in that country was circumstanced? A great many tenants held their land subject only to a short notice to quit. What did Mr. Adair do after the murder had been committed? Why he went to Derryveagh and received every penny of his rent from the tenants, and then turned them out on to the bare mountain-side, to the number of 244—the old and infirm, and the children altogether—punishing the innocent with the guilty. It had been said by the hon. Member opposite that these tenants of Mr. Adair belonged to a Ribbon Society; but he defied him to give any proof of this, while, on the other hand, there was abundant testimony to their being a most inoffensive people. He maintained that Mr. Adair's conduct could not be justified on any ground, and called upon the House to let the people of Ireland see that it had no sympathy with such revengeful proceedings. He (Mr. Butt) remembered a passage in the writings of a clergyman whose name was still held in honour—the Rev. Cæsar Otway. Mr. Otway visited the Rev. Mr. Maturin in this very village of Derryveagh. He described the magnificence of the scenery, the repose of the charming groves, the primitive innocence and simplicity of the poor people, who, and their fathers before them, had lived secluded from the world in these remote and secluded valleys. If it was desired to teach the Irish respect for law, and to break down the Ribbon conspiracy, it would certainly not be by excusing much less by sanctioning, wholesale exterminations. Mr. Burke once said that he must refuse to draw an indictment against a nation; but Mr. Adair had executed judgment against all his tenants. And what lesson did he thereby teach the people of Ireland? Was not the natural result this, that Ribbon conspirators would prevail upon many of them to enter into their ranks for the avowed purpose of protecting themselves against the landlords? Or if they were forced to emigrate to America, they carried with them sentiments of hatred towards the British Government, which might operate some day greatly to our disadvantage. There never, perhaps, was a case of this kind which came more distinctly before Parliament; and what he asked the House to do was to institute a searching inquiry into the whole matter. When the Motion then before the House had been disposed of, he should move for the appointment of a Select Committee for that purpose, to which, if the House agreed, he believed it would do much towards promoting justice and the peace of the country.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, hon Gentlemen on his side of the House, in listening to the very eloquent and somewhat irrelevant speech of the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), from whose lips the words had fallen were affected by feelings of a painful character, first at the fact that any landlord should feel it necessary to turn loose upon society so many individuals, and next on account of the circumstances which had led to those evictions, and which almost deprived Irish Members of the power of discussing the question calmly. He certainly was surprised at the quarter in which this Motion had originated, and he thought the attack on Mr. Adair might with more decency and decorum have proceeded from some other Member. A heap of documents had been furnished to him by Mr. Adair, showing how competent the hon. Member was to speak from experience of the profits to be acquired from clearing an estate, which, if he wanted to sell, would certainly be more valuable than if encumbered with tenants.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: I must beg the hon. Member either to use papers or to refrain from doing so.

MR. SPEAKER: "Order, order."

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would pass from the quarter in which the Motion had originated to the Motion itself. If Mr. Adair had committed a crime, it would be punished first by the decision of the Lord Chancellor and by that of the Lord Lieutenant, as well as by the silent condemnation of his own acquaintances. But the proper tribunal had decided that there was nothing in his conduct calling for punishment, and the House, therefore, was now invited to pass unmitigated censure on his proceedings towards a population described as "mild and inoffensive." The sympathy in this case seemed rather misplaced. Not a word of rebuke or indignation was directed by hon. Gentlemen at the other side against that series of murders, which, on the contrary, were spoken of almost in the language of vindication by the hon. Member for Cork. The murder of Mr. Marshall, who was shot in noonday, and in the presence of hundreds, was made light of; he had only three or four small shot in him, it was stated; he was not killed dead, for he lingered till October. Such was the way in which an atrocious crime was spoken of. Not a word had been uttered about that inhuman murder of Murray, which in its every feature resembled the murder of Kennedy described by Scott in Guy Mannering. That the foul deed had been committed by several persons was proved by the marks of the struggle; the victim was hurled over a precipice, and a large stone thrown down upon him, and he was sorry to say that the persons engaged in the struggle were but too well known to everybody in the district. Other persons had been shot at or cut down. The first duty of an owner of property was to provide for those who had been entrusted to his care; but was it to be supposed that the contract was never to be put an end to, but that the parties, however evil their conduct, were to cling to the landlord for life? Perhaps this unfortunate district was the only one in which such extreme measures would be necessary to meet extreme and painful crimes. In Ireland, generally, crime was diminishing; and from north to south a better feeling was existing between landlord and tenant. He admitted that, owing to what was a natural mistake, Mr. Adair had perhaps coloured rather highly what he described as an armed attack. But, as he was in the exercise of a right when he met those armed men, and under the circumstances he thought that their object was that which he had stated it to be. There could be no doubt that the district in which these evictions took place was teeming with murders; and was a man to retain tenants where such murders had been committed, where such outrages had been perpetrated, and where illegal combinations existed? He thought that Mr. Adair was almost more to be pitied than censured. He thought that there never was so much done to excuse a fit of anger. The occurrence truly was one to be deplored; but it had received the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and it must be left to public opinion to correct such acts, which were exceedingly rare, and which he hoped would become more so in consequence of the causes that led to them becoming rarer still.

MR. M'MAHON said, that if hon. Gentlemen wished to maintain the rights of property they ought to keep a broad and clear distinction between the acts of humane, gentlemanly landlords, and those of mere land jobbers, who, with the rank and station of gentlemen, combined the feelings of bum-bailiffs. Mr. Adair, having acted in so inhuman and cruel a manner as to punish hundreds for the crime of one or two, was not a person to whom the Queen's commission as a magistrate ought to be intrusted.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would not say a word in favour of Mr. Adair. The matter had been referred to the Lord Chancellor, who had decided that the case was not one in which further inquiry was necessary; and he thought it very extraordinary that the House should form itself into a court of justice to review what the Lord Chancellor had decided. But, in contradiction to the happy and blessed state of things which was represented as existing in this part of Donegal, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Report of a Committee which sat three or four years ago, giving the names of the owners of between 600 and 700 sheep, destroyed in the course of a few months within four miles of this very place. The Roman Catholic Bishop was not likely to exaggerate the misconduct of the people, and in an address to them, alluding to the destruction of the sheep, he said—

“ You have not discontinued your murderous conduct, but I understand you have continued it ever since I was here last. If any one has told you that the priest can absolve you from this great sin, he has grossly deceived you. The Almighty has never delegated such a power to man, and unless you make restitution you can never get absolution. England has sent an army to the Crimea and conquered Russia. She has sent an army to China and conquered the Chinese; and do you think that the small corner of a parish in the county of Donegal can stand up and oppose the law of England?”

The New Zealanders might be spoken to in the same language as was addressed to these highly civilized and peaceable inhabitants of a small corner of Donegal. There was a great difference between bringing forward this Motion and opposing it. An Irish Member who brought forward such a Motion gained popularity with the lower class of the £10 voters, but one who opposed it lost their support. The greatest credit, therefore, ought to be given to the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) for the manly manner in which he had spoken out to-night upon this subject.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the hon. and gallant Member had read a long list of the sheep killed, but he did not say that Mr. Adair had, through his steward, applied for compensation for them, or that on the first inquiry before the magistrates it was distinctly proved that the sheep were not murdered by the people, but starved on the mountains. Mr. Adair was represented as a benefactor to these wild Ashantees; but what was the fact? The sheep on the mountains cost 6s. each, and the magistrates of the county of Donegal awarded him for each the sum of 30s.; so that this was an admirable speculation, and one provocative of perjury. No doubt Bishop M'Geltigan made the speech alluded to; but he was almost in his dotage, and in the following year, upon the very same platform, he retracted what he had before said, and expressed his belief that the people were not guilty of these outrages. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman quoted from this old Bishop again, he would refer him to his second speech, and tell him the date of the Dublin Evening Post in which it was published. Was there, then, any justification for the belief that the people murdered Mr. Murray? He abhorred outrage and loathed murder, and would do everything to crush those crimes; but it was quite a different thing to encourage a system which was a challenge to the ignorant and passionate. It was a matter of notoriety—and the hon. Member for Cork had alluded to the circumstance—that there was one man in Donegal who was openly suspected of the crime. Whether he was guilty or not was a matter between God and himself, but it was a curious fact that this man wore the dead man's clothes at his funeral, that he was extremely intimate with the dead man's wife, and that the wife was very much interested in getting him out of gaol. If it transpired that the struggle originated in jealousy, that a shot was fired in self defence, and that the man's death was the result of the deadly struggle—if that should turn out to be the case, either by a death-bed confession or in some other way, what would Mr. Adair think of himself for having sacrificed 244 people on the suspicion of being parties to the murder? The statement of the hon. Member for Cork had been in no way disproved. A more fearful doctrine could not be laid down than that because a crime had been committed on an estate, and the perpetrator not found out, every human being on that estate should be sent adrift. Mr. Adair, by throwing 244 people helpless upon the world, had been guilty before God and man of a great outrage and a great wrong. Did Lord Derby carry out his threat to evict a portion of his territory in Ireland? No. The representative of an ancient aristocracy, with naturally strong views of the rights of landlords, held his hand, and did not carry out his threat; but this Mr. Adair—a mere interloper in the country—a mere land-jobber who ought to sympathize with the tenant class, because he had sprung from them, ruthlessly turned 244 persons on the world because he chose to suspect that one of them had committed a murder. This gentleman had stood as a candidate upon the hustings in favour of tenant right and as a friend of the poor, but he (Mr. Maguire) thanked God they had not a practical exhibition of his detestable hypocrisy in that House.

MR. CARDWELL said, that though the case which had been brought under the consideration of the House was a most painful one, and involved some of the gravest questions which could interest a country circumstanced like Ireland, yet the point which the House had to decide was very narrow, namely, whether the Crown had neglected its duty in not superseding Mr. Adair from his position in the commission of the peace. He could assure the hon. and learned Member for Cork that it was far from his intention to meet him with a technical plea that the matter was beyond the province of the House. If the servants of the Crown had neglected their duty it never could be pleaded that it was not the business of the House of Commons to take the matter into their consideration. On a former occasion he stated that Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that this was not a case in which they would be justified in removing Mr. Adair from the commission of the peace, and he remained of the same opinion. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had given the House a narrative of painful interest—a recital of crimes showing a strong conspiracy in a particular district of Donegal, and had quoted a judgment delivered by Baron Pennefather in 1857. There could be nothing more dreadful than the existence of a secret, organized conspiracy, or the terror that such a conspiracy must excite among the persons within its influence—interfering with the law and preventing the due administration of justice. He was happy to say that, owing to the combined efforts of the authorities and of the clergy of all Churches, a great improvement had been effected since the address of Baron Pennefather. A check had been given to Ribbonism; yet it could not be said that Ribbonism was extinct. During the last few years there had occurred the firing at Mr. Dickson and the murder of Murray; in both which cases no conviction had taken place. Such was the state of things when Mr. Adair came into possession of his Donegal property. The state of the case, so far as Mr. Adair was concerned, was that he had bought four several and co-terminous properties. Since that time he had found himself, more or less, in conflict with his neighbours and those who occupied under him. In the first case Mr. Adair represented himself to have come in contact with an armed party on the hill side. He could not agree that this was a correct description by Mr. Adair of the occurrence, because the bills preferred by him were ignored, and it appeared afterwards upon a trial that it was a contest as to the right of sporting, which was ultimately settled by agreement between the parties, and by Mr. Adair purchasing the claims and standing in the position of Mr. Johnston. Mr. Adair subsequently gave notice of ejectments against 244 persons in Derryveagh, and still more numerous notices at Garvan. The reason alleged was that the ground was about to be cleared, for the purpose of arranging a new mode of cultivation, which would be for the benefit both of the landlord and the occupier. Matters thus remained until November in last year, the period of the murder of Murray. He regretted that the hon. Member for Cork, whose labour in getting up this case, and whose candour in making him acquainted with the facts he felt bound to acknowledge—had felt himself at liberty to point a suspicion of the crime of murder in the House of Commons against any individual in regard to whom the authorities, after full consideration, had not felt it their duty to prefer a criminal charge, and whose innocence was quite unimpeached. The murder of Murray, so far as he could learn, was the act of two, and only of two, persons. The proof was that when the police went to view the body they discovered traces both of Murray's footsteps and the footsteps of two other men—one wearing shoes and the other barefooted. A struggle had taken place between Murray and these two men, who killed him with a stone that was found there. The hon. Member for Cork commenced his speech by changing the issue from that which he offered to the House on a former occasion. [Mr. SCULLY: No!] He understood the hon. Member to say that he did not state that the Executive Government would have been justified in removing that gentleman from the commission of the peace for acts that the Executive Government might not approve, but which were strictly legal in the exercise of his private property. The hon. Member, however, now put forward as the ground for removing Mr. Adair from the commission, that he had charged the inhabitants of the district with a participation in serious crimes, including murder, which he could not sustain against them. It was unnecessary for him to enter into the charges relative to the poisoning of the dogs, to the fire at Mr. Mathurin's, to the case of the jurymen, and other particulars. They were introduced into the discussion, if he understood right, in order to show that Mr. Adair had brought several charges of crime against his neighbours, including that of murder, which were not substantiated. He had no hesitation in saying that he did not agree in the opinion expressed by Mr. Adair that these were plain and manifest proofs of a malicious determination on the part of the people against him. He supposed they had been introduced into the discussion for the purpose of showing that Mr. Adair's general conduct was such as to have warranted the Government in superseding him in his office of magistrate. This, however, was not the question. So far as he knew, there was no proof that the murderer of Murray was within the general cognizance of a large community. In the early part of this year Mr. Adair attended at Dublin Castle and furnished to the Government the notification usual in cases of eviction. He stated that he was about to remove 47 families, numbering altogether 244 persons, in consequence of the murder of Murray more particularly. He also adduced the other circumstances to which allusion had been made in his justification. The Government of his noble Friend (the Earl of Carlisle) deeply regretted to hear that information, and communicated their opinion to Mr. Adair in a letter, which had been laid upon the table. He fully concurred in regretting Mr. Adair's determination, for he could not but think the removal of 47 families and 244 persons involved in one common calamity the aged and the young, the female and the male, those who had no participation in such a crime with those who might or might not have been guilty. The question was not, however, whether the Government regretted Mr. Adair's determination or gave him a warning against it, but whether or not the act was such as to justify the Government in removing Mr. Adair from the commission of the peace? That was one of the most important questions that could be considered, either by the Government or the House. What was the position of a justice of the peace? Had they all been wrong hitherto in maintaining that it was of the utmost importance that the magistracy should be independent of the Government, and not, as Blackstone had expressed it, the "mere tools of office?" But how could the independence of the magistracy be maintained if they were liable to be removed, not on account of the illegality of their acts in any exercise of the law which their commission empowered them to enforce, but because, acting within the limits of their own private rights, they did not act entirely to the satisfaction of the Government? The question was not whether a magistrate satisfied the Government in the exercise of his private rights, but whether he was acting within the limits of those private rights. It would be most dangerous if such a principle were laid down; and he said now, as on a former occasion, that when it appeared that Mr. Adair was not charged with any violation of the law, but that in what he had done he had acted within the limits of his legal rights, the Government would not have been justified in superseding him from the commission of the peace. His hon. Friend (Mr. Vincent Scully) seemed to have felt the cogency of this argument, and, therefore, proposed to shift the issue at the beginning of his speech, and asked for Mr. Adair's removal on the ground that he had made statements which could not be sustained. His hon. Friend said that Mr. Adair had represented that a previous proprietor of his estate was murdered. Well, a previous proprietor of Garton was murdered. Again, Mr. Adair stated that he was attacked by an armed party on the hills. Well, Mr. Adair was attacked; and, though he (Mr. Cardwell) did not approve the version given of the case, yet he put it to the House whether it was possible to remove a gentleman from the commission of the peace because, in describing a transaction, he arrived at conclusions which did not appear to be justified by all the circumstances of the case. Let the House reverse the proposition, and suppose that the Irish Government had removed this gentleman from the commission of the peace, and that when challenged for the reason they had no better answer to give than that, though the gentleman had acted legally in the discharge of his private rights, yet he had acted in a manner which, in their judgment, was not to be approved, and in giving a description of a past transaction had drawn conclusions which were, perhaps, different from those warranted by the circumstances. It would have been impossible to vindicate the removal of Mr. Adair on either of these grounds. He had shown, then, that the hon. Member for Cork had changed the issue; but he feared the hon. Gentleman did not feel quite safe with that concession, for the hon. and learned Member for Youghal went still further, and expressed a hope that a Motion for a general inquiry would be carried in preference to the proposition now before the House—thus again changing the issue. He (Mr. Cardwell) must, however, say that after a Motion of this kind had been so long before the House, it was right that it should be disposed of by the House. If the House thought that the Government had neglected their duty in not removing Mr. Adair from the commission of the peace, it would affirm the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork; and if, on the contrary, it thought that it would be better to go on with the Motion for Supply, it would then negative the Amendment. He could not consent, after this question had been given notice of, and had been fully discussed, that the House should do otherwise than pronounce an opinion upon it. Feeling as he did with regard to the removal of 47 families and 244 persons from their homes, for a crime in which it was not proved that any one of them had taken part, and in which it was improbable that the whole could have been concerned as conspirators, he said that the warning given to Mr. Adair by the Irish Government was a right and proper warning, and he regretted that it had not been acted on by Mr. Adair; but that circumstance formed no ground on which the Government could have defended themselves in that House if they had been charged with the unconstitutional removal of a justice from the commission of the peace. Under these circumstances he felt satisfied that the House would negative the Amendment.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON thought it was the wish of the House that this question should come to a conclusion; but he could not allow an observation made use of by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) to pass unnoticed. The hon. Member had expressed deep sympathy for the bereaved family of Mr. Murray, but had at the same time accused Mrs. Murray of adultery with her husband's murderer.

MR. MAGUIRE: I merely stated that there was a strong suspicion in the county to that effect.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON thought that, however excited his hon. Friend's feelings might have been as to Mr. Adair's conduct as a landlord, he should not have been led to repeat such an appalling, degrading, and frightful charge, however humble the circumstances of the person so charged might be. That charge had been investigated several times, and not by resident magistrates—not by the landlords who might be thought by some to be joined together in a conspiracy upon the subject—but it had been fully investigated, and Mrs. Murray's innocence had been established by conclusive evidence. The humbler classes in Ireland dwelt, in many cases, in but one cabin, and that was the whole origin of the appalling story which, he regretted to say, would now be spread throughout the land, in consequence of the unfortunate allusion of his hon. Friend. The origin of the story was this—that inasmuch as this poor woman's health was upset by the shock occasioned by her husband's murder, she did invite her sister, her own brother, and the shepherd, against whom the charge was made, to go to her, and remain with her all night, and those who knew the district would not be surprised that in its then excited state she should have taken these measures for her protection. He apologized to the House for having taken up their time; but trusted they would agree with him that the low social position of this poor woman was no reason why her character should be assailed and her misery added to by this awful allegation.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER having put the Question, declared the Amendment negatived.

MR. BUTT said the Noes have it.

MR. SPEAKER observed that, as no hon. Member had given his voice in the negative when the Question was put, there could not exist any doubt as to the decision of the House, and there was nothing to divide upon.

MR. BUTT believed that the Question proposed by the hon. Member for Cork vitally affected the interest and peace of Ireland, and he therefore begged leave to give notice—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER informed the hon. Member that the present was not the time to give a Notice. The business-paper contained the names of several Gentlemen who proposed to bring different matters under the consideration of the House, and the hon. Member could not now interrupt the course of proceedings by giving a Notice.

VOTES ON ACCOUNT.—RESOLUTION.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he rose to move, That it is the opinion of this House that the practice of voting sums on account, especially so late in the Session, is inexpedient, and that instead of voting sums on account, Votes should be taken on the whole sums given in the Estimates on those items on which the balances in credit are deficient. The hon. Member said that Parliament had already been sitting upwards of four months, and yet the Civil Service Estimates, which was one of the most important, if not the most important of all the Estimates submitted for the consideration of the House, had not been fairly brought before them, although Votes on account had been asked for and granted; and he feared that if they allowed the Government to take the Vote of Credit for which they were about to ask, the Civil Service Estimates would not come on till it was too late in the Session for them to be discussed with any effect. If there ever was a Session in which they ought to have given deliberate consideration to the Civil Service Estimates it was the present, for they had had no measure of great importance to engross their attention. Those measures which had been brought forward and which were likely to lead to discussion had disappeared one after another, and the Government measures of importance were very few. Further than this, every facility had been given to the Government for expediting their business; the rules of the House had been so far altered as to give them every possible assistance; and yet they had several "counts out" when the Government might have maintained a House for the Motions of private Members upon the occasions appropriated to them; and the Government had already commenced morning sittings. If it had not been for these "counts out" they might have already been far advanced in the consideration of these Estimates, which involved many important matters, including the great question of education, the various public works, the questions connected with prisons and convict establishments, and a variety of other subjects which would suggest themselves to the minds of hon. Members as subjects requiring discussion. When they remembered the enormous increase that had taken place in these Estimates of late years, when they remembered how fertile a theme that increase had proved for denunciations of hon. Gentlemen both on the hustings and in that House, and when they remembered the accusation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer against that House of the reckless extravagance of the public expenditure, it seemed to him absurd that they should support that cry and yet take no proper steps for remedying the evil. It had been said that Parliament could do little, and the noble Lord the Member for the City of London had said sneeringly once, that it had always been the practice to pass the Civil Service Estimates as a matter of course. But though the savings that Parliament had been able to effect might be small, yet they entered into a discussion of the items, and thus checked the extravagance of the Government. A rather dangerous doctrine had been promulgated that these items should be taken upon the responsibility of the Government; but the responsibility rested upon the House, and if they accused a Minister of past extravagance the reply would be that the House of Commons examined and adopted the Estimates, and was, therefore, responsible for the extravagance. The Secretary to the Treasury said it was absolutely necessary that this Vote should be taken, because the quarter day was nearly approaching, and money would be wanted to meet the demands that would then become due. But the departments generally had balances in hand amounting to a quarter of the annual expenditure. They were asked to vote £10,000 on account for the Treasury, the whole expenditure for the year being £53,000, and the balance in hand being £15,900. The Board of Trade had in like manner a balance in hand of £19,000, and so he might go on with the other Departments. Under these circumstances he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given notice.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman could not now make a Motion, because the House had already decided that the words, "that the Speaker do now leave the chair," should stand part of the question.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH hoped that, under those circumstances, the Government would not proceed with the Civil Service Estimates to night, but would go on with the Army Estimates.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR CANADA.

OBSERVATION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of which he had given notice, and on which he had already attempted to address the House, namely, the recent augmentation of the military force in Canada. The hon. Baronet said, that the occasion was a somewhat pressing one, because he had learnt, since coming down to the House, that the troops were ordered to sail to-morrow. The simple fact that so large a force as 3,000 men was about to be sent to Canada was itself rather unusual, but there was something in the manner in which the reinforcement was to be despatched which rendered it still more remarkable, and afforded great reason for requiring an explanation of the Government in reference to the matter. He might state at the outset that, in his opinion, the merits of the dispute which unhappily existed in the United States of America had nothing to do with the question to which he wished to call the attention of the House. The House had already expressed its opinion that abstinence from all discussion upon the state of affairs in America would be the most becoming and prudent course to pursue, and he was happy to say that such discussions were entirely foreign to the subject upon which he desired to make a few remarks. At the same time, he thought that the step which the Government had taken was very likely to interfere with that resolution to abstain from all share in the unfortunate contentions in America, because it would be regarded as taken from a feeling of uneasiness springing to some extent from the state of things in the United States; at all events, occurring at such a moment, it was a matter on which the House had a right to ask and the Government ought to give an explanation. But that to which he wished particularly to call attention was the manner in which the expedition was about to be despatched. It was to be despatched in hot haste in a very ostentatious manner, in the largest and fastest vessel which this country had ever possessed. It was not to be sent out in the ordinary way in the transports belonging to the public service, or in the numerous steam frigates which crowded our ports; but the Government had considered it necessary to engage the Great Eastern for the purpose. When a force, which partook much more of the character of an expedition than of that of an ordinary relief, was sent to a distant part of the world the House might fairly ask upon what grounds such a step was taken. So decided and conspicuous a measure should not be adopted unless there was either a great object to be attained or a great danger to be averted; and, therefore, he had no hesitation in asking the Government why so large an expedition was being so hastily despatched to Canada? In former times even larger expeditions had been sent to

British provinces, but they had always been intended either to guard against foreign aggression or to repel internal disturbance. During the rebellion in Canada a large force was sent out to that country, and it was happily instrumental to some extent in restoring peace; but he believed there was nothing in the present state of affairs on either side of the frontier that would justify so remarkable a step as that which the Government had taken. The position of Canada was certainly a difficult and even dangerous and exposed one. Canada had a long and vulnerable frontier, and on the other side of that frontier there was a great and high-spirited people in the most excited state, and, as he yet hoped, only in imminent peril of being plunged into a civil war. At such a time, and in a country where, as in the United States, there was the utmost freedom of expression of public opinion, and where there was an exaggerated and even intemperate tone adopted, by both writers and speakers, there must naturally be a disposition to look with jealousy upon the conduct of Foreign Powers. Abstinence from partisanship might be interpreted into aversion or concealed hostility, and we could not wonder that expressions should be used by writers and repeated in the United States which certainly would be alarming if used in any other country, or at any other time. He could not think, however, that at such a moment, and in consequence of any such expressions written or spoken, a step so momentous as that which the Government had taken befitted so great a Power as England. In the presence of such manifestations, the attitude of a great Power should be one of conciliation and of confidence. If we were to gain any advantage from the increase of our naval and military establishments, it ought to be at a time like this when we ought to feel ourselves too strong to think it worth while to notice such intemperate language as had appeared in the public press of America, or of any other country. We should remain calmly in the power of honest and absolute neutrality, instead of doing that which would bespeak alarm in placing a corps of observation, and even of defiance, on the frontier of a neighbouring State. Such a course might be considered in the United States as symptomatic of a consciousness of weakness; and at any rate was calculated to excite most serious apprehensions, because it must be considered as partaking more of the nature of a challenge than of caution. The question might be asked, when a force of 3,000 men, complete in its various arms, was despatched to Canada, whether there was any actual fear of invasion from the United States? If so, surely to guard a frontier of such extent as that separating Canada from the United States, a force of 3,000 men would be an absolute misapplication of our military strength. Those who were well acquainted with that frontier entertained the opinion that its proper protection would be gunboats on the lakes, not men scattered in small numbers and at distant points on the land. But, although it might be some time before the Committee to whom the question had been remitted would report, there was a feeling in the House with respect to colonial military establishments that, beyond garrisoning the great fortresses of Canada, this country ought not to be called on to contribute to the military expenses of the colonies. If it were said that this force was intended to complete the garrisons of Canada—perhaps only the large fortified town of Quebec—he thought they might fairly ask why the military force to which had been intrusted the guardianship of that fortress had been allowed to fall so low that it was necessary to send out reinforcements in such hot haste and to such an extent as already to double the force in that colony? There was a second class of causes that might render such a force necessary—if there was any likelihood of internal disturbances in Canada. There were, undoubtedly, distinct and separate races in Canada, and in former times there were discords between parties and races; but he certainly did not expect that at the present moment these discords were likely to break out, or that there was a probability of any such exhibition of feeling not most loyal towards this country, which should induce the Government to send out so considerable a force. On the other hand, he thought the conspicuous loyalty expressed by the whole Canadian population towards the Sovereign of this country, and the country generally, on the recent happy occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales, ought to show that if there was a dependency of Great Britain on which we might most confidently rely as not likely to embarrass this country by any expression of bad feeling towards their neighbours, or by sympathizing with either party in the civil war in the United States, it was the province of Canada. If such a feeling did exist it would be a great mistake to think that it was by force of arms, far less by virtue of so small a force, that we could hope to retain that colony. He believed the improved feeling which subsisted between Canada and this country was the result not of the strength of the Imperial Government, but of those ties of kindred which had been strengthened by the gift of institutions similar to our own, the consciousness of self-government, the absence of any undue control over colonial affairs, the healthy growth of the free institutions of this country transplanted to a kindly soil. He believed that it was an error to suppose that Canada was likely to be disloyal; and it would be an error still more grave to think that the United States would take any step insulting to the Canadas or hostile to our interests, which would render it necessary for us to increase so strongly our garrisons in that province. It might be that rash partizans or mobs might make an incursion over the frontier, but they would be discouraged alike by the Americans and Canadians; and surely we had Militia and Volunteers perfectly able to keep off such intruders till the regular troops could assist them. He believed it would not be prudent to leave the garrisons in Canada not reinforced during winter; but in summer, while Quebec was so easy of access, he could not see why they should send out in so ostentatious a manner so large a force as 3,000 men. There was another matter on which he would only speak with the greatest delicacy and reserve. Every one acquainted with Canada, or who had spoken to officers quartered there, knew how great were the temptations to which British soldiers were exposed in that colony. The Government, he hoped, had sufficiently weighed this very serious consideration when they contemplated despatching this force. If temptation at any time was held out to British soldiers to be unfaithful to their colours, how much more danger was there when every trained soldier was worth his weight almost in gold in the United States, looking more especially to the mere pittance left him after paying for his rations? He hoped, under these circumstances the Government would do something to make the British soldier feel that he had what would make him remain faithful to his regiment. This would not take much, for the British soldier was most sensible of kindness. What he suggested was, that while in Canada regiments might have free rations, and that the men when off duty might be allowed to work at their trades and assist at the harvest. He was quite aware that it was a matter of great delicacy to interfere with the disposition of Her Majesty's troops, but he thought the House had a right to demand explanations with reference to the despatch of these 3,000 men to Canada, because it might—though he trusted it would not—lead to suspicion and difficulty with a country with which it was beyond all important that we should remain at peace; it might have an effect damaging to the army, and produce a feeling of apprehension and dissatisfaction among the loyal inhabitants of Canada.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I can have no difficulty in answering the question of the hon. and gallant Officer, though I must say that I was surprised at some of the arguments which he adduced, especially considering the profession to which he belongs. I should not have expected those insinuations against the fidelity of our soldiers to have come from the mouth of a gentleman belonging to that service. I entertain no such apprehensions as he has expressed. I am persuaded that the imputations which have been cast on the British soldier are entirely unfounded. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has asked several questions which he himself answered in subsequent parts of his speech. He talked at one moment of this large expedition—this momentous measure—and at another moment he treated the force sent out of 3,000 men as insignificant and utterly insufficient for any purpose. Now, I really should wish him to tell us which of these two statements he intends to abide by?—whether he actually regards it as a momentous and large force, or as a very small and insignificant one? He also said there can be but two motives for which the force is despatched—namely, either to guard against an attack from the Americans and to interfere in the war now going on, or also for the purpose of suppressing disturbances in Canada. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has given a reply to all these suppositions. He told us that there is no apprehension whatever of an attack from the Americans; he told us that the Government have pledged themselves and the country to maintain a neutrality; and he entered into a very eloquent and well-deserved panegyric of the loyalty which prevails in every part of our North American provinces. Well, I concur in all those assertions. Undoubtedly, we have no reason to suppose that the Northern States of America would commit such an act of folly as to add a contest with us to the internal contest in which they are at present engaged. Her Majesty's Government have professed in the most solemn and public manner their intention to abstain from taking any part in the dispute now unfortunately subsisting between the Northern and Southern States. We rely implicitly on the loyalty of the people of Canada of all races—a loyalty that was manifested in the most unequivocal manner during the visit of the Prince of Wales to those provinces. Therefore, none of those reasons could be the occasion for sending a large force to Canada, the despatch of which would be a momentous measure. But it is the ordinary practice of all Governments in all parts of the world, when war breaks out and great military operations are commenced in neighbouring States, to take the small and usual precaution of strengthening in some degree their military force in that portion of their territory which is in closest proximity to the scene of hostilities. That is an ordinary precaution, the neglect of which would be blameable in those who are answerable for the interests of the country; and that we have not gone beyond that reasonable limit is proved by the hon. and gallant Member's own description of this force in the latter part of his speech as a very small one. It is a very small force; and to talk of 3,000 men being a large and momentous expedition is, I must say, an amount of exaggeration hardly to have been expected from a military officer of so much knowledge and experience as the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Well, if we have sent out only that small reinforcement—which, according to his own statement, was necessary in common prudence, because he himself complained that the garrisons of Quebec and Montreal had been brought down too low by former operations—then the question arises whether they have been sent out at the proper time and in the proper manner. The hon. and gallant Member admitted that reinforcements ought to be despatched. He said it was impossible to leave those garrisons the winter through as they have lately been, and he added that reinforcements could not be sent out in winter, but must go in summer. Well, we are sending them out in summer; and why does the hon. and gallant Gentleman complain? One thing that he said certainly a little surprised me. On former occasions we have heard complaints made that troops have been provided with insufficient means of transport, and have consequently suffered hardships and been detained too long on the passage, and the Government has been blamed for such bad arrangements. But the complaint of the hon. and gallant Gentleman now is that we send out these troops in one of the fastest vessels that can be found; that we send them out in a ship large enough to ensure their perfect comfort, and to obviate those evils which too often result from the employment of numerous small vessels for such a purpose; that, in point of fact, we have abridged the length of the voyage as much as we could, and that we have despatched them in such a manner that they will reach their destination with the least possible inconvenience and suffering. Well, I should really have thought that a military officer would have given us credit for that instead of making it a topic of censure. I have only now to say that the measure we have adopted indicates no intention whatever to take any part in the unfortunate differences now prevailing among our relatives—for I may so call them—in the United States; that it indicates no suspicion whatever of the true and undoubted loyalty of Her Majesty's subjects in our North American dominions; that it is designed solely for the purpose of making those precautionary arrangements which are essential in a country that is contiguous to another country in which disturbances exist; that we have carried it out in the manner best calculated to spare the troops any inconvenience which a sea passage too often produces; and that we trust, when they arrive in Canada, they will behave with that loyalty for which the hon. and gallant Member does not seem to give them credit, but which I am persuaded the British soldier will on all occasions exhibit.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON wished to explain. The noble Lord had asked him whether he meant that the force was too large or too small—because he had stated that it was both? What he had said was that the force was too small for any serious guarding of the frontier, but very large compared with the ordinary establishment there.

Mr. DISRAELI:—Sir, I am far from wishing to encourage a discussion of this nature; but I am not at all surprised that my hon. and gallant Friend should call the attention of the House to the departure of certainly a considerable body of troops from this country. I should not, however, have risen but for the remarks of the noble Lord, which were ingenious enough as matters of Parliamentary reply, but which, nevertheless, do not appear to be of so satisfactory a nature as could be wished. Because, after all, what is the character of this operation? The noble Lord has made a number of observations in answer to those of my hon. and gallant Friend, but he has not once touched the real point—namely, the policy of that operation, which is really what at the present moment engages the attention of the country. If those disturbances had not taken place in the United States would these 3,000 men have been sent to Canada? That is the question we are to consider, and we cannot be diverted from the real point by observations on the season of the year and all the other plausible superficialities with which the noble Lord has treated us. If the disturbances had not taken place in the United States, I repeat, would these troops have been sent from this country? If they are sent in consequence of the disturbances in the United States, what is the purpose for which they are sent? Is it to guard the frontier or to increase the garrisons? If to guard the frontier, are they sufficient for that object? If to increase the garrisons, are they necessary? These are very plain questions, and I did not discover any satisfactory reply to them in the speech of the noble Lord. I am bound to say that I view the step taken by the Government with anxiety, and not with approbation. It is a step of very great importance. The noble Lord says you cannot call this an expedition. Well, there have been expeditions not much more considerable in number sent from this country for very great objects—for example, the expedition to Portugal, which did not consist of more than 5,000 troops—and which are often referred to in this House as important historical events. So the departure of these 3,000 men for Canada, may hereafter occupy a much more important place in history than the noble Lord, or perhaps any of his colleagues at the present moment contemplate. I must say that I think it a very serious measure, and that the Government have incurred a very grave responsibility indeed. I do not, at this moment, clearly see what is the object of the despatch of these troops. Dismissing from our minds the disturbances in the United States, I do not see the necessity of this operation; and if those disturbances are its cause, then we have to consider an act of very grave policy on the part of the Government. The noble Lord will not regard it in that light, but I am bound to say that, if brought before this House, it is our duty to regard it in that light. It is possible, if these disturbances spread and greatly prevail in the United States, that there may be outrages on our Canadian frontier. I can conceive that there may be violations of our frontier and acts of outrage committed by subjects of the American Government. But are there no inhabitants in Canada—are there not a numerous and gallant people there, accustomed to military discipline? Surely in a moment of emergency, with that sense of responsibility which all free men have, the inhabitants of Canada would be adequate to the occasion, would be able to depend on their own energies, and would not require the despatch of these 3,000 troops to set them an example. On the other hand, I should say that, taking this early opportunity of letting the people of Canada know that we are prepared to assume the monopoly of defending them, is rather calculated to damp their ardour and make them feel that it is not their business to protect their hearths and homes and national honour, and that they may pursue their profitable callings without coming forward in an exigency of this character. In that view I think this proceeding unwise. But supposing these disturbances in the United States are not the cause of the despatch of these troops, the step clearly was not necessary to strengthen the garrisons. The garrisons are at that pitch of strength at which, upon the whole, and after due experience, it was the opinion of Parliament and of this country that they should be maintained. The whole tone and tendency of our policy of late years, and certainly in the present year, as shown by a vote when Parliament first met was that no increase of military expenditure, especially in respect to our colonies, should take place. Put it as you may, it comes to this—that this is an act of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It can be viewed in no other light than an act of policy adopted in consequence of the disturbances in the United States. But is it an act of sound and wise policy? I have very great doubts as to its wisdom or its soundness; and we must come to an opinion upon the point in this manner. Every one will dismiss immediately the idea that the transmission of

3,000 of Her Majesty's troops is an adequate means for preventing or baffling an invasion of Canada by the United States. That is out of the question. Gallant as our troops are, and little inclined as I am to believe that we may lose their services by other causes than the chances of war—although I think my gallant Friend was justified in alluding with delicacy and reserve to what we know from experience of former disturbances in Canada was the unfortunate result of the position of our army—still, gallant as our troops are, no one can pretend that such a force as this could be sufficient to prevent or to defeat an invasion of Canada by the United States. What, then, will be the effect of this act, apparently hostile, upon the temper of the Government and people of the United States? I do not say that we should do anything unbecoming our position or the doctrines which I think have been wisely and soundly laid down of neutrality in our relations with the Government of the United States during these disturbances; but we should do nothing wantonly to infuse into their minds the idea that there is any suspicion on the part of our Government as to their conduct, and that, therefore, the Government of this country is looking to ulterior consequences and making preparations for future misunderstandings and perhaps war. The only inference they will draw from our sending a body of troops—an expedition which is not powerful enough to defend the frontier nor necessary to increase the garrisons of the town—the only inference will be that there is on the part of the English Cabinet suspicion and fear, and a preparation for hostilities which may be contingent with the United States. I say that is unwise, and I hope such is not the opinion of the British Government, and I will cheerfully believe that it is not their opinion that such a contingency is probable; but, if their opinion should be otherwise, then I say it would not be wise nor politic to intimate that opinion in this manner, but rather they should prepare for such a sad contingency at a proper time, and take proper means by which the honour and interests of this country should be vindicated. When the noble Lord boasts of the promptitude with which the Government have availed themselves of the new means which science and skill have placed at their disposal, which enables the British Government to transmit in a short time a numerous force to the other side of the Atlantic, he must remember that the same means will permit the British Ministry to repose in confidence without exhibiting any unnecessary apprehension which circumstances may eventually not justify, knowing that with these new means which science has placed at their disposal they can throw upon any given point an amount of force with a degree of promptitude which former Governments had not the power to do. At present, I confess, it seems to me that this movement has a fretful and a feverish character, and, whatever may be the opinion of the Government as to any ulterior consequences which may accrue to Canada from these unhappy disturbances in the United States, I think it would have been better if we had acted with more forbearance, and, until necessity forced us to do otherwise, if we had continued in that tone and spirit of colonial policy adopted by Parliament at the beginning of the Session, and, as I believe, approved by the country.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, in putting a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department as to the critical state of affairs upon the coast of Morocco, I may be permitted to refer to the importance of the reply of the noble Lord, because it has been admitted by him, on the part of the Government, that this question is one of the greatest importance as affecting the interests of British trade generally, and more particularly in the neighbourhood of our great fortress of Gibraltar. At this late hour of the evening I shall not venture to trespass upon the patience of the House by any lengthened speech, but, perhaps, I may be permitted to qualify my remarks by one or two preliminary observations. It will be in the recollection of the House that when hostilities broke out between the Government of the Sultan of Morocco and that of the Queen of Spain, in consequence of hostile aggressions of the Moors against the fortresses of Melilla and Ceuta—which had been very much provoked by the attitude of the governors of those fortresses—Her Majesty's Government demanded in writing of the Spanish Government an assurance that when hostilities were concluded no occupation of any portion of the territory of Morocco west of Ceuta—nor, in fact, any portion whatever of the territory of Morocco—should be occupied as a guarantee for the payment of any indemnity which the Spanish Government might be inclined to demand for the payment of its war expenses. I think the British Government very wisely demanded that assurance, believing that the trade and commerce of the Mediterranean might be interfered with by the occupation of the opposite coast by Spain, and, moreover, that the interests of Gibraltar might be seriously affected by a successful conquest and the annexation by Spain of any portion of the territory of Morocco. The quarrel was got up in the most novel way imaginable—but I will not now enter into that. I will only say that nine-tenths of the trade of Morocco is in the hands of British subjects, and the cause of quarrel between Spain and Morocco was of the most futile character. The Spaniards extended their lines outside of Ceuta. A wild tribe in the neighbourhood removed the landmarks. The Spanish Government complained to the Government of Morocco, who yielded. The Spanish Government then made further demands and the Government of Morocco again yielded; and so it went on until at last the Government of Morocco told the other Powers of Europe and the British Minister that it was impossible for them to go on acceding to the propositions of the Spanish Government, and that if they were forced into war the responsibility must rest with the Spanish Government. Hostilities did break out, and the Spaniards were victorious. They lost 20,000 men in the course of a few months. They marched a few miles and a desultory warfare took place, but they succeeded in obtaining what they wanted—an indemnity in money—20,000,000 of piasters. The Government of Spain have already succeeded in getting 7,000,000 of piasters from the Government of Morocco; but the latter Government now say that it is impossible for them to go on paying these large sums of money; and then what does Spain do? The House will hardly believe it. There is at this moment an immense army collected in the south of Spain, and there is also prepared a large fleet or squadron, the commander-in-chief of which has visited the port of El Araiche and has threatened to occupy Mogador, which is the port of the capital of Morocco. There are numbers of British merchants not only in Mogador, but throughout the whole empire of Morocco—for, as I have said, nine-tenths of the trade of that country passes through British hands. I put it to the House and to the Government whether this interference of the Spanish Government to compel the payment of the indemnity for Morocco is not likely to have a contrary effect, because it must disturb the whole position of the Government in that savage country and the payment of the ordinary revenues is interrupted. We find from the events of 1844, as well as from the occurrences of two years since, that directly an enemy's flag arrives off the coast there are certain barbarous tribes which rise for the purpose of plunder, and all trade is at once annihilated. I ask, if British merchants are entitled to that protection which the noble Lord assured the country would be given them in case of misconduct on the part of the Spanish Government, whether occasion for it does not now exist? The House would hardly credit the amount of force that has been collected by Spain. The noble Lord the Prime Minister just now, in his usual pleasant manner, sneered at what he called not a large expedition of 3,000 men; but what does the House think is the expedition which Spain has prepared against Morocco? There are 15,000 Spanish troops at this moment upon the coast of Africa. There are also 10,000 troops collected in the south of Andalusia, and the whole Spanish navy is in the waters of Algeiras, ready to act against the coast of Morocco, and get up a squabble with this country, perhaps at the instigation of a neighbour. The Governor of Gibraltar has visited the Spanish squadron at Algeiras, and has reported the excellence both of the ships and crews. Now, I wish to ask the noble Lord whether her Majesty's Government has at all interfered with the object of effecting a settlement of the dispute between Morocco and Spain? I have recently heard that Her Majesty's Government has made some proposition for an arrangement. A peaceful settlement of the dispute will be most satisfactory, and the noble Lord will gain great credit with all persons connected with the trade and commerce of that part of the world if he arrives at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. I believe that the French Government has also offered its services for the same purpose; but it will be better if Her Majesty's Government, so excellently represented by our Minister at Tangier, Mr. Drummond Hay, can effect it unassisted. From the great influence Mr. Drummond Hay possesses in the Empire of Morocco, I believe, if he has the treatment of the matter, he will be able—if any man can—to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. The noble Lord, before the commencement of the last war, obtained from the Spanish Government an assurance in writing, twice repeated, that on no account whatever would Spain even occupy any part of the coast of Morocco. I ask the noble Lord to hold Spain to that pledge, given in 1859, and not permit the Spanish Government, to the detriment of British trade, to occupy any portion of the Morocco coast. And I will ask the House if the Government of Spain is one that ought to attack the Empire of Morocco in the way it is doing? Because Morocco has not exactly kept a treaty, is Spain, therefore, justified in sending an enormous army to invade a State at this moment in convulsions? We know that the Spanish Government itself has not been so very strict in its adherence to treaties. The noble Lord at the head of the Government lately spoke of the disgraceful bad faith—those were his very words—of Spain in reference to her treaties with this country. England entered into an agreement with Spain for the suppression of the slave trade, and paid money to the Spanish Government for that purpose. Spain not only entered into a solemn engagement by treaty to suppress the slave trade, but received a sum of money to do it. What was the consequence? Spain took the money, but in every way fostered and propagated that infamous traffic. At this moment the Captain-Generalship of Cuba is the most lucrative appointment in the gift of any Government in the world—and why? On account of the head money levied by the Captain General for every slave imported into the colony. Spain, therefore, is not the Government that ought at once to proceed to such extremities against Morocco for the non-observance of a treaty. Again, has Spain always been so very punctual in her own money transactions? She is going to war on account of the non-fulfilment of a money contract by Morocco; but how has Spain acted towards the poor Spanish bondholders in this country? How does she treat them? I believe in 1834 the Spanish Government actually owed to British subjects no less than ninety millions sterling! How did it settle the claim? Did the British Government force Spain to pay the debt, as Spain is forcing Morocco? In 1834 a compromise was made, by which the debt was reduced 33 per cent, besides the loss of many years' interest. In 1850 another arrangement was made, and by an arbitrary act of the Government the interest on the debt was reduced from 5 to 3 per cent, with the confiscation of seven millions of interest overdue. Again, the House will recollect that last year the payment of a debt of £400,000 was required from Spain by the British Government; that sum had been due for twenty years; it was never demanded for twenty years; yet it was paid with the worst possible grace, and in Spain much ill feeling and ill blood was excited towards this country. I ask the noble Lord also to consider this: there is a system of annexation being pursued, not only by France, but by Spain, that requires his vigilant and active attention. The annexation of San Domingo is a most serious and dangerous precedent. We have heard no opinion from Her Majesty's Government on that subject. The noble Lord read the other night a despatch, in which Marshal O'Donnell told him that the slave trade is not to be introduced into that island. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: No; not only not the slave trade but not slavery.] I am glad to hear it; but considering that Cuba is the hotbed of slavery and the slave trade, and that St. Domingo is only sixty miles distant, there is some danger of the traffic being extended to it. But now that the coast of Morocco is threatened by the Spanish Government I hope the noble Lord will give an assurance to the country, and to those British merchants through whose hands nearly the whole commerce of the country passes, that these Spanish forces will not arrive off the ports of Morocco and excite a feeling among the barbarous tribes that may cause them to make attacks on those towns. I hope the Spanish Government will be prepared to treat these questions in a generous spirit, and not press the Government of Morocco to extremities.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The question put by the hon. Baronet may be separated into two parts, and in replying to it I think it will be most convenient if I refrain from entering into the merits of the former war between Spain and Morocco, or into the question of the Cuban slave trade, and the manner in which Spain has fulfilled her engagements with respect to it with other Powers. With regard to the hon. Baronet's question referring to Morocco, I may state that the war between that empire and Spain was terminated by a treaty containing a stipulation that Morocco should pay to Spain an indemnity of 20,000,000 dollars and that, till 12,000,000 of that sum were paid Spain should continue to occupy part of the territory, including the city of Tetuan. In the course of time the engagements of that treaty have given rise to disputes and differences between the two countries. On the one hand the Government of Morocco states that the Moors, regarding Tetuan as a holy city, have become dissatisfied and disaffected at its occupation by a foreign and Christian Power. On the other hand, the Spanish Government complains of a want of good faith on the part of Morocco as to the payment of the indemnity. Her Majesty's Government have asked the Government of Spain what is the cause of its assembling these land and sea forces? The Spanish Government states that some of its troops in the territory of Morocco are surrounded by barbarous tribes, who are constantly breaking out into acts of violence, and that Morocco refuses to pay the instalments of the indemnity. They say they would have borne any delay in the payment of the debt, as they knew the Government of Morocco to be surrounded by difficulties, but what they will not tolerate is that Morocco should repudiate its obligations altogether, and refuse to pay the indemnity. On this explanation being given, Her Majesty's Government proffered its good offices to the Government of Spain with the view of obtaining a settlement of the dispute. At the same time we entered into communication with the Government of Morocco through Mr. Drummond Hay, to whose services the hon. Baronet has alluded. We have received from the Government of Morocco the assurance that nothing but its inability to raise the money at this moment has prevented it from paying the instalments of the indemnity, that the interruption of the payment is not the fault of the Government, nor is it caused by the want of inclination, but that the disturbed state of the country renders the Government unable at this moment to pay the 4,500,000 dollars that are due out of the 12,000,000 dollars of the stipulation. The Government of Spain, on its part, has accepted the good offices of Her Majesty's Government, and certain terms have been discussed between them. When those terms were sent out to Morocco Mr. Hay was desired to prepare himself to go to the Court of Morocco, if necessary. A message was received from the Sultan stating that it would be very agreeable to him if Mr.

Sir Robert Peel

Hay would proceed to his court; and it is believed that his presence there will have considerable effect. On the other hand, the Spanish Government appears quite willing to wait till the terms thus proposed have been considered by the Government of Morocco. And I must say that the Spanish Government has declared—and I believe with sincerity and truth—that the occupation of Tetuan by 15,000 troops is an inconvenience and a source of considerable expense; and that she would be glad to come to some terms by which they might hold some other security for the payment of the indemnity, or have the proceeds of the customs assigned to them. The Spanish Government are quite willing to consider any reasonable terms; but it is obvious that they cannot, consistently with the dignity of the Spanish nation, consent that the treaty, in which it is stipulated that a sum shall be paid by Morocco should not be carried out. I cannot deny that Spain has not always fulfilled her treaty obligations; but for my own part, I confess I look with satisfaction on the thriving resources and increasing prosperity of Spain, and I trust that our country and Spain may always be on terms of cordial friendship and alliance. If we can contribute in any way to prevent a new war breaking out between Spain and Morocco, I think that the good offices of Her Majesty's Government would be well bestowed on the effort.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee;

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £811,300, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge of the following Civil Services to the 31st day of March, 1862."

Mr. PEEL said, he thought that the hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. A. Smith), who had expressed his belief that the Vote on account was completely unnecessary, would have done better had he allowed him first to state the reasons of the application. The hon. Gentleman was under a mistake in saying that the Estimates were accepted without scrutiny by the Treasury from the different departments that made up the Civil Service, and that the Government held that the House ought to receive them on the responsibility of the Executive. Her Majesty's Government had no objection to the Estimates being subjected to the closest scrutiny which the House could institute; and even his short experience at the Treasury enabled him to say that, when received from the different departments, they were subjected to a scrutiny only second in severity to that to which they were subjected in that House. The hon. Gentleman said that the effect of granting Votes on account would be to postpone to the end of the Sessions the consideration of these Estimates in detail; but if the hon. Gentleman would refer to the papers in the hands of hon. Members, he would find that the Vote proposed to be taken on account formed a very small proportion of the total amount required. The sum asked was exceedingly moderate, and was just sufficient to meet the payments that were immediately falling due. The hon. Gentleman was under the impression that the Government had large balances on hand on each of the Votes, applicable to the purposes for which money was now asked, and referred particularly to two Votes of last year, one in the Treasury and the other in the Foreign Department, of which he said there must be a considerable amount left over. From a return which he had obtained of the Exchequer balances on the 19th of June, he found that there was no balance upon either of the Votes in question. Indeed, omitting the balances of the sums granted by the House on account, and a couple of balances of large amount applicable to the maintenance of prisons and prisoners, the balances in the Exchequer did not reach £30,000, a sum obviously insufficient to meet the payments that fell due at the termination of the quarter. All the services for which the Vote was now asked were of an established character, and had repeatedly received the sanction of the House, and to which the sanction of the House would no doubt continue to be given. It did not include any new Vote, or any Vote involving a question of principle likely to excite discussion. Nearly the whole of the sum was to be applied to the payment of pensions and salaries for services actually rendered, which could not be postponed without hardship and inconvenience to the parties entitled and some discredit to the country. In agreeing to the Vote the House would not abandon any portion of their control over the Estimates, or delay the discussion of them. There might not be many examples, except of late years, of voting money on account, but the circumstances of former times were totally different from those of the present time in that respect. There were only two ways in which, in these latter times, Votes on account could be avoided. Either the House must be prepared to pass the Civil Service Estimates early in the Session, or soon after the commencement of the financial year; or else they must permit the Government to retain large balances in their hands applicable to those services, till the period arrived when the Estimates could be proceeded with in Committee of Supply. Hon. Members could judge as well as he could whether it was possible to arrange the business of the Government so that the Estimates might be passed early in the Session. Experience showed that it was not sufficient to place Supply on the paper to secure a night for it, because nearly every question had precedence of it. Moreover, it was necessary to Vote the Army and Navy Estimates at the commencement of the Session. The Army Estimates had not been unusually delayed this year, in order to make way for the general business of the Government, and yet they were not concluded. In his opinion, it was impossible to count with certainty upon getting through with the Civil Service Estimates early in the Session. The objection to the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman, of submitting to the House the Votes on which balances were falling short, was that it assumed the continued existence of those balances. The Public Money Committee of 1857, recommended that the practice of allowing the Government to use the grants for any year after its expiration should be abandoned, and that, as in the case of the Army and Navy Estimates, the Government should, at the end of each year, surrender any balances that remained to the Exchequer. The Committee of last year on the Miscellaneous Estimates gave a similar recommendation; and if that plan were adopted, Votes on account would be indispensable. Presuming that the House would adopt the recommendation of the Committee, the Government were anxious to make such arrangements as would facilitate the transition from the old to the new system. Under these circumstances he trusted the Committee would not hesitate to grant the Vote.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH hoped that

they would not establish a principle of going on from year to year voting money without being allowed to discuss the Estimates in proper time. There had been almost a promise that the Estimates would be introduced in sufficient early time to allow of the various Votes being discussed before the House lost its proper control over them. As the Government refused to assent to his proposition, and as the Estimates must come before the House in a few days in regular course, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that until within the last three years, Votes on account had never been asked for except on extraordinary occasions. This was the second time this year that the House was asked for a large Vote on account. The sum now applied for, with that voted six months ago, would amount to £1,311,000. The result of the present system was, that they were called upon to vote upwards of £40,000,000 without having a fair opportunity of discussing the items of which that large sum was composed. Nominally, there were now four nights a weeks for Supply; but, as all sorts of questions took precedence, it was usually about midnight before the House got into Committee. If there were one night in the week on which Supply should take precedence of all other business, that would afford a remedy for what must be admitted to be an evil. As the Secretary for the Treasury said that the money now asked for was wanted, the Committee could not refuse it; but he hoped they would set their face against a repetition of the system year after year.

SIR FRANCIS BARING observed that his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth was quite correct in saying that the practice of taking Votes on account had become more frequent of late years; but there was another practice which had been very rare in former times, and was very common now. He alluded to the custom of moving Amendments on the Motion for going into Supply. The result of this was to render it impossible for the Government to bring on the Estimates at as early a period as formerly. There was another reason which ought to induce the Committee not to throw any obstacles in the way of the Government on an occasion like the present. Hitherto, the Government had been in the habit of carrying over large balances. That practice had been objected to by more than one Committee appointed to consider questions relating to the public expenditure.

In order to meet the views of those Committees the Government had reduced their balances, and they now returned to the Exchequer sums which, according to the old practice, they might have kept. His hon. Friend hoped that Votes on account would not be continued; but he forgot the recommendation of his own and other Committees—namely, that the accounts of the Army and Navy should be closed at a particular time, and that, in order to meet the exigencies of the Civil Service, Votes on account should be taken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, there was a third practice to which the right hon. Gentleman should have referred, which was that the Government were falling into the habit, when an awkward question was brought forward by an independent Member, of getting the House counted out. His own case furnished an illustration of the impediments thrown in the way of private Members. Soon after Easter he gave notice of a Motion, and, having balloted, got the first place. On the night when it should have come on, however, the Government, who, as he understood, were opposed to the Motion, hinted that it was desirable there should be no attendance, and so to avoid being counted out he was obliged to postpone his Motion. A second time he understood that he was to be counted out. At last he was able to get a day; and then, to his surprise, he found that the Government were prepared to grant his Motion. In that way much valuable time was lost. The same things happened in other cases, so that although the Government had this Session got an additional night for Supply they seemed to make no additional progress. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the recommendation of the Committee on Public Moneys. But what they recommended was that the grants for the Civil Service should be made on the same principle as the grants for the Army and Navy, namely, for the supply and service of the year, and not for the money to be spent within the year; and in order to facilitate that arrangement it was thought necessary that the money should be voted on account at an early period of the Session. The old maxim was Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus; but here the Government were reaping the advantage without fulfilling the obligation—they were getting money on account without giving to the House the opportunity of granting the Supplies on the principle of the Army and Navy Votes. No Vote was taken on account in the case of Civil Service Estimates, unless on a great emergency. Last year they were told that the circumstances were peculiar, but that it must not be drawn into a precedent. Exactly the same thing was said now; but, if the House were ever to stop the practice, they must make a stand at some time or other, because every year added one to the precedents which would be relied on in favour of this irregular practice. He thought they might most conveniently make such a stand in the present instance. It had been urged that the money was wanted to pay salaries before the 1st or 5th of July, but there was plenty of time to go into Committee of Supply and take the Votes required before that time. Then it was said that the House did not lose its control over the Estimates by adopting this course. In theory this might be so, but in practice the House certainly lost all useful control over expenditure by assenting to such a course—because if the Government had the opportunity of putting off every important matter until the end of the Session, when everybody was out of town, there could be no discussion. Several questions of much interest were to be raised upon these Votes. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had given notice of a Motion on the whole subject of national education. Probably the same thing would happen in this as in the last Session, when his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) gave notice of a Motion on the same subject, but was only able to bring it forward late in August. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) intended, upon the Packet Estimates, to bring this subject under notice, and the question was one which ought to be discussed in a full House; but of this, according to present appearances, there was little chance. It was said, “Oh, but the House never reduces these Votes.” But if it did not do so its criticism had the effect of keeping the Government alive to the necessity of reduction and of preventing extravagant Votes. The present system in this House seemed altogether very unsatisfactory. First they voted Ways and Means, then they attended to matters of general legislation, and Supply was left to the fag end of the Session, though this was the most important function of the Commons. If this practice continued the House would gradually lose much of its authority over the national expenditure, and would cease to fulfil one of its most imperative duties.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER agreed with his hon. Friend in thinking it a public inconvenience, and a serious public evil, that the discussion on the Miscellaneous Estimates should be postponed to so late a period of the Session. The subject well deserved consideration, both by the Government and the House, in order that further remedies might, if possible, be applied for the cure of such an inconvenience. But when his hon. Friend talked about the Government having gained so much by an additional night for Supply, he ought to remember that, though this gain had not been without value, its real effect had been exceedingly small. As to the course now proposed, he could not concur in the criticisms which had been passed upon it. His hon. Friend talked about the Government getting into the habit of having the House counted out on Supply nights. Now, he did not know that the Government were any more responsible for "counts out" on such nights than his hon. Friend or any other Member who had Motions on the paper. The fact was that on a single night when Supply was to have come on the House was counted, to the great surprise of the Government themselves; and this solitary instance, with which the Government had nothing to do, was converted by his hon. Friend into "a habit" on the part of the Government in procuring counts out. His hon. Friend thought a stand ought to be made against the practice of demanding Votes on account for miscellaneous services; but the allegation on which he founded his argument failed. He had referred to the Committee on Public Moneys, but it was precisely because of the approximation they had made to the recommendations of that Committee that the Government were now obliged to come for money on account. If they had made no changes in the old system they would have had at this moment such an amount of balances in hand as would have enabled them to go on without difficulty. But the balances had been greatly reduced, with the view to facilitate an approach to a new system, and, therefore, the sole reason why they were now obliged to ask for Votes on account was because an important part of the recommendations of the Committee had been followed. As to the suggestions that the substantive Votes now in question should be taken, that arrangement would be a most inconvenient one, for if they were to take the substantive Votes as the necessity for the money arose, it would be necessary to break up the order of the Estimates, disturb the calculations of the Government as to the time public business would be taken, and throw the whole business of Parliament into confusion. He submitted that this would be a much greater inconvenience than taking these Votes on account. It would be wrong to ask for Votes on account for new services, but as the Vote now required was to carry on the current services and to provide for the current expenditure, with respect to which the differences of opinion were comparatively limited, he thought that it was more expedient to take it in that form than to bring forward ten, twenty, or thirty, and ask the House to agree to them at the fag-end of an evening.

MR. HENLEY was afraid that the Government were carrying on the old and new systems at the same time. The Committee on Public Moneys recommended that the accounts should be closed; but that had not been done. The right hon. Gentleman said that they were approximating to it, but there was no security that they would not approximate the other way. The right hon. Gentleman might keep oscillating. He did oscillate sometimes. He might take advances when it suited him, and keep the balances when it suited him. They had not even a pledge that the recommendations of the Committee would be entirely carried out. They ought at least to have some such promise. What had happened? The Government had not only asked for money on account, but they had asked for it in dribblets. This was the second dose of the same physic which they had had this Session, and there might be a third dose in store for them. It might or it might not be more inconvenient to take the Estimates piecemeal, but he must certainly protest against this mode of carrying on business. The right hon. Gentleman said that the House had only been counted out upon one Supply night, but there had been many nights on which the Government might have put Supply upon the Orders, and had not done so, which came to much the same thing. The House had for one week been engaged in the discussion of a small Reform Bill, the advantage of which was very doubtful, when it might have been much better employed in Committee of Supply.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had thought it unnecessary to reiterate the pledge for which the right hon. Gentleman had asked, because it had been given some time ago, and the Government had already taken steps towards its fulfilment by introducing a measure with regard to Exchequer Bills, and moving the appointment of a Committee on Public Accounts, the Report of which would, he trusted, lead to the settlement of one or more of the other recommendations of the Committee, but it was impossible to adopt all the recommendations of the Committee at once.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that under existing circumstances the Government was justified in asking for money on account; but he should like to know when the recommendations of the Committee respecting these Estimates would be adopted as a whole? Until it was so adopted there could be no proper system of audit. He hoped the Bill founded on the Report of the Committee would be introduced forthwith. Expenditure could not be discussed in the dog-days, and it was absurd to suppose that Supply could be fairly entertained after a mass of questions had been ventilated, and when the time had arrived that the House ought to be in bed.

MR. PEELE said, that a Bill had been prepared the object of which was to carry into effect the recommendations of the Public Money's Committee with regard to the audit of the public accounts, but its introduction had been delayed in consequence of the appointment of the Committee on Public Accounts. That Committee had now nearly terminated its labours, and the Bill would shortly be brought forward.

MR. DISRAELI said, that last year he called the attention of the Committee to the Vote on account which was then proposed. The feeling of the House was that that mode of proceeding was very objectionable, and the Vote was agreed to under a general protest. That Vote, however, was granted under very different circumstances from those under which this one was now asked for. Last year the Government asked for money on account, because it had laid before the House some "large and comprehensive measures." These measures were a Reform Bill and a Commercial Treaty, and it was clear that there must be considerable delay in getting through the Committees of Supply. This year no one would pretend that there had been introduced any large or comprehensive measures which could at all have retarded the progress of Supply, if the business of the House had been arranged with that adroitness and good management which the House had a right to expect. That was the opinion of the Government themselves, because in the middle of February his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) asked when the Miscellaneous Estimates would be produced?—and he was assured by the right hon. Gentleman opposite with some self-complacency that they would be introduced almost immediately. What else had happened this year? Almost as soon as the House met a Committee was appointed to consider the arrangements as to the transaction of public business, and, if possible, to facilitate its progress. There might be some controversy as to the recommendations of the Committee, but hon. Members on both sides of the House would admit that the desire of that Committee was to further the progress of public business and to give every possible facility to the Government. Another day in the week was given to them, and other regulations were made, the sole object of which was to facilitate the progress of public business. The Government had not brought forward any large measures, and, though the House had given them additional facilities, the House yet found itself in this unpleasant position. It, therefore, became the Committee to consider what course they would take to prevent a repetition of a proceeding which a moment's reflection would show to be rife with most injurious consequences to the public welfare. By agreeing systematically to vote money on account the Committee could not conceal from itself that practically it was putting an end to all control over the public expenditure. Except Her Majesty's Government would reconsider their course and withdraw this proposition, which he hoped they would see the propriety of doing, there was nothing left for the Committee but to express its opinion distinctly by its vote. It would not be at all difficult for Her Majesty's Government to make the arrangements necessary for procuring the Supply which they required in due course and time. He trusted the Committee would feel that they had a responsible office to perform, and unless they did so they must make up their minds, in the words of his hon. Friend the Member for Stamford, that they were relinquishing some of the most important functions which they were called on to discharge.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped the House would not agree to the Motion for reporting Progress. The Government were quite aware of the inconvenience of postponing the Estimates to a late period of the Session; but, really, if the Committee would look back to the mode in which the time of the House had been occupied, it would be seen that the request which the Government now made was not owing to any indifference on their part, or to any disposition to postpone the Estimates to a late period. Take, for instance, the last night of Supply; twenty-nine Notices were given of subjects to be discussed before the Speaker left the chair; about four of these were got through, and, no doubt, notice of the remainder would be renewed for some future evening. It was only aggravating the evil of which the hon. Member complained to refuse this Vote. It would only entail great inconvenience on innocent persons—namely, public servants for whose pay the money was required, and it would answer no other purpose whatever. The Government were exceedingly anxious to get on with business, but he could not take upon himself to ask Gentlemen to postpone all their Notices till Tuesday. The Government were accused of allowed the House to be counted out; but that occurrence had usually happened on Tuesday nights, when, if forty Gentlemen who were interested in Motions that had been put down for that evening had been in their places to watch them, no “count out” could possibly have occurred. The Government were not bound to keep a House against the wishes of Members when there was no business before it. To show that they were in earnest, they proposed to avail themselves of the new regulations proposed by the Committee, and to take Supply as the first order to-morrow.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the Committee on Public Business had recommended that Government should have the power of putting down Supply on Tuesday nights; yet this was the first instance in which they had availed themselves of the privilege. The effect of the course taken by Government in not trying to forward business on Tuesday evenings, and in allowing the House to be counted out was that Members were obliged to put down their notices for Supply nights, thereby causing the inconvenience which was now complained of.

Viscount Palmerston

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 148: Majority 49.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

MR. PEELE admitted that the balances remaining of Votes formerly granted were very considerable.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked for information respecting the time when the Miscellaneous Estimates would be brought on for discussion, and the order in which they would be taken?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is impossible to say when, but as soon as possible. We must first dispose of the Army Estimates.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

PAROCHIAL AND BURGH SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, one object of the Bill was to abolish the exclusive test that the schoolmaster should belong to the Established Church in Scotland. On the other hand it provided that they should teach the Holy Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism as set forth by the Westminster confession of faith. He did not say he liked this test, if test it was to be called. The Bill proposed to raise the salaries of the schoolmasters. At this moment the minimum of these salaries was £22 a year, and the maximum £28 or £29. He need not say that that remuneration was disgracefully inadequate. The Bill proposed to raise the salaries, the maximum being £60 a year—which he was far from saying was sufficient. But if they could join in doing away with the exclusive test he saw no reason why in a future Session they should not depart from the system of educational grants, and revert to the good old Scotch system of having a truly national education in Scotland.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE regretted the Bill had been introduced into the House at so late a period in the Session, as it deprived the House of an opportunity of discussing it. It would, moreover, have been but fair if the Bill had been brought forward at a time when the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland would have had the opportunity of considering it. The Bill was introduced in 1854: then it was rejected by a majority of one. In 1857 it was carried by a majority of above thirty, but the Bill had been always rejected in the other House, and a similar fate would probably attend this. He trusted that the superintendence of the Presbytery would be continued over the parish schools. He desired to see the schools maintained on their present footing.

MR. BLACK said, that he was opposed to many of the clauses of the Bill. The only good thing about it was the proposal to increase the salaries; but, then, at present the heritors were obliged to provide the funds; but now the proprietors and the tenants were joined with the heritors; but while they were joined with the heritors in providing the funds the heritors were to decide upon their application, and also upon the allowance to the schoolmaster. But what he was chiefly opposed to was the test. At present all that was necessary was a confession of faith; and the teacher was not bound to teach any particular theological doctrines, but this Bill proposed to lay down that he should teach doctrines in accordance with the Short Catechism.

MR. MURE would vote for the second reading of the Bill, and thought that the declaration would be most usefully settled in Committee.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Tuesday, 2nd July, at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

LORD BROUGHAM asked the President of the Council (Earl Granville) if the Commissioners' Inquiry into Public Schools had been issued, as Lord Campbell had stated it was nearly ready; and had also mentioned the good conduct of those in authority in these schools, and of the Universities, as such that the inquiry could be conducted without any Act of Parliament being introduced—a thing greatly to the honour of these persons?

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was quite that there had been every disposition to aid the inquiry, as Lord Brougham had stated, but the Commission, though nearly ready, had not been issued.

LORD BROUGHAM trusted that it would contain no exception, so as to exempt any schools from the inquiry. The Act of 1818 had, unfortunately, exempted the great schools from its operation, and he had reluctantly been forced to agree to this exception, the consequence of which was that what would have been accomplished above forty years ago had to be done now. He had endeavoured to have the exemption removed in the Act of 1819, but in vain. The influence of Lord Eldon had proved too powerful. His Bill of 1818 had been by what in these days was a kind of political miracle carried against Lord Eldon in their Lordships' House on the second reading, and he was certain that if he refused to insert the exemption, the Bill would be lost in its subsequent stages altogether. The exemption was of all schools having special visitors, and it had been afterwards found by the Education Committee whose sittings continued a week or two after the Bill passed that these were the most full of abuses.

SUBDIVISION OF DIOCESES BILL.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD LYTTTELTON, in presenting the Report from the Select Committee to whom this Bill had been referred, said, the Committee had given it great attention, and had made many alterations in it; but as, in his opinion, the essential principle of the measure was preserved, he should ask the House to agree to all the Amendments except one. A clause had been introduced enacting that "no scheme for creating a new See, or creating a new Dean and Chapter, shall take effect until it has been laid for six weeks before both Houses of Parliament, nor if within that time either House of Parliament shall have addressed the Crown in opposition to it." The attendance of Members of the Select Committee on the occasion when that proviso was introduced was small, and he believed that several voted for the clause under the impression that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) was in favour of such a provision. He felt that the clause was inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, and he should ask their Lordships to reverse the decision of the Select Committee when the Bill was before them in Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, if the noble Lord should think it necessary to propose to reverse the decision of the Select Committee he should feel absolved from giving any assistance whatever to any other portion of the Bill.

LORD OVERSTONE suggested, that it was desirable the minutes of the Select Committee should be laid on the table and printed.

Bill reported, with Amendments; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

MOTION FOR REGULATIONS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving for a copy of the Regulations under which Masters or Mates of Merchant Vessels may be enrolled as Officers of the Royal Naval Reserve, said he would take occasion to remove a false impression which he was afraid had been created by a former discussion. A reserved list of officers of some kind was absolutely necessary in case of war. A navy list which might be suitable for a condition of peace would not be suitable for a condition of war. We had now of lieutenants on the active list, according to the published list of April 1861, the number of 855, but the whole number of lieutenants unemployed was 150, and of those 150 only 25 would be available for active service. There were many lieutenants on the active list who still in point of age might be capable of service, but it would be most inconvenient to employ them as lieutenants, because of the position in which their seniority would place them, in consequence of the length of time since they had been on the active list. There were only 25 unemployed lieutenants available for active service. But how was this deficiency to be remedied? On a former occasion it was said promote more mates. The number of mates in April last was 86. The mates never remained beyond a year in that rank, whenever their captains reported they were fit for promotion. It might be said enter more cadets and you will get more officers. That was a very proper mode of proceeding, and for the last three or four years, instead of about 100, as had been the case before, about 200 a year had been entered. It should be remembered that the entry of too great a number in one year was very unfavourable to future promotion in the navy. It might give the Admiralty a certain amount of patronage and popularity, but it would be bad for the service, and bad for the officers themselves. By bringing a number of young men into the navy of the same year's standing their chances of promotion would be diminished; it would produce a large list of officers without employment during time of peace, and who, by being unemployed, would necessarily become inefficient. It created at the same time a very serious charge upon the finances of the country. We had now been at peace, as far as the navy was concerned, for a great many years, and he would state to their Lordships the present condition of the Navy List. Of Admirals we had now on the active and retired list 309, whereas, in 1816, at the conclusion of the war, we had only 235. The list had, therefore, gone on extending and the pressure of the deadweight on the taxpayers of the country had been greatly increased. The number of Admirals in actual employ was about 20. In the same way, the total number of Captains on the active and retired list was 774; so that there was an immense amount of money paid in proportion to the services rendered by the captains. The charge for the retired officers was becoming very serious. The payment on account of the reserve and retired list of Admirals, Captains, Commanders, and Lieutenants, omitting pensions, Marines, surgeons, and paymasters—amounted to £346,000 a year. During the last ten years this deadweight had largely increased. In 1851 the charge was only £205,000 a year, including the Marines; now, it was £442,000, also including the Marines; and this result was owing not to any considerable war, but to the necessity of bringing up active young men as officers, and of, therefore, placing others on the retired list. Their Lordships would, therefore, see that if the navy was to be placed on such a footing as would make it adequate for a war, their Lordships must consider how they could best obtain the requisite supply of officers without at the same time entailing any great deadweight upon the country. It was said, "If you cannot promote naval cadets, at least promote masters." In the first place however, masters ranked as lieutenants, and, therefore, no advantage would be derived to them from this measure. Moreover, in the event of war, there was not a sufficient number of masters, and that being so, it would be most unwise to make the masters lieutenants. No other plan, therefore, seemed available except that of bringing in officers from the merchant service. These officers now underwent as strict an examination as the officers of the navy, and were fully competent to perform the duties expected from them. Two objections had been started to the proposal. First it was said that these officers would not enter the service; and then, that by inviting them to come, he was interfering with the course of promotion in the navy. Now he wished to say by these regulations he did not in any way interfere with naval promotions; and in the next place he believed that these officers would not only not object, but would be quite willing to serve under captains in the navy. He proposed that after serving for a time they should be eligible for honorary rank in the Reserve, which would run parallel to rank in the navy, but would not interfere with the Navy List. If these officers distinguished themselves by special service in time of war, they might be introduced into the navy on equal terms with those on which they were serving. That, however, would necessarily apply only to a limited number because he apprehended that, their pay being higher in the merchant service, few would be willing to leave the employment absolutely for service in the Royal Navy. At the same time he believed that they would willingly give their services in time of war. As to the masters of the navy, their position had been much improved by recent Orders in Council. Their pay had been increased, their rank and position in the service much improved, and the Admiralty were, therefore, now in a fair way of obtaining more of this useful class of officers. That being so, it would be undesirable to interfere further with their position, except in respect of their appointment as masters-attendant in the dockyards, in which case it would be fair to them to increase their pay. As their Lordships knew, the number of lieutenants was limited by Order in Council to the number of 1,200, and it was considered desirable to increase them gradually to 1,000, but not to any larger number, because otherwise they hampered each other, stopped promotion, and became disheartened, or if promoted to be captains or commanders, it was at a time of life when they were unfitted for service. The men whose services he desired to obtain were otherwise well qualified to fill these situations, and if they would devote themselves to gunnery and drill they would be of great use in the service. By employing them, too, he hoped to add to the popularity of the navy, for they would bring in with them men who had served under them in the large steamers and ships which they commanded. In every way the navy would gain by employing them; and when the war was over the great majority would retire with honorary rank, and would be quite willing to resume their old calling. This, generally, was the scheme which he proposed. He had framed Regulations for the purposes which he should now lay upon the Table, only premising that in preparing them he had been greatly assisted by two officers of the Admiralty whose loss the department had now to deplore before the document was completed, and if any errors had crept into the Regulations their Lordships must attribute them to him, and not to the other members of the Board. A further stage of the Bill in reference to this subject would, he hoped, be taken a week hence, and meanwhile it would be open to their Lordships to consider the Regulations which the Bill enabled the Admiralty to frame.

Moved, That there be laid before this House, Copy of the Regulations under which Masters or Mates of Merchant Vessels may be enrolled as officers of the Royal Naval Reserve.

LORD COLCHESTER said, the noble Duke's statement showed that previous Boards of Admiralty had allowed the number of junior officers to fall far too low. He was informed that a great deficiency existed with regard to these officers in the larger ships, and that the want of discipline on board some of those ships, about which much had lately been said, had arisen in a great degree from the absence of a sufficient number of these junior officers to mix with the men and check anything that was going wrong.

THE EARL OF DERBY asked if the officers about to be introduced into the service would be promoted beyond the rank of lieutenant? The list of officers above that rank was already overflowing. If the new officers were promoted beyond the lieutenant's rank, in case of a future war would they be called on to serve in the higher grade?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, in cases of distinguished service the new officers would be promoted by the Admiralty in the Reserve to a higher rank than lieutenant. In case of retirement they would take the higher honorary rank; but they would not be required to serve in it. If wounded in the service they would be entitled to the same compensation as officers of the navy.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUES CONTINUANCE BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Mr. AYRTON moved,

“1. That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill that they have power to make provision therein continuing the fund provided by Sections 2 and 5 of the Act 11 Geo. IV., c. 64, and for paying the proceeds thereof to the account to be opened under the Bill.”

He could not but express his regret that towards the close of a Session in which there had been so little real work done, the Government should have appointed a morning sitting for the consideration of a Bill so important as that before the House. The Government made and kept a House—with difficulty it was true—but it was composed chiefly of Gentlemen who were its immediate supporters; and it was hardly to be expected that independent Members should attend. Consequently that a Member should speak at such a time was like appealing to the Government, and not to the House itself. The Government in acting as they had had failed in one of their most responsible duties, and had lent themselves to the Corporation of the City, in bringing in a Bill to promote the advantage of that Corporation. He was compelled at this stage to interfere by moving a series of Instructions, which as they related to distinct funds would have to be taken separately and distinctly, though they all were proposed with the single purpose of doing justice between the comparatively small body of the inhabitants of the City and the large and important body of the inhabitants of the Metropolis. The following were the Instructions of which he had given notice:—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill that they have power to make provisions in the Bill for continuing the fund provided by Sections 2 and 5 of the Act 11 Geo. 4, c. 64, and for paying the proceeds thereof to the account to be opened under the Bill. That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works the lands, tenements, and hereditaments called the Bridge House Estates, now vested in the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London, subject to any trust affecting the same, and any charges thereon, and for paying the surplus income thereof to the account to be opened under the Bill. That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works all lands, tenements, and hereditaments now vested in the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London under any statute for making improvements within the Metropolis (except markets), subject to the trusts affecting the same, and the repayment of any monies raised by the said Corporation under such statutes, and thereby charged on such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works all the powers conferred by such Statutes on the said Corporation. That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for the payment of the metage dues on grain, fruit, wares, or merchandise received by the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London, to the account to be opened under the Bill. That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for payment by the Conservators of the river Thames of the surplus of the annual income received by them to the account to be opened under the Bill.”

Confining his attention for the present to the first, the question it raised was simply whether the House, at the instance of the Government, should make a free gift to the Corporation of the coal dues, instead of retaining them for the purposes to which they had been applied for the last hundred years? It was really quite startling that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary should have taken the course he had, after the preliminary information he had received. After the great fire the House, out of compassion, consented to a tax being imposed on the coal imported into the City for the purpose of rebuilding the town, then re-erecting its churches, and then embanking the Thames. After the Revolution of 1688, the orphans of the City complained to Parliament that the City had taken possession of their fortunes, in order to keep them till their owners came of age; but that the City had refused to repay the money, alleging that they were hopelessly insolvent in consequence of the civil troubles through which it had gone — though, in truth, it had been caused in no small degree by its revellings. Parliament, therefore, decided that the City should have a fixed sum of £8,000 or £10,000 a year for its expenses, and that the rest of its revenues should be applied to the payment of its debts. The City would not, however, accept that, but, following the example of the East India Company, it bribed the House of Commons from the Speaker down to the clerk; the result was that Parliament agreed that the City should be left in possession of its revenues, and that its debts should be consolidated into permanent annuities, the interest of which should be defrayed out of certain special ways and means, namely, £8,000 out of the Corporation of Revenue, £990 the profits of certain aqueducts, and certain apprentice and other fees. Parliament also granted duties on coal and wine, the whole amounting to a revenue of £20,000 a year. As the City increased the fund became larger than the money required for payment of the interest on the annuities, and since 1767 the fund was converted into a Metropolitan Improvement Fund, but, at first, it was charged by various Acts of Parliament with the cost of peculiar works. When London Bridge was to be pulled down, a new fund of a million was created, and called the London Bridge Approaches Fund. On that occasion, the Corporation had the Act so artfully framed, that they were enabled by it to withdraw the fund to which he was now referring. It soon, however, came to the knowledge of the public that Parliament had been duped; the House of Commons in 1830—not then “a reformed,” but what was called a corrupt one—was indignant at the fraud, and the next Session it passed an Act ordering the Corporation to pay back the money. Then, as now, the Corporation had endeavoured to fix the attention of the House and of the public upon the magnitude of the works they had in hand, forgetting that the real question was not one of a great public work, but simply whether the House should make the Corporation a free gift? He denied that the Corporation had any right to the money at all. The fund was given to assist the Corporation when it was insolvent, and the annuities had been redeemed by the growing population of the Metropolis. The inhabitants had therefore, paid the debt, and ought to have the fund. He trusted, therefore, that the House would agree to the first Instruction, the only object of which was to enable the subject to be discussed in Committee.

MR. W. WILLIAMS seconded the Resolution.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT said, he would not follow the hon. Gentleman through his historical reminiscences. The City was not much interested in the question, which was merely the carrying out of those great works of improvement which were so much required in the Metropolis. The City was only interested in 4*d.* out of the 13*d.* imposed by the Bill, the remaining 9*d.* having been under the control of Parliament for a great number of years. The City merely collected the money and handed it over, but it had no other interest in the matter.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had, according to his wont, addressed to the House a Jeremiad, in which he had represented himself to be the only person that cared for the public good. The great delinquent, according to him, was the Corporation, but the Government, he said, were also very much to blame. It was only on the previous evening that the Government had been blamed for bringing in Bills of importance in preference to Supply, which was this Session in arrear. If he (Sir George Lewis) had placed the present Bill on the Paper for a Government night, he was perfectly certain that he should have been blamed for giving it precedence over Supply. He would appeal to the House whether it was not the usual and convenient course to bring on such Bills at this period of the Session at morning sittings? The Bill was founded upon the Report of a Committee of last Session, which might be taken as a fair embodiment of the sense of the House, and which had recommended that the embankment of the Thames should be carried out with money raised by means of the coal and wine dues. He had never proposed to deal with the London Bridge grown traffic of the Metropolis must be apparent to every one, and he did not think, therefore, that the coal tax could be more usefully appropriated than to the embankment of the Thames. At the same time he wished that they were not to be wholly confined to that object; for he should like to see Waterloo and Southwark bridges, and also the bridge over Deptford-creek, thrown open to the public. The last would be a great boon to the labouring classes.

LORD FERMOY said, that the question really was how were the necessary metropolitan improvements to be made? To carry out those improvements they had no alternative but to continue the coal and wine duties. The sum of £11,500 contributed by the London Corporation had, no doubt, been always appropriated to metropolitan improvements, but he did not think the present was a proper occasion on which to deal with the subject. It was one which should be taken up along with the other matters that might be reported upon by the Committee now sitting.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, he would make but a few remarks on the subject before the House. The Corporation had been spoken of in the course of the present discussion as if they were legislating solely for their own private interest. As a member of the Corporation, he must say that that body had only one object in view, and that was to give every possible facility to those having business to transact in the City without regard to any private interest of their own. The Corporation received a revenue of £5,000 from old Fleet Market, and although the constructing of Farringdon Market had proved a failure, no blame was to be attached to the Corporation for such an event. The City had pledged its credit for the cost of constructing the New Cattle Market and new Cannon Street, and in doing so they had expended in the various improvements during the last sixty or seventy years, as had been proved before the Committee, nearly £340,000 more than their receipts. There would still exist, supposing the new improvements were carried out, great demands upon the City, for assuredly, as soon as the Thames embankment was constructed, a new street from thence to the Bank of England would have to be made.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the London Coal and Wine Dues Continuance Bill that they have power to make provision therein for continuing the fund provided by sections 2 and 5 of the Act 11 Geo. 4, c. 64, and for paying the proceeds thereof to the account to be opened under the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 160: Majority 155.

MR. AYRTON said, that after what had taken place, it would be wrong in him to prolong the discussion, and he should not, therefore, divide the House, although he would, in order to place them on the record, move the following Resolutions:—

Motion made, and Question,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the London Coal and Wine Dues Continuance Bill, that they have power to make provision therein for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works the lands, tenements, and hereditaments called the Bridge House Estates, now vested in the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London, subject to any trust affecting the same, and any charges thereon, and for paying the surplus income thereof to the account to be opened under the Bill."

Put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the London Coal and Wine Dues Continuance Bill that they have power to make provision therein for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works all lands, tenements, and hereditaments now vested in the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London under any Statute for making improvements within the Metropolis (except markets), subject to the trusts affecting the same, and the repayment of any monies raised by the said Corporation under such Statutes, and thereby charged on such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and for transferring to the Metropolitan Board of Works all the powers conferred by such Statutes on the said Corporation."

Put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the London Coal and Wine Dues Continuance Bill, that they have power to make provision therein for payment of the metage dues on grain, fruit, wares, or merchandize received by the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London, to the account to be opened under the Bill."

Put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the London Coal and Wines Dues Continuance Bill, that they have power to make provision therein for payment by the Conservators of the River Thames of the surplus of the annual income received by them to the account to be opened under the Bill."

Put, and negatived.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Continuance of Coal Dues),

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wished to move Amendments which would have the effect of abolishing altogether the penny duty which had been levied for the purpose of building the Coal Exchange; and also imposing a tax of 8*d.* per ton for fifteen years instead of 1*s.* per ton for ten years. The cost of embanking the Thames would not be more than a million, and a tax of 8*d.* would produce £100,000 a year.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the pressure of the coal dues was not so strong as had been represented. The proposition was to reduce the duty received for metropolitan improvements. The 5*d.* tax, which would remain after the proposed alteration, would produce about £90,000, while the 9*d.* produced £160,000. Therefore, the amount of tax applicable to the Thames Embankment would produce £150,000 nett, and if they took away £9,000 a year he feared they would not leave a sufficient sum to defray the probable expense of such a large undertaking. He could not concur in the Amendment.

MR. LOCKE said, he inferred, from the very fact that the Motion was made by the Member for Durham, that it was intended for the benefit of the coal-owner. He should, therefore, give it his determined opposition.

MR. R. HODGSON supported the Amendment.

MR. LIDDELL denied that his right hon. Friend was acting solely on behalf of the coal owners. It was certainly very unfair to retain the penny for the Coal Exchange, which had long since been paid for, and in respect of which a large surplus actually remained in hand.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he should support the clause as it stood, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Motion.

MR. SLANEY defended the proposal contained in the Bill.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Application of Duties),

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he proposed to substitute the words "the Lords' Commissioners of the Treasury" for "the Metropolitan Board of Works," his object being to bring the funds under the direct control of the House until it was determined what to do with them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no objection to the alteration proposed, which was merely of a formal character. The money would be in the Bank of England, and, if the House wished, the account could stand in the name of the Lords of the Treasury, instead of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he proposed to strike out words in the clause, in order to confine the application of the funds to the embankment of the Thames only.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, general terms were used in the clause, but no special application of the funds could be made without an Act of Parliament.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT remarked, that the Thames embankment would not fulfil its object unless a new street was made from Blackfriars to the Bank.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Application of the Duty of 4*d.* to the Payment of the Interest and Principal of Sums charged thereupon for Improvements),

MR. AYRTON said, he proposed to add at the end of the clause the following words—"And after discharging the sums mentioned in the clause, the said duty of 4*d.* shall be paid to the account opened by Clause 5."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Amendment would practically have no effect, but would raise the question whether the 4*d.* should be considered as the property of the City. He believed the fourpenny duty would not be adequate to the extinction of the debt, keeping down the annual interest, within ten years, and there would be no surplus. [MR. AYRTON: There would.] His calculation was not consistent with that hypothesis. But to save time he was willing to accept the Amendment in the following modified form:—"After discharge of said sum and interest, the said duty of 4*d.* shall be applied by the Corporation of London towards, or in aid of, such public improvement or improvements in or adjacent to the City of London as Parliament shall hereafter sanction."

The Amendment of Mr. AYRTON was withdrawn; the Amendment of Sir GEORGE LEWIS was introduced, and the clause thus amended was agreed to.

Clause 7 (Drawback upon Coals to continue to be allowed),

MR. AYRTON proposed, that a drawback should be allowed on coal used by the manufacturers of the Metropolis.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he could not agree to the proposal.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

THE MARCH OF THE GUARDS TO GUILDFORD.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary for War, With what dress and accoutrements the detachment of Guards was marched from Kingston to Guildford on Thursday last, and at what hour it left Kingston and arrived at Guildford; and to move for a Copy of the representation, if any, which was made by the Medical Officer in charge to the Commanding Officer on the probable effect of such a march on the health of the Troops?

MR. T. G. BARING said, in answer to the first part of the hon. Baronet's question, he had to state that the dress and accoutrements of the detachment of Guards on their march from Kingston to Guildford on Thursday were such as were used in what is termed "marching order;" that was to say, the weight of the dress and accoutrements altogether amounted to from 45lbs. to 49lbs. He had only further to remark, as to the order in which they marched, that the commanding officer stated that the men were allowed to take off their stocks and unbutton their tunics, if they wished to do so. With respect to the time, they started from Kingston at ten minutes past six in the morning, and reached Guildford at a quarter past two in the afternoon. In reply to the latter part of the question as to whether any representation had been made by the medical officer in charge, he begged to say he had been informed that the assistant surgeon to the detachment made no representation with regard to the march; that the detachment had marched on the preceding day without any serious consequences resulting, and that the medical officer did not think it necessary to make any representation. He would only add that the question of clothing in the army had long occupied the serious attention of the Horse Guards; and that several great improvements conducive to the health and comfort of the soldier had been effected of late years.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL—TURKEY—DEATH OF THE SULTAN.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information that M. de Lesseps has obtained or is likely to obtain authority from the Pasha of Egypt to compel the Natives by forced labour to work on the Suez Canal; whether it be in accordance with the engagements of the Pasha towards the Porte, for the observance of the Hatti Scheriff, of Gulhané, and other humane Edicts of the Empire, that he should compel the Natives of Egypt to work by forced labour; and whether Her Majesty's Government have made, or proposed to make, any Communication to the Governments of Turkey, Egypt, or France, in the interest of humanity, on this subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, Her Majesty's Government received information some time ago from Her Majesty's Consul General in Egypt that M. de Lesseps had obtained an order from the Pasha that 10,000 of the natives should be employed by forced labour on the works of the canal. The Consul General stated that a number of natives had been sent down by the railroad in order to labour at the works, but he expected that in a few days they would be allowed to depart again, as, in his opinion, the measure was intended only to show that the works of the canal were being proceeded with. After that Her Majesty's Government represented to the Porte that the system of forced labour was contrary to the agreement with the Sultan. By the latest accounts which have been received we learn that Kurschid Pasha had stated that no forced labour was going on there, and that he did not give any credence to the reports on the subject. Whether he had been deceived, or whether the forced labour had ceased, it is impossible for me to say. I proposed that there should be further investigation into the subject on the spot. As to the last question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that inquiries have been made on the subject referred to. In conclusion, I may also mention to the House that I have to day received intelligence that the Sultan died this morning.

ENFIELD RIFLES—SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he rose to move the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire whether a more efficient weapon than the Enfield rifle might not be provided for the use of Her Majesty's forces, without additional cost or serious inconvenience to the service? Three or four years ago the noble Lord at the head of the Government mentioned the exertions which had been made by a near relative of his own, when Master General of the Ordnance, to place in the hands of the soldier the most efficient weapon that could be produced. That fact, perhaps, might be some excuse for his having ventured to introduce the subject to the notice of the House. At the time to which he referred a comparison was made of the weapons used by the armies of all the nations of Europe, and the consequence was that there was placed in the hands of our rifle regiments a weapon which was considered to be superior to any other in existence. In 1851 the Minié rifle, the parent of our present arm, was introduced; in 1852 the Duke of Wellington recommended that all our troops should be armed with rifles; and in 1853 the result of the deliberations of a Committee composed of the most eminent authorities, appointed by Viscount Hardinge, was the production of the Enfield musket, which at Inkermann, to quote the able correspondent of The Times, "smote the Russians like the hand of the destroying angel." In the year 1854 Viscount Hardinge published a memorandum, the most concise and foreseeing on the subject which had come under his notice, recommending that, before the construction of machinery for the production of rifles, experiments should be tried in order to determine the true principles upon which the barrels ought to be rifled. That noble Lord called to his assistance the greatest mechanic of the age, Mr. Whitworth, who conducted a series of experiments in a closed shed, constructed at the expense of the country, 500 yards long, the result of which was that he discovered the true principle of rifling, according to which he constructed the weapon called the Whitworth rifle. Early in 1857 Mr. Whitworth, in the presence of Lord Panmure, experimented with that weapon at Hythe, and with it obtained a figure of merit of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches, at 500 yards, the best figure previously obtained being 24. After that a Committee of officers was appointed, the Report of which, after being once or twice refused, was produced at the commencement of the present Session. That Report was signed by five out of the seven members, under some sort of protest. The Committee was most unfortunately constituted, four members being Government officials, and three of those being gentlemen who had been engaged in recommending and arranging—for it was really a matter of arrangement—the rifle of 1853. After squabbling for eighteen months they separated without arriving at any conclusion by which the head of a department could be guided. That Report was made on the 1st of January, 1859, but since then, as far as he knew, not a single experiment had been made by the authorities to test the merits of any other rifle than the one which they were engaged in constructing in quantities of 1,000 weekly. They took no steps to ascertain that the weapon which they were placing in the hands of the British soldier was the best that could be procured. The Report bore testimony to the merits of the Whitworth rifle, but no measures had been taken to settle the questions which the Committee had raised. Having differed among themselves to the extent exhibited by the Report, these gentlemen took the unusual course of signing under protest, detailing at some length the reasons why they did so. General Hutchinson, the president of the Committee, expressed his approval of the Whitworth rifle, and in his draught report entered into the various reasons for the opinion which he entertained. Lieutenant-Colonel Dixon did not discuss the question of the superiority of either weapon, but rather argued down, if he might so express himself, the advantages of the Whitworth rifle. At the same time he was compelled to make admissions in its favour. Though from the experiments there appeared to be no question of the superiority of the Whitworth arm, the Committee adopted the singular course of ordering rifles, on what they called the Enfield model, to be made; but they imported into them all the distinguishing features, with one exception, of the rival weapon. They adopted Mr. Whitworth's ball, the length of his projectile, and the spirality or turn of his groove, and they rejected the polygonal rifling, which was a matter of no importance whatever except as to penetration. Colonel Dixon, the head of the Enfield factory, stated that, "although no extra care was taken with these small bores, the result of their firing in point of accuracy was, at least, as favourable as that shown by the Whitworth rifle." To Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon very great credit was due for the part he had originally taken in introducing the Enfield rifle in 1853, and he regretted that in this instance he had not adopted a more comprehensive view. His observations were based on a comparison between three and six grooves, a point, as he had stated, really of no consequence in this discussion. Unquestionably the most important member of the Committee was General Hay, who, placed as he was at the head of the musketry instruction in this country, was probably the greatest authority, not only in England, but in any other nation, on the question of rifles and rifle shooting. That gallant General said—

"As the Report contains no general statement of the relative merits of the Whitworth and Enfield rifle .577 bore, and as the instructions point to the 'relative efficiency' of the two rifles as one of the main objects of inquiry, I have thought it right to make a concise statement, detailing some of the advantages the Whitworth rifle possesses over the Enfield .577 bore:—1. Great increase of precision and range, which is, comparatively speaking, more marked in windy weather, owing to the great velocity of flight and rotation of its bullet. 2. Much flatter trajectories, which, with reference to judging distances, is of the utmost importance. 3. Great increase in strength and durability of barrel, which is much required. 4. Greater facility for adapting the tube for shells, rendering them most effective even at long ranges. 5. Great increase of penetration (nearly treble) when on special occasions it may be necessary to use the hardened bullets. 6. Shortness of back sight, that used for the Enfield .577 bore at 900 yards being sufficient for the Whitworth at 1,100 yards. 7. Less weight for the soldier to carry, the reduced bore rendering it possible to use the old weight of bullet—namely, 480 grains—with perfect effect, and with a quarter of a drachm less powder."

But the question of the superiority of the Whitworth rifles over the Enfield did not rest on the testimony of those gentlemen, but on much stronger evidence. The National Rifle Association put forth an advertisement, calling for the most perfect rifle that could be invented. All countries were invited to come forward and compete for furnishing the rifle to be used in shooting for the Queen's prize. Among other arms the famous "small-bore Enfield" was used. The result was that after trial the Whitworth was declared to be the best rifle known, and accordingly it was adopted. This year the same advertisement had been put forward, but no one had attempted to call in question the superiority of Mr. Whitworth's rifle, so that it now stood incontestably the finest rifle in the world. The House would remember that when, at the contest for the prizes, Her Majesty was about to fire the first shot, the rifle was mechanically fixed. The shot was fired from the Whitworth rifle, and it not only struck the bull's eye, but was only an inch and a half from the centre. Considering that the shot was calculated beforehand, and that it was fired in the open air and at a distance of 400 yards from the target, it was probably the most marvellous shot that ever came from a rifle. He remembered going down to Wimbledon and seeing the Swiss riflemen who carried off the first prizes in their own country. They were much distressed at the fact of their own rifles having been detained in a foreign custom-house. Those arms arrived the next day; but on going down again he found the Swiss not shooting with their own rifles, but with the Whitworth. They had laid aside their own, and were shooting with the Whitworth at long ranges. At the French rifle meeting, to which the whole world were invited, Mr. Whitworth was present. He had not been in Paris many days when he received an invitation from the Emperor to an interview at St. Cloud. The interview was a long one. The Emperor entered at great length into all the questions connected with the rifling of small arms and great guns. He told Mr. Whitworth that he was in possession of two of his rifles, and that he much desired to see them shot with. Mr. Whitworth immediately telegraphed for the person who was in the habit of shooting with his rifles. A trial was made at Vincennes; and, at from 500 to 700 metres, Mr. Whitworth's beat the best rifles in the French army by two and three to one. After 700 metres the French rifles were withdrawn, and from that point Mr. Whitworth's shot with its usual successful results. Mr. Whitworth received the congratulations of the Emperor of the French; and, when speaking of the matter to him as an Englishman, he contrasted the prompt and practical manner in which the question had been dealt with in France with the way in which he had been badgered and bullied in this country, after having for so many years given up his valuable time to the improvement of those important instruments of warfare. Not only at the contest which had been inaugurated by the Queen, but at the subsequent great trials, all the best shooting was made either by rifles made by Mr. Whitworth himself, or rifles made on his plan of rifling by Mr. Westley Richards. Mr. Ross won the great prize at Wimbledon with a Whitworth; and the Prince Consort's, the Duke of Cambridge's, and the Duke of Wellington's prizes were all won with breech-loading rifles made by Mr. Westley Richards under licence from Mr. Whitworth. The Enfield rifle was completely snuffed out after 600 yards; a high authority told him that he would as soon go out and play at marbles as shoot with an Enfield rifle over 600 yards. Last year Lord Herbert made a statement, in answer to a question put to him on this subject. He did not think that the noble Lord denied the merits of Mr. Whitworth's rifle, but he said that its cost was so great that it was impossible to adopt it as an arm for general use. His Lordship stated its cost to be £10. On the moment, it appeared to him to be contrary to common sense to suppose that a difference in the barrels could cause such a difference between the price of the Enfield and that of Mr. Whitworth's rifle. He put himself in communication with that gentleman, and received the following letter:—

"Fenton's Hotel, July 12th, 1860.

"My dear Sir,—In reply to your letter making inquiries respecting the Whitworth rifles, I beg to inform you that there would be no difficulty in adapting the Enfield machinery to the manufacture of service muskets rifled on my system. Indeed, I offered upwards of two years ago to give my assistance in making the required alterations. The service muskets rifled on my principle would be manufactured at the same cost as the present Enfield, the quality of workmanship and materials being the same. The only change required would be to substitute the form of rifling adopted by me in place of the triple-grooved form. I feel confident the change could be made without difficulty, and, supposing materials, workmanship, and cost to remain the same, it would afford a rifle having, I believe, at least double the efficiency of the rifle now made. I am of opinion, however, that a slight extra expense—say 5s., may be advantageously incurred in making the barrels with greater care; that slightly increased expense would be an economical outlay, as the efficiency of the rifle would be thereby increased in a far greater proportion. Most erroneous conclusions have been drawn from the fact that rifles supplied from my establishment cost £10. It should be remembered that those rifles were manufactured in a newly organized establishment working on a limited scale; that their fittings, materials, workmanship, and finish are all of superior quality; they are, in fact, rifles suited to supply the special demand which exists for them. They are not intended as pattern service muskets, nor can their cost, when manufactured in a private establishment, carried on on a limited scale, be compared with that required to manufacture muskets in such an establishment as Enfield. As a proof of the advantageous application of my system of rifling to the ordinary service barrels, I may refer to the success of Mr. Westley Richards's breech-loaders at the trials at Wimbledon. Mr. Richards made his breech-loaders with ordinary service barrels, and rifled them on my principle, under licence, with his ordinary machines. His breech-loaders were first in the contest for the Duke of Cambridge's prize, and also in that for the Prince Consort's prize. The highest number of points (24) gained at the long ranges—800, 900, and 1,000 yards—were gained by Mr. Ross with one of my rifles; the second highest number of points (22) gained at the same ranges with a like number of shots, were gained by Lieutenant Lacy, with one of Mr. Richards's breech-loaders, having an ordinary service barrel, rifled under licence on my principle.

"I remain, &c.,

"JOSEPH WHITWORTH.

"Hussey Vivian, Esq., M.P."

That letter put the question of cost beyond a doubt. He had handed that letter to Lord Herbert, and hoped he might be spared the necessity of bringing the matter before the House. He thought that the acknowledged superiority of the Whitworth rifle over the Enfield, and the possibility of manufacturing it at about the same cost, would have induced the Government to adopt the Whitworth rifle. In confirmation of his statement, that the Whitworth rifle could be produced for the same sum as the Enfield, he might mention that he had that morning received an assurance from Mr. Westley Richards, that he had manufactured an ordinary service musket on the Whitworth principle, at a cost not one sixpence greater than that of the ordinary musket. He was further informed that last year twenty muskets were made at Enfield in the ordinary manner, as if they were intended to be rifled on the Enfield system. These rifles were sent to Mr. Whitworth, who finished the boring and rifled them on his principle. Before returning them to the Government he ascertained by experiment that the figure of merit of these twenty rifles averaged 6in. at 500 yards, that of the Enfield ranging from 12 to 20in., thus showing a marked superiority even at this short range. These rifles were returned to the Government, on the 13th September, 1860, but so far as could be ascertained they had never yet been tried. They had now 500,000 rifles on the Enfield plan. Lord Hardinge said that 1,000,000 were required by the country. The British Army was so divided that in no country in the world could a new system be introduced more easily. The machinery at Enfield could be perfectly adapted to the manufacture of Mr. Whitworth's rifle, and if this were done and contracts rearranged in no long space of time 100,000 Whitworth rifles could be issued per annum. The "life" of an Enfield rifle, the barrel of which was thin and the grooves shallow, did not extend beyond twelve years. Within that period of time, therefore, the Government must renew every musket in their possession. This year there were sums asked for in various Votes, which, added together, made an aggregate of £760,000 for small arms. Would the House of Commons permit the Government to go on spending this sum in producing a rifle confessedly worse than that which could be made for the same money? He trusted that the House would consider him justified in occupying its time with this matter, and that hon. Members would support him in his desire to get the question investigated. He might be told that the House was not a proper tribunal for the consideration of such cases; but there were many hon. Members as well qualified to form an opinion upon the relative merits of the Enfield and Whitworth rifles as any of the officers to whom the matter had formerly been referred. A House of Commons Committee was a painstaking, just, and impartial tribunal, and he should have much greater confidence in its decision than in that of the prejudiced officials to whom the Whitworth rifle was referred. He was informed that three out of seven of the Committee that reported against the Whitworth were the originators of the Enfield rifle. Only two members of the Committee could be said to be wholly unprejudiced and impartial, and they were both in favour of the Whitworth rifle. He said, therefore, that the advisability of continuing to manufacture the Enfield rifle ought to be investigated. He should be sorry that the hon. Under Secretary for War should allow the reputation he had gained by the effective manner in which he had done his work to be tarnished by his refusal of a just demand. The present question could not and should not be allowed to rest, for if his Motion were rejected, he pledged himself to renew it next year. He had only to say that when first he took up the question he had scarcely any personal knowledge of Mr. Whitworth. He had no personal interest in the matter, and he had only been induced on public grounds to bring the subject under the consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire whether a more efficient weapon than the Enfield Rifle may not be provided for the use of Her Majesty's Forces, without additional cost or serious inconvenience to the Service."

MR. TURNER said, he felt he should be doing an injustice to a distinguished gentleman whom he had the honour to reckon among his constituents if he did not second the Motion. The general opinion in the country, and especially in the district which he represented, was that very scant justice had been done to Mr. Whitworth after the series of experiments which he had carried on for many years to such a successful result, and when the skill, knowledge, and patience that had enabled him to produce a valuable weapon had not been acknowledged by the Government. It was the general opinion that Mr. Whitworth was the most celebrated mechanic of the age, and he had made an ample fortune in carrying to a successful result machinery of the most complicated nature, not only for the manufacture of textile fabrics, but for making the very instruments by which that machinery was constructed. That gentleman's absolute precision in mechanism was now so universally acknowledged that in all the workshops in the world his principles were adopted. It had not been Mr. Whitworth's wish to enter upon the manufacture of these rifles; but, having been applied to by the Government, he gave his skill and energy, and devoted thousands of his money, to carry on experiments which were first originated at the instance of the Government. Mr. Whitworth had no desire to make a fortune by the manufacture of rifles, but he had a desire to bring his skill to bear in producing a weapon which should enable the troops of this country to meet the enemy both at home and abroad with effect. That was the only honour he sought. He should not enter into the details of the question before the House, but it was generally admitted that he had produced a weapon more effective than the one now in use, and at as small an expense. In the hands of a good marksman it was as effective as three or four Enfield rifles, and, therefore, there could be little doubt which ought to be in the hands of the army.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that no one in the House could dissent from the terms in which both the hon. Gentlemen the proposer and seconder of the Motion had mentioned Mr. Whitworth. That gentleman's reputation was an European reputation, and nothing that he could say could add to it. Nor could any one suppose that there existed any interested motive either on the part of his hon. Friend or of Mr. Whitworth, for desiring a more extensive use of that gentleman's inventions. He would add—what his hon. Friend seemed not quite so ready to recognize—that there was no disposition on the part of the officers connected with the War Office and at the head of establishments for the manufacture of small arms to throw obstacles in the way of the introduction of improvements. They were not interested in the manufacture of small arms. They could lay no claim to the invention of the rifle manufactured at Enfield, though, no doubt, they had introduced improvements in it, but there was no jealousy on the part of those gentlemen with respect to the introduction of any improvements into the manufacture of small arms. Therefore, he hoped that the House would put away any notion of “prejudiced officials,” and any idea that Mr. Whitworth had been “bullied and badgered” in this matter. He was not aware that Mr. Whitworth had made any such charge against any person with whom he had been brought into communication. Since he had belonged to the department with which he was now connected he had seen no representation from Mr. Whitworth to give colour for the language used by his hon. Friend.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN explained that he had used the expression simply in reference to the Committee on small arms which he alluded to.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that he was glad to hear the explanation, as he had thought the allusion was made to the officers to whom he had referred, and who he was sure had always acted with every courtesy to Mr. Whitworth. As to the speech of his hon. Friend, he would say a few words on two preliminary matters. First, as to the memorandum written by Viscount Hardinge. What was proposed in that memorandum had been actually carried out under the noble Lord's own instructions; and in consequence Mr. Whitworth was allowed permission to erect at the public expense all that apparatus to which his hon. Friend alluded. Those experiments involved not a small cost, but something like £16,000 were spent, and very properly spent, by Mr. Whitworth at the public cost. Therefore, Viscount Hardinge's memorandum was actually carried out. But if his hon. Friend meant that in consequence of that memorandum all measures for the supply of small arms should have been stopped until the result of those experiments had been ascertained, as that did not take place until 1857, the effect would have been that the supply of rifled muskets to the troops in India would have been very little or none at all. And such a result would certainly not have met the expectations of the House or of the country. Next, with respect to the Report of the Committee, to which his hon. Friend had alluded, he did not think that it was a very great encouragement for the appointment of a Committee of that House, with the view of investigating the same subject, to find that gentlemen of great scientific attainments had arrived at very different conclusions; and when his hon. Friend, in commenting on the constitution of that Committee, objected to certain gentlemen on the Committee as being interested or connected with the manufacture of small arms, he omitted to state that Mr. Whitworth was himself a member of that Committee. [MR. VIVIAN: I mentioned that circumstance.] There was no unfairness, therefore, at all events, in the constitution of the Committee, though the proceedings disclosed very different opinions on the part of persons qualified to express a judgment on the subject. His hon. Friend was not correct in saying that no further progress had taken place since the Report of the Committee. Owing to circumstances with which Mr. Whitworth was in some degree connected there was a great delay in preparing arms for experiments; but after those delays were got over it was intended to have a trial of a rifle manufactured by Mr. Whitworth from the same metal used at Enfield with a rifle manufactured at Enfield with a new grooving. That trial, he believed, was now actually commenced, rifles having been supplied on both sides, and it was in progress under the supervision of the Ordnance Select Committee. Therefore, there was no indisposition on the part of the Government to continue the experiments with the view of ascertaining if any improvement could be made in the Enfield rifle, and his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War and all persons connected with the War Office were ready to avail themselves to the utmost of the skill and ability possessed by Mr. Whitworth, in order that the most perfect weapon might be placed in the hands of the British troops.

He would next say a few words with respect to the propriety of altering the bore of the musket used in Her Majesty's service, for that was the main question

under discussion. His hon. Friend very much understated the number of Enfield rifles now in use and store. It was rapidly approaching to the amount of the 1,000,000 mentioned by Lord Hardinge, for more than 800,000 were in the possession of the troops or in store. But if a fresh bore were introduced into the service the effect of that would be to re-arm the whole army, at a cost which might easily be calculated. The new rifles would be more expensive than the Enfield, and could hardly cost less than £4 a piece; and the whole of the existing ammunition in store would become useless. Therefore, it was desirable that no change of that kind should take place without due consideration and the clearest proof of its necessity. He would not enter into a discussion of the scientific merits of the different systems of rifling; but even the hon. Gentleman admitted that the Enfield rifle was a better weapon than was in the hands of any other army in the world, and he thought that, putting those two facts together, the House would think Her Majesty's Government were justified in hesitating to make a change before it was clearly proved that a weapon could be introduced superior to the Enfield rifle, not only in range but in the many other no less necessary qualities for use in war. Another reason he had to offer for not consenting to the Motion was that in a matter of so scientific a nature it was impossible for a Committee of the House of Commons to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Experiments were necessary, which it would be impossible for a Committee of the House of Commons to superintend. The Government objected to the Motion, not upon the ground that no improvements could be introduced into the weapon in question, but because they believed that those improvements should be most carefully considered, and that a Committee of the House of Commons had neither the power nor the time to enable them to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon a matter of that description. He would simply add that he thought the present Ordnance Select Committee was a tribunal perfectly competent to advise the Secretary of State upon such points, as was evinced by the fact that great satisfaction had been given in those cases reported upon by them; and he would observe that no nation in the world possessed ordnance better adapted to the service than ourselves. That we were in that position was, he had no doubt, partly to be attributed to the care and attention which the Ordnance Select Committee had bestowed on all the proposals and inventions which had been brought under their notice, and the House might rest satisfied that the Government would not be found neglectful of any improvements which Mr. Whitworth or any other man might bring forward; while there remained the assurance that all the suggestions which might be made on the subject would be properly weighed by persons who had not only a scientific knowledge of the weapons themselves, but also a practical acquaintance with that which the soldier required for service in the field.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, remembering the improvements in small arms effected between 1851-4 by the late Viscount Hardinge, not without the assistance of a Committee of that House—and recollecting the large sums which the House was called upon to Vote for small arms, he was not surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have brought forward this Motion. In 1850-1 Viscount Hardinge discovered that the French army was armed with a weapon much superior to that which was placed in the hands of the British soldier. He could answer from personal knowledge that when Viscount Hardinge set himself to repair that deficiency, he met with obstacles which would not have been removed but for the assistance of such competent civilians, as Mr. Westley Richards, and the extraneous action of that House. There was an unwillingness on the part of those who were officially charged with the equipment of the army to make changes, which only the interference of that House could overcome. They had to thank the right hon. the present Chancellor of the Exchequer during his former tenure of office for the willingness which he manifested to grant funds for the conducting of these experiments, the practical issue of which was the question now before the House. Having voted the funds with which these experiments had been made by Mr. Whitworth and Mr. Westley Richards, united in a Commission for this purpose, and having, at so much expense to the country, ascertained the results of their experiments, would the House now bring them into practical operation? His belief was that it was idle for the Government or the House to imagine, in an age of progress, that if they did not adopt the improvements which were offered to them other Governments would not do so. From his own personal knowledge he could state that other Governments were attempting to monopolize for themselves the results of the experiments which had been conducted at so much expense by this country. He thought, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman opposite had done the country good service in bringing this question before the House. He did not wish to impugn the conduct of the gentlemen who were officially employed by the Government in this department; but it was impossible that gentlemen specially employed in the manufacture of a particular description of weapon should not become wedded to it; and he had good grounds for believing that the same obstacles were thrown in the way of improvement now, that Viscount Hardinge encountered previous to 1854. The evidence taken before the Small Arms Committee of 1854 proved incontestably the disinclination on the part of officials for change. No doubt, the changing of the bore was a very serious question, for it was most inconvenient that the arms borne by the army should be of different bores. Still he would ask the House to consider how the battles of Alma and of Inkermann were won. It was well known that the troops engaged in them had muskets of different bores in their hands. Some had the old smooth musket, some the rifle which succeeded it, and some had the Enfield rifle, which had since superseded them all. It was clear, therefore, that the difference in the bore did not prevent our soldiers from securing victory. The hon. Under Secretary of War stated that our troops were armed with the best weapon of any army in the world. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced in sharing that conviction; he wished that that advantage should be continued to our soldiers, and in order to effect this object that the Government should adopt those further improvements which were called into existence at the expense of the country, and which had been tested in a competition against all comers. That House ought not to attempt to dictate but to suggest to the Government whether the Reports of their own official Committees on this matter ought not to be adopted. The hon. Under Secretary for War told them that they had now in store 700,000 or 800,000 muskets of the Enfield pattern. He was glad to hear it, as it proved that the country was for the present safe, but it also showed that they need not stand still, but were in a condition to make improvements in the composition of the musket. The hon. Gentleman who made the Motion spoke of the indisputable excellence of Mr. Whitworth's rifle. He, for one, did not wish to dispute that assertion: but he would remind the Committee that the rifle of Mr. Westley Richards was also produced before the Committee, and he recollected hearing Viscount Hardinge urge on Mr. Westley Richards that he should never consider the improvements complete till the English Army had a breech-loading musket. Now, experiments had proved that Mr. Westley Richards' breech-loading rifle was in several respects superior for military purposes to Mr. Whitworth's musket; and he rejoiced to know that the Government was about to arm the cavalry with a breech-loading carbine of Mr. Westley Richards' pattern; and he hoped that would prove a step towards the realization of Viscount Hardinge's anticipation, and that our whole army would continue to be, as it is now, armed with a weapon superior to that of every other army in the world.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he had never before heard so many remarks with so little foundation. In the first place, it was argued that there was an opposition to the Whitworth rifle on the part of the officials, which only showed the profound ignorance of those who made that charge of the way in which those things were managed. If any inventor had a new idea he sent it to the War Office, and it was submitted to be tested by the Ordnance Select Committee or by a Special Committee. If their report was favourable, then the Secretary of State directed the departments to manufacture so and so, and it was done. It was nothing to the department whether they manufactured Mr. Whitworth's rifle, or Mr. Westley Richards' rifle, or the Enfield, or any other rifle. In 1852 those improvements were commenced which resulted in equipping our army with the best weapon in the world. The whole small arm trade of this country was called upon to submit improvements on the arm then in use. A Committee of General Officers was appointed at the Ordnance Office to maturely consider their proposals, and a sub-committee was appointed which went to Enfield to try experiments, because there happened to be a range there. The result of that Committee's Report was that the present pattern arm was adopted; and it was called the Enfield pattern, not because it originated there, but because the experiments of the sub-committee had been carried on at Enfield. It was then the question was raised how far the bore of the musket could be reduced without endangering its efficiency in the field, and it was reduced from 7·02 to 5·77. The hon. Member for Warwickshire said that the French musket was superior to ours in 1854.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I beg pardon—I meant to say 1853.

CAPTAIN JERVIS: Well, the next question was as to the accuracy of fire at long range; and it was said that in that respect the Whitworth rifle was superior. But when his experiments were made a clear and broad principle was laid down, that all arms should be tried under equal and similar circumstances—in other words, that there should be no reduction from the size of the Enfield bore. Now, Mr. Whitworth, who was eminent for his mechanical skill, could not produce better shooting than the Enfield rifle without reducing the bore. He departed, therefore, from the rules laid down and did reduce his bore to 4·5. He (Captain Jervis) objected, therefore, to the question being put whether they ought to adopt the Enfield or the Whitworth rifle. The real question was whether they would reduce the bore or not? and if they determined on reduction, then they ought to do as they did before—they ought to call in the whole trade to the competition and see whether, with a reduced bore, a better weapon could not be produced than even Mr. Whitworth's? But, then, that House was not the place to decide the experiment. The arming of the troops was one of the prerogatives of the Crown, and it was almost absurd to suggest that a Parliamentary Committee should constitute themselves a tribunal for deciding what arm should be given to the service. Such a Committee could not sit in the lobby to take evidence. The experiments must be conducted at Shoeburyness, and they would necessarily extend over a considerable period of time. He might, for instance, take the question on which there was great objection to Mr. Whitworth's rifle—that of fouling. It would require more than a few weeks to decide that point alone. The experiments ought to be tried during the great heat of summer, and some muskets ought to be sent out to be tried in India. He would only say, in conclusion, that there was no hostility to Mr. Whitworth on the part of those engaged in previous inquiries. Their great and, indeed, only anxiety was to see that the best arm was supplied to the troops, and there was not the slightest foundation for the statement that they subjected Mr. Whitworth to a severe badgering.

MR. MONSELL said, he wished to correct the hon. Member for Warwickshire on one or two points. In the first place, it was not correct to say that the British army in the Crimea had muskets of different descriptions. In the second place, so far was the Committee of that House which sat in 1853 from being of any advantage to the adoption of any improvements, that he could state considerable delay in the adoption of those improvements was caused by them. He agreed with the hon. Member for Glamorgan that they ought to take immediate steps to ascertain the relative merits of the Whitworth and Enfield rifles as quickly as possible, but he doubted whether a Committee of the House of Commons could render any assistance in the investigation of that subject. The hon. Under Secretary for War had omitted to state why the Government had not exerted themselves more during the last two or three years. Much valuable time had been lost; but if the House could obtain a pledge from the Government that they would take the matter into their serious consideration, and that they would cause experiments to be made without unnecessary delay, he for one would be satisfied with that assurance. Something had been said about the inconvenience of having two bores in the service. Let the Government ascertain, in the first instance, which was the best weapon, and then the difficulty as to the bores would soon and easily be overcome.

MR. T. G. BARING stated that experiments were either then in progress, or would be commenced in a few days.

LORD ELCHO said, he hoped that the Government would endeavour to have the experiments for ascertaining the comparative merits of the two rifles prosecuted without delay. He had not the slightest doubt as to the superiority of the Whitworth rifle over the ordinary Enfield. Experiments had been made at Hythe for the purpose of ascertaining which was the best weapon to be used in the competition for Her Majesty's prize at Wimbledon. The result showed that the best Enfield gave a mean deviation at 500 yards of 12 inches, and the best Whitworth a mean deviation of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches. The average deviation of the best Enfield at 500 yards was 17 inches, and of the best Whitworth 6 inches. In point of accuracy every one would admit the superiority of the Whitworth rifle. The only question was whether there ought to be a different bore? His impression was that the division commanded by Sir George Oathcart in the Crimea was armed with Brown Bess. With regard to bore, there had been an impression among sportsmen that a large bore was best to kill deer with; but now not a single deer-stalker went to the Highlands with a large bore rifle, because it was found that the small bore killed equally well. The question of destructive results depended on the weight of the ball multiplied by the velocity; and the velocity with the small bore was much greater than with the larger bore. He had heard it stated that during the late war in Italy the Austrian soldiers were armed with rifles of smaller bore than those used by the French, and it was noted that the Austrian soldiers recovered more quickly from their wounds than the French soldiers. The opinion of General Hay was that there was no fear of fouling as regards the small bore rifles; and his impression was that the small bore rifle would be by far the best military weapon. General Hay had been on the Committee, but was not satisfied with the manner in which the experiments had been conducted. Not that the members had any personal interest, but naturally people had a prejudice in favour of what they were engaged in. He, therefore, thought it desirable that some independent inquiry should be instituted, such as might be conducted by Members of that House, not to make experiments at Shoeburyness, but to examine General Hay and other scientific witnesses, and to bring common sense to bear on the question. Mr. Whitworth, it should be remembered, was not a gunmaker, he was what might be called the prince of toolmakers; and the great good he accomplished was that for the first time scientific principles were brought to bear on riflemaking. Gunmakers were not educated scientifically; from apprentices they became workmen, foremen, and masters, but they generally proceeded on the traditions of their trade, not on scientific principles. Mr. Whitworth had applied to riflemaking the best mechanical science, and Viscount Hardinge, to whom they owed much, had shown his wisdom and prescience by applying to Mr. Whitworth upon the subject. Mr. Whitworth had conducted the most extensive experiments; for instance, as to the form of the ball, he had 500 shapes, and so with regard to the length of the barrel, the different modes of rifling and spirality. The Whitworth rifle had a much more rapid spiral, and at long range was infinitely superior to the Enfield. Were they to increase the spiral of the present Enfield rifle they would get much better shooting, without increasing the fouling or in any way breaking the gauge. Talking of prejudice and interest, he had stated that Mr. Whitworth was not a gunmaker—he was an outsider. When he was brought in by the Government to tell the best principles on which rifles should be made there naturally arose a feeling of prejudice against him; and he repeated the Government ought in these matters to be guided by the opinion of General Hay, who had to try all the rifles, who knew where every one came from, and who registered every shot fired at Hythe. That register was open to inspection, and the results showed that Mr. Whitworth had hitherto been most successful. Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to give the National Rifle Association a prize for £200. The association thought for the honour of England that prize should be shot for at the longest possible range and with the best possible description of rifle. If they had had reason to think that the Enfield could have shot accurately at 1,000 yards, unquestionably they would have recommended the Enfield rifle, being the arm with which the majority of the Volunteers were armed, but the tabular results showed that with the Enfield they could not have extreme accuracy at a longer range than 600 yards. They had, therefore, been obliged to get some other weapon; and while all gunmakers were invited to try their rifles at Hythe, the only persons who tried last year were connected with the Birmingham gun trade, with rifles of the same bore as Mr. Whitworth's, but on the Enfield system and with their own projectiles. The results were hollow in favour of the Whitworth rifle. This year no competitor appeared, and again the Queen's prize would be shot for with the Whitworth rifle. As regards precision and accuracy, the question did not admit of dispute, and to show what had been done by Mr. Whitworth it might be stated that in 1853 the mean deviation of rifles by the crack gunmakers at 500 yards was 35 inches, while in 1857 Mr. Whitworth had constructed a rifle which, when fired before Lord Panmure at the same distance, gave a mean deviation of only 4½ inches. He could not help thinking they might find Members of that House wholly unprejudiced, and quite capable, whether as military men or sportsmen, to give a fair and impartial decision on that most important subject.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he could not but express his disappointment at the Government being unwilling to accede to the Motion. What had made Lancashire and Yorkshire celebrated was the great improvements in machinery made by machinery, and not by hand, and in that part of the country Mr. Whitworth had taken a high position. If they appointed a Committee of Members of that House, they would be able to examine into all the improvements made in small arms which would be brought before them from all parts of the world. He for one should have more satisfaction in voting the Supplies if he felt such an assurance as an inquiry before a Select Committee might give that the public money was spent in providing the army with the best possible weapon that could be obtained.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish to say only one word in order to assure the House that I am not at all insensible to the great importance of furnishing the army with the best possible weapon. In fact, the great improvements of the last few years may be appealed to as a sufficient proof that the attention of the Government has been directed to that, as well as to other similar objects. But what was stated by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State is quite true, that this is an inquiry which more properly belongs to a department of the Government than to a Committee of the House of Commons. I think, with all deference, that of late we have rather had a tendency to assume to this House the executive functions of the Administration. This is hardly a duty which a Select Committee can satisfactorily or usefully perform. It is evident, for reasons into which it is not necessary to enter, that it is not a function which Members of this House can with equal advantage discharge. In the first place, an inquiry of this kind does not turn upon reasoning based simply on matters adduced in the examination of other people, but it is requisite that those who are to form a judgment and make a report should be able themselves to verify the statements and opinions given by the different witnesses whom they may call; and it is quite clear that it is impossible for a Committee of the House of Commons to do that with the facility with which it can be accomplished by the Executive. There is no reason to think that the War Department, or those who act under its direction, feel any prejudice or interest in the matter, or have any other motive to guide them in coming to a decision than a real desire to arrive at the truth, and to ascertain not only which would be the best weapon, but, moreover, whether the superiority of a given weapon over another is so great as to counterbalance the additional expense and other inconveniences which might result from a general change of armament throughout the service? This matter had, I think, better be left in the hands of the Government, who, I can assure the House, are now pursuing the very inquiry which my noble Friend suggested ought to be the object of the Committee—namely, a comparison of the rifles made on Mr. Whitworth's principle and those made on the Enfield principle. I repeat, that it will be the duty of the Government—a duty which they will sedulously perform—to ascertain with the greatest possible accuracy what is the best weapon, and when that has been discovered, also to ascertain whether the degree of superiority in the weapon deemed the best is such as to make it worth while to effect a change in the equipment of the whole army?

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN briefly replied. The issue of the discussion was so far satisfactory that if the Government gave an assurance to the House that the question should be fully and impartially investigated, and that at the beginning of next Session the result of that investigation should be laid on the table of the Houses he should not now press his Motion to a division. He wished further to say that he had had no intention whatever to impute any personal interest to the officer, who composed the Committee on the Whitworth and Enfield rifles. All he meant was that, under the circumstances, for which they certainly were not individually responsible, they could not bring a perfectly judicial mind to bear on the inquiry.

COLONEL PENNANT said, he was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the implied accusation of partiality against the officers who had formed the Members of the Committee. These officers were men of the highest character, who had done their duty faithfully and to the best of their power; and there was no ground whatever for impugning their impartiality.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. SLANEY said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and extend the Act for co-operative and provident societies. The House had just been discussing improvements connected with the art of war, and he hoped it would not now refuse its attention to a subject connected with the arts of peace and the improvement of the condition of the working and humbler classes. Of late years the population of the towns had increased three times as much as that in the country, and the intelligent classes in those towns were now exceedingly numerous. That increase gave them a claim upon the consideration of the House, and among the discoveries of the present age none had been more valuable to the poorer classes than that of combination and co-operation in trading societies. For a length of time this large class of persons had no means of investing their money except in savings' banks. A few years ago an Act had been passed for that purpose, but it was faulty in this, that it was found the constitution of the bodies so formed made each member a partner, and by that means brought them into Chancery. Advantage had been taken of the Act, however, and in many of the large towns societies were in active operation in which the members purchased provisions at wholesale prices, sold them for ready money, and divided any profit that might accrue among themselves. Mills also had been started, and various other operations were set on foot, the advantages of which were in the highest degree satisfactory. Amongst others who supported these societies were the hon. Member for Rochdale, and Mr. Hill, the Recorder of Birmingham. The object of the Bill he wished to introduce provided that the principle of limited liability, which was applicable to all commercial undertakings, should apply to these co-operative societies. There were other slight extensions of the present law which would be of great value to the working classes. He should propose to introduce the Bill, and have it printed, when, if there were not time sufficient in the present Session to carry it through Parliament, an opportunity would be afforded to Members of considering its provisions.

Leave given.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Industrial and Provident Societies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SLANEY, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. WILLIAM EWART.

Bill presented, and read 1st, to be read 2<sup>d</sup> on Thursday, 4th July, and to be printed [Bill 206].

EDUCATION—DISSENTERS' SCHOOLS.

PAPER MOVED FOR.

MR. DILLWYN said, he rose to call the attention of the House to certain inaccuracies which occurred in the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of popular education. The returns of the Dissenters' schools were very incomplete, the Dissenters having—as he thought, unwisely—held back from giving the information required from them. The consequence was that the report did not set forth the real amount of education provided by Dissenters. He understood the Government did not object to the return he should move for, and he was informed that the Education Commissioners were willing to give it. He would, therefore, conclude by moving an address for a copy of the Report to the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of popular education by the committee appointed by them for the purpose of obtaining an enumeration of Dissenters' schools.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not object to the production of the Report, but he wished it to be understood that there had been no neglect on the part of the Commissioners. The principal inaccuracy arose from the omission of an explanatory note, the Commissioners being desirous of bringing their Report within moderate limits.

Motion agreed to.

THE NULLUM TEMPUS ACT CROWN SUITS LIMITATION BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, he wished to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act of the 9th years of King George III., cap 16, for quieting possessions against the Crown, and certain Acts relating to suits by the Duke of Cornwall. The object of the Nullum Tempus Act, which was passed a century ago, was to give the subject quiet possession of lands which had once belonged to the Crown, after a possession of sixty years; but there were provisions in the Act which defeated that intention, in cases where the land had been in charge during that time. The receipt of rent also for a manor prevented the limitation applying to all lands within the manor. Lands were held to be in charge when in the rolls delivered to the receivers or auditors of the Crown, rents were charged against them. And although these rents were never received or even demanded of the persons in possession, and although the receivers or auditors should return "nil," this secret proceeding was sufficient to put the lands in charge, and to save the right of the Crown. He proposed to repeal these unjust provisions. With regard to the Duchy of Cornwall, an Act was passed in the last Session which contained a provision that the receipt of rent for a larger territory should not deprive a person of a smaller territory, who had held adverse possession of it for more than sixty years. But, notwithstanding the efforts of the landowners of Cornwall, they could not obtain in that Act a repeal of the provision respecting lands held in charge, the Duchy of Cornwall then objecting to be placed in a different position from the Crown in that respect. The effect of his proposed Bill was to make sixty years' possession by the subject a good title both as against the Crown and the Duchy, which was, in fact, the intention of the Nullum Tempus Act. The hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton (Sir Richard Bethell), who was a very high authority on the previous day, and who was, he presumed, the highest authority in the law to-day, was, he believed, favourable to the Bill, and last night he intimated that he had no objection to its introduction. He, therefore, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of the 9th George II., cap. 16, for quieting possessions against the Crown, and certain Acts relating to suits by the Duke of Cornwall.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had no objection to the introduction of the Bill, but he must reserve the right to consider the various clauses of the Bill in Committee.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Act of the ninth year of King George the Third, chapter sixteen, for quieting possessions and titles against the Crown, and also certain Acts for the like object relating to Suits by the Duke of Cornwall, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONTAGUE SMITH, Mr. ROLT, and Mr. BOVILL.

Bill presented, and read 1<sup>o</sup>, to be read 2<sup>o</sup> on Friday, and to be printed [Bill 103].

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £690,159 be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Charge of Barracks at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE remarked that much had been said by a Member of Her Majesty's Government of the great expense which they were incurring, and the Committee would do well to consider the Vote before them, inasmuch as one item for the erection of buildings of a more permanent character at Aldershot, which involved a very large expenditure. It could not be said that the parsimony of Parliament had ever interfered with military expenditure; on the contrary, it seemed to be an established dogma in the House that whatever lavish expenditure the Minister called for on the army should be granted sub silentio. We were surrounded by "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of war" on every side—cast-iron forts on the shoals at Spithead, Volunteers camps at Shorncliffe, Colchester, and the Curragh; and, lastly, this monument of extravagance, the camp at Aldershot. The original Vote for Aldershot was asked for in February, 1854, on the express understanding that it was to be a camp where certain bodies of troops should be assembled for periodical exercise in the summer months. But it had since been converted into a permanent barrack. He had no wish now to go into the policy of bringing a large body of troops together during the whole year, though he believed it had a tendency to demoralize the men, and certainly not to improve the morals of the neighbourhood. The original sum contemplated for the purchase of land was £100,000, and in 1854 the Government announced that they had purchased 7,000 acres, at an expenditure of £156,000, or about £20 an acre—a capital bargain, as it was said to be; though he held it to be the dearest purchase the Government ever made. The first mistake in that unhappy business was the selection of the site. Part of it was a swamp, which had to be drained with great difficulty and great expense. Then there was no supply of water to be got. The Royal Engineers were set to work, and a pretty mess they made of it. They dug holes in all directions only to fill them up again. He was sorry not to see the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) in his place, for he knew something about the business. But it was not very strange that he was not there, seeing how impossible it was for anybody to know when the Army Estimates were likely to come on. Then Mr. Simpson, a civil engineer, was set to work, and at an expense of £26,568 he succeeded in getting water two miles off. People in the Metropolis had to pay pretty heavily for water rates, but £26,000 for getting water two miles off was a nice nut for the financial reformers to crack—if any there were either in the House or out of it. Then the ground was so bad that the camp had to be gravelled at an expense of £12,800, an expense which was entirely owing to the improper selection of a site. Then came the most extraordinary business of all—the erection of the temporary huts. In the Estimates of 1854-5 there was a sum of £175,000 taken for the erection of temporary buildings or huts. In the return which he had moved for it was said that no special estimate was made of the cost of the huts, because it was not determined how many men would have to be provided for, but, however, £175,000 was the sum taken. The sum was granted, of course, and then the matter was forgotten; but he hoped that the return he had moved for would have the effect of inducing hon. Members to look more narrowly into such matters, and to follow up their history. The huts were found to be not only bad in design, but infamous in construction. They were neither watertight nor airtight. The Government then entered into a contract to cover the huts with patent felt at an expense of £14,000; but then even they were found not to be watertight, and another contract was entered into to tar them over. Certainly those who had constructed them ought not only to be tarred, but feathered; at any rate, they had feathered their nests well. The whole expense of erecting these huts for Aldershot and other stations had been £796,100—at Aldershot alone they had cost £496,000—and yet they were now in a state of utter rottenness and decay. He should very much like to hear what the Government intended to do with these huts now. After the construction of the huts it was determined to erect permanent barracks for 6,000 men at an expense of £250,000; but then the wise engineers employed, instead of selecting a site which would have allowed room for expansion, went to the very verge of the boundary of the 7,000 acres, and fixed on a site in a hollow, which was very difficult to drain, and which formed a very bad site altogether. Then they found they had omitted a hospital, and, there being no suitable site, they were obliged to give £2,000 for a couple of acres to build one upon; whereas, if the land had been purchased in the first instance, it might have been bought for £20 an acre. And now, through building these permanent barracks on the very verge of the boundary, a town had sprung up on the private property adjoining, which contained every element of demoralization. Great as was the reputation of this country for blundering, there had never been such a succession of blunders made as in the Aldershot business. The public had now got what many people imagined a very splendid site, and a very splendid pile of barracks. But he was informed, by persons competent to form an opinion, that the barracks, though constructed on an expensive system, were very defective. He believed that in May they were nearly burnt down, owing to the flues being made of half brick, and many of them resting on wood. At all events, he could say that the authorities had been in a great hurry to provide the barracks with fire escapes. Then the cooking houses were stuck right under the barracks, and expensive lifts were made—on the model, he supposed, of those at the Carlton and Reform, in order to send up the men's dinners. These lifts had never been used at all. It had been found also that the cooking houses were in the wrong place; they ought to have been detached, instead of being so placed as to roast the soldiers in summer as well as in winter. But this was not all. When the Aldershot Camp was first established iron stoves were provided for 20,000 men. What happened? They were condemned, and were sold as old iron. Captain Grant, a very able Artillery officer, then set up a most effective cooking apparatus for 50,000 men, which had been in use for six years. He had since been informed that Captain Grant's apparatus was to be knocked on the head, and a new office had now been created—the office of Instructor of Military Cookery. Mr. Warrener had superseded Captain Grant, and had set up a cooking apparatus as an experiment—an expensive one, no doubt, as most of these experiments were. Next, there was a system of ventilating barrack grates. Three thousand of these were put up, costing £3 10s. a piece. They were, of course, admirable for every purpose except that for which they were intended, and fifty tons of them had been sold for old iron. It was necessary to put up others in their place, and altogether that experiment had cost not less than £25,000. It would be curious to know the total cost of the barrack stores which had been applied for and condemned at Aldershot. The Vote, which commenced as a temporary encampment, and amounted to £100,000, had swollen to £1,500,000; and he thought he had stated enough to show that it was time to put a stop to such a system. If the blundering at Aldershot had occurred in the sister country, the thing would have been stamped for ever; but, happening in England, he supposed it would only be pointed to as an instance of the solid good sense of John Bull. He hoped that if there was any solid sense in John Bull, and if there was any regard for the public purse in that House, that Aldershot would be looked upon as an example to be shunned, and that the House would not, year after year, be content to vote enormous sums without being persuaded that they got value for their money, and that they were not paying through the nose for that very expensive article—a standing army.

COLONEL NORTH said, the hon. and gallant Member had brought the subject forward with great fairness and great accuracy, and he wished, in addition, to call attention to a statement made two or three years ago by the Commander-in-Chief with regard to barracks. His Royal Highness stated that he constantly visited different barracks in this country and always found that many things were wanted, but as he did not hold the purse-strings of the nation he could only represent the facts to the Government; that he had represented this accordingly, but he was met by the answer that, though the improvements suggested might be all very well and desirable, the Government had no money. That statement of the Commander-in-Chief was denied in “another place,” very much to the surprise of officers of high rank in the service. There was no doubt that many of the improvements introduced into the army had been at the cost of barrack accommodation. Libraries and reading-rooms, for instance, had been formed out of what would otherwise have afforded barrack room; and the men had been crowded into their apartments in order to meet the feeling of the age. The hon. and gallant Member had referred to the manner in which repairs were done in barracks, and the enormous expense attending the minor details of such repairs. The difficulties officers had to contend with as to barrack repairs was illustrated by a case that occurred in London, and which was of such a nature that he could not believe it till he went to the barracks and ascertained that it was true. Some of the stoves in the Regents' Park Barracks were out of order, and an order was made that they should be repaired. They were taken out of their places for the purpose, repaired, and brought back. When they were brought back, and shown to the quartermaster, he approved of them and directed that they should be refixed. But it appeared that the word, “refix” was not in the order, and it took from the 26th of November to the 6th of December to get that defect in the order supplied; and in the meantime the stoves not being refixed they could have no fires, and great inconvenience was experienced. If such a thing could occur in the heart of London, in the barracks of the Guards, what might not happen in distant colonies? In 1855 he had himself brought forward a proposal for putting up an apparatus for drying soldiers' clothing at Aldershot. The Reports of the Barrack Committee and Sanitary Commissioners showed that much of the disease in the army was caused by the soldiers having no means of drying their clothes. An apparatus had been invented by Mr. Huthnance, fully carrying out the recommendations of these bodies. That invention he brought under the notice of the Secretary for War; it was ordered to be reported on, and the Report was against the apparatus. He found on inquiry that the officer who reported against it did not even see it. He then requested that an officer should be sent to Chipping Norton, where the apparatus was at work, to report on it again. That report was most favourable to it, but no notice was taken of the invention till General Peel became Secretary for War.

He ordered it to be put up at Aldershot, and General Knollys spoke very favourably of it. As the cost of the apparatus itself was only £40, he was surprised to find the whole cost of the drying-room put down at £394; of this sum it appeared £40 was paid for the apparatus, and £30 for the expenses of the inventor for attendance at different times. The remainder of the sum, £324, was the cost of building the drying-room, though it was only 19ft. 7½in. long, and 16ft. wide, and 13ft. high, a bare room, not even plastered, but white-washed. From the difficulties he had to contend with about this apparatus, any one might have supposed he was himself the inventor of it, or had some percentage or profit on the transaction. The apparatus was afterwards put up in a drying-room in the Tower, and anything so scandalously done he had never seen. On asking the inventor how he could have allowed it, he explained that every suggestion he made was overruled by the clerk of the works. At the Kingston-on-Thames Workhouse the improved drying-room he had referred to was to be seen in operation. It dried 3,400 articles a-week, the cost of the coal from the Monday morning to the Saturday night being only 4s. 5d., and the whole outlay for the building and apparatus £110. The Laundry Establishment at Chatham was said to have cost £900, but he believed that £1,800 was nearer the mark, and yet the hot closet was capable of drying only 192 shirts in 8 hours, with a consumption of 15 bushels of coal. The improved drying-room dried 308 shirts in 2½ hours, with a consumption of 70lb. of coal in the 24 hours. It was utterly impossible that the Report which had been laid on the Table could be correct, and he trusted that the Government would consent to a thorough investigation of the subject.

MR. MONSELL said, he trusted that the very useful improvements which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North) had described would be introduced into the military service. With reference to the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, he maintained that the purchase of land at Aldershot was a very cheap bargain. It had been bought at the rate of £20 an acre. It was true that a further outlay was afterwards necessary for drainage and other improvements; but he (Mr. Monsell) believed that if the land had been in a condition which would not have required that outlay it would have been idle to expect that it could have been purchased for the very moderate sum of £20 an acre; and he felt persuaded that if the troops were removed and the land put to sale it would bring a much larger price than the whole outlay for the purchase of land, and drainage, and other works. No doubt, it was originally intended for a camp; but it was very fortunate that it was capable of being used as barracks when the necessity arose. Since the peace of 1815 it had unfortunately been the habit to dispose of many of the buildings which during the great war had been used for the accommodation of troops; and on the breaking out of the Crimean war, when the army was increased and the militia embodied, it was found that we had an enormous number of men unprovided with proper barracks. The military authorities deemed it advisable to erect a large number of huts at Aldershot, the Curragh of Kildare, Shorncliffe, Colchester, and other places. The first were erected at Aldershot, those which were erected at Shorncliffe were better, and those at the Curragh were best of all. Those at Aldershot were erected under great pressure, and it was absolutely necessary to erect them quickly. He agreed with his hon. Friend that the barracks should not have been erected in the corner of the land. He certainly never could understand the expediency of that, but the highest military authorities were of opinion that that should be the site of the building. With that single exception he believed those barracks were very successful, and that they had been erected at a smaller cost per man than any barracks that had been erected elsewhere. The first intention of Lord Hardinge was to have barracks built according to the Belgian system, but in deference to other military authorities first-class barracks were substituted. That accounted for the difference between the first estimate and the actual expenditure.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that as one of the officers who had been first stationed at Aldershot, he could bear his testimony to the pressure which was made to get the huts up, and he believed that was the cause of their inefficiency, as they were consequently commenced during a frost, and had no brick foundations. With regard to the permanent barracks, they were most admirably constructed, and were altogether most efficient. If barracks were more costly than formerly, it was in consequence of the recommendation of the

Select Committee that greater space should be given to the men, and especially to the married soldiers. His object in rising, however, was to call attention to an item in the Vote of £50,000 for sanitary purposes. It was very well to have a sanitary commission for one year, but he thought the House would hardly sanction the perpetuation of it. There was one item included in that £50,000 which he hoped even financial reformers would assist him in dividing the Committee upon. He alluded to an allowance of three guineas a day to a civilian medical officer. Now, seeing that they were paying over £62,000 a year for a medical staff at home, it was hardly necessary to appoint a civil medical officer to such a post. Under these circumstances, he should move the reduction of the £50,000 by £1,150, the amount of the salary of the civil officer.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £50,000 for the 'Sanitary Vote,' be reduced by the amount of £1,150."

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham had nothing to do with the design of the huts at Aldershot, which were most miserable erections. They were totally unfit for soldiers or any other persons to live in, as the ventilation was two or three feet below the heads of the occupants, consequently they had to breathe a deleterious atmosphere. The great mistake that was made at Aldershot was the omission to construct the camp on a permanent and comprehensive plan. But he was bound to say that the Aldershot barracks were the best and cost the least of any that he was acquainted with. He did not think the cost of gravelling and draining and preparing the ground at all extravagant.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that as the reduction of an item in the Vote had been moved the debate must be confined to that question until it was disposed of.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment, at least, until the Under Secretary for War had replied to the statement of the hon. Member for Liskeard.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he had no objection to withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that he should have an opportunity of renewing it, when he should certainly take the sense of the Committee upon the question to which it had reference.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. HARVEY LEWIS said, he was willing to admit that he had the honour of entering the House as a financial reformer, and he considered himself an independent Member; but when the present, or any other Government proposed anything which might be necessary for the defence of the country, they should have his warm support; while, on the other hand, he should most unquestionably oppose anything like extravagant expenditure. It appeared to him that no answer had been given to the speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard, who stated that many mistakes had been made in the construction of the Aldershot barracks; and that gave rise to the serious inquiry whether civil or military engineers should be employed in the construction of such barracks for the future? He believed that the corps of Royal Engineers, ably and excellently officered as it was, had been obliged to call in a civil engineer, Mr. Simpson, to aid in finding that indispensable requisite—water. If that were so, the gravest question arose for the future whether such operations were to be carried out solely by the corps of Royal Engineers, or whether civil engineers ought to be also employed so as to create a kind of mixed commission. At present, they were to look the fact in the face, that an establishment for £25,000 men had cost the country £1,500,000. If the Committee were prepared for such an expenditure it was useless to say anything. Financial reformers would never be wanting in granting ample means for the public service; all they required was, that the funds entrusted to the Executive should be faithfully, honestly, and judiciously administered; but they did not like a wasteful expenditure of that money which was so often and so cheerfully contributed by the country. He had, therefore, risen to protest against this costly expenditure. He thought that when experiments were to be made they should be carried out upon a moderate system, rather than upon that costly and excessive scale upon which they had, hitherto, been conducted.

MR. HASSARD said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. Under Secretary for War to the imperfect mode in which the lighting of the barracks was carried out in many places, and especially at Waterford.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, there was a great deal of complaint about the expense incurred at Aldershot which he thought to be very unfounded. He knew that the cost per head of erecting one of the cheapest asylums for lunatics—that in Hampshire, was £150, while the cost for providing accommodation for the soldier in the same county was only £60 per head.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained that while money had been expended on barracks sufficient to provide every soldier in the British army with a comfortable cottage, the accommodation was still described by medical men as insufficient, and in many instances disgraceful. He should like to hear some explanation of the item of £60,000 for the purchase of lands and erecting rifle-range huts at Gravesend.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £7,000, part of the sum of £40,000 for stabling of a more permanent character in the Camp at Aldershot. A great deal had been said about the improvements in barracks and about the sanitary arrangements in the new buildings erected for troops, but his quarters as an ensign twenty-five years ago were as comfortable as those which he enjoyed at the present time. As to Aldershot he looked upon that camp as one of the greatest sinks of corruption and iniquity. It was quite melancholy to think of it. He spoke from an experience of twelve months in that camp, where he said that it was perfectly horrible to witness the scenes which went on, owing to so many troops being quartered in the camp, and to their having nothing but riot and debauchery for amusement. Hon. Gentlemen who had not had personal experience of it might judge of its state from the paragraphs which from time to time appeared in the newspapers. They showed that every crime short of murder was committed there. It had a very bad effect on the condition of a soldier who had served ten or fifteen years in the colonies to send him to one of these monstrous camps, in which there was nothing but idleness and debauchery. He did not mean to say that the principle of forming camps was a bad one. On the contrary, he thought it would be a great advantage to the army to collect troops for two or three months in camp every summer to learn the arts of actual warfare; but the camp at Aldershot had been turned into an enormous barrack, in which the soldiers had nothing to do. Everything was brought to them as regularly as if they were in a barrack, and they learned nothing whatever. Hon. Members might hear great accounts of what was done at Aldershot; but he could assure them that it was a great sham. In respect of drill the fact was by taking raw recruits to one of those camps they interfered with their discipline and prevented them from acquiring that steadiness which was so essential to a soldier. He ventured to say that a young recruit was deteriorated after spending some time there. Another argument in favour of those camps was that they would teach our generals. There was a great outcry against our generals during the Crimean war. A more heartless calumny was never uttered than that made use of against those officers at that time; but if our generals wanted teaching were they taught at Aldershot? One officer was kept there for a very long time. General Knollys, for instance, had commanded for a very considerable time. Again, the General officer who commanded the camp lived eight miles from it, the adjutant-general five, and the quartermaster-general four. What was the consequence? Why, if an orderly went to the camp at night he did not know what officer to go to. Again, why should a brigadier be placed there for five years? Every officer commanding a regiment ought to have the chance of commanding a brigade sometimes, and every brigadier ought to have his chance of commanding a division. The General in command and the other superior officers were sufficient in the discharge of their duties. What he complained of was the system of turning those camps into permanent quarters of large masses of men; and as he looked upon the stabling as of a permanent character, he now moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £7,000.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, there was a good deal of truth in what his hon. and gallant Friend had advanced, although his statements were, he thought, somewhat exaggerated. He would admit that Aldershot might have been made of greater advantage as a place of instruction, and that the arrangements might have been better. At the same time it must be recollected that it had grown by degrees, and its utility was still being gradually developed. In the first place, the General in command lived several miles from the camp. It would have been better if the Government had provided a residence for the General in the immediate proximity of the camp; but, as they had not done so, it could not be expected that an officer who held such a command for five years would live in a small hut. Still, when his hon. and learned Friend said that an orderly arriving at ten o'clock at night did not know to whom to deliver a message, he must have forgotten that there was at all times a general of the week, to whom all reports were made in the absence of the General commanding, and whose business it was not to leave the camp during the evening. He considered that the country was not aware of how much they owed to that General (General Knollys), who had at first no ordinary difficulty to encounter, and whose time had been over occupied by an enormous correspondence, consequent upon the anomalous position of the War Department and the Horse Guards. In regard to drill he must say that, of his own experience, Aldershot was of immense advantage to the army. Before the camp at Chobham was established there was hardly a brigade ever found together, except at Dublin. He had heard, indeed, old officers say that they were unable to command a brigade for want of experience. He agreed that it would have been better if there had been more opportunities of interchanging commands. He would also admit that the camp might be made too much of a permanent camp, and that it was a disadvantage to keep the whole force all the winter in such a place. It was an advantage to the men when they first arrived, and an improvement both to officers and men in regard to drill, but after a certain time the advantage was lost, and the place became irksome. Opportunities are given for instruction there which are not to be found elsewhere, and there cannot be a doubt that gradually it will become more and more of service to the country. If it were possible during the winter months to quarter the greater part of the men in other directions it would be better. On the whole, however, as a camp of military instruction, Aldershot had been of great service both to officers and men, but particularly to officers, in respect to the regiments being quartered together in brigades. The men gained, too, in being taken away from sentry and night duty and in living in a healthy situation. The Government, however, had made a great mistake in permitting the erection, within 100 yards of the hut barracks, of a line of houses of a description to which he need not more particularly allude, over which the Government had no control, and which exercised a demoralizing effect on the troops. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) that £20 an acre was very cheap for common land of that description.

THE CHAIRMAN intimated to the hon. and gallant Member for Limerick that though the Estimate for Stabling was £40,000, the Vote now asked for was only £7,000; so that his Amendment, if carried, would have the effect of disallowing the whole of the Vote for the present year.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was glad to find that his hon. and gallant Friend (General Lindsay) had endorsed everything he had said about Aldershot. He objected to the camp being made of a permanent character, and he, therefore, moved the omission of the whole of the sum proposed to be voted for this year.

GENERAL LINDSAY denied that he endorsed the statement of the gallant Member for Limerick who gave no credit at all, and who had exaggerated every defect.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, that having himself been at Aldershot, he could bear the strongest testimony to the need of better accommodation for horses. When he was there the horses all had sore throats, and the discomfort could not be described. He was astonished, therefore, at hearing his hon. and gallant Friend object to the Vote of £7,000, for no money could be better laid out than in improving the stabling at Aldershot.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he was glad the Committee had heard the testimony of two officers who had been at Aldershot. He trusted that after the discussion which had taken place they were not now of opinion that there had been, as was alleged, any misrepresentation from the beginning, or that the House had expected to Vote £100,000 and no more. [Mr. BERNAL OSBOURNE: Hear!] If the House had been asked merely to buy land for a site upon which to build the barracks there would have been no reason for asking for so large a sum. He would ask the Committee whether the mere demand for such a sum for the purchase of land did not involve an additional outlay for huts and other expenses which were necessary for a camp of exercise? It had been said that the whole thing had been entered upon without opposition or criticism. But there had been constant discussions on the subject. He could himself recollect an Amendment moved by Captain Vivian, who he regretted was not now a Member of the House, which raised the very same point with that debated that night, as to the permanence of the camp. The question had been thoroughly discussed, and among those who voted against the reduction of the Vote moved by Captain Vernon was the hon. and gallant Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne). With respect to the suggestion that some improvement might be made in respect to the supervision of barrack expenditure, and the employment of civil engineers, he had to state that a Committee had been appointed to consider the question. In reference to the actual Vote, the reduction of which was moved by the hon. and gallant Officer, he believed that there was nothing which would attract the observation of any hon. Member who visited Aldershot more than the state of the cavalry stables; and for the preservation of the horses in the south camp, all of which probably would be burnt in the event of a fire breaking out, it was essential that some improvement should be made in them. The £7,000 was to be applied to the erection of permanent stables for the horses of a battery of Horse Artillery, and the remainder of the whole sum required would stand over for subsequent consideration, none of it being expended without the previous consent of the House of Commons. The cost of the permanent barracks at Aldershot was, as the Committee had been informed by the hon. Member for Coventry, less than the cost of other barracks. With regard to the grates mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member for Liskeard, he did not believe that any ventilating grates had been introduced into Aldershot at all, and certainly doubted the accuracy of the statement that grates had been introduced and afterwards sold for old iron. The drying machinery introduced at Aldershot and Chatham had been alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), and the Committee might rest satisfied that every attention would be given to the introduction of the very best drying apparatus into the different camps and barracks. He would also make inquiries as to the adoption of gas in barracks.

COLONEL KNOX said, that he should support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote, because the permanent barracks at Aldershot were growing to such a magnitude that the Committee ought to know where the expenditure was to stop. He did not believe that any benefit would be derived from this Vote for the increase of the cavalry barracks, for they were at present sufficiently extensive, and he strongly deprecated spending any more money on the permanent barracks. With regard to the new barracks in London, in Portland Street, he wished to ask a question—

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must request the hon. and gallant Member to confine his observations to Aldershot.

COLONEL KNOX said, of course he would bow to the Chair; but he wanted to know how the authorities were going to deal with the huts at Aldershot? They were in a state to require repairs or rebuilding, and he wished to know whether the Government had come to the determination of doing one or the other? Were they going to make them permanent, or merely to repair them? His question also applied to the barracks at Colchester and other places.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: This discussion has, I think, taken a much wider range than the Vote under our consideration justifies. We have been debating whether it was originally expedient to buy a large tract of land for the purpose of assembling these troops to be instructed in general movements; whether it was right to have erected permanent works on that land; whether we ought to use huts in lieu of barracks; whether the command at Aldershot should be confined to one officer, or whether a number of officers in succession should be so employed? Now these are, no doubt, very proper subjects for discussion. They are all questions of great interest; but then I would humbly submit that they do not exactly belong to the Vote which is now under our consideration. That Vote is the moderate sum of £7,000 for the purpose of providing stabling for barracks which are already built. The argument of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) and some hon. Gentlemen who followed would, if acted upon, naturally lead us to break up the whole thing, to sell the land, and have no encampment at Aldershot at all. He would have us pull down the huts and, I suppose, convert them into firewood; in short, he would have the establishment altogether discontinued. Now, if he were to make that proposal in direct terms there would be a practical question for our consideration; but that is not the point at issue, and I trust, therefore, the Committee will waive these general expressions of opinion to which we have been listening, and Vote the sum which we believe to be necessary—and which a gallant Officer on the other side of the House, who has had some experience at Aldershot, states to be necessary—in order to render the works at present there available for the purposes for which they were intended. So far as the general question is concerned, I must say I am somewhat astonished that the hon. and gallant Member for Liskeard, or any other hon. Gentleman possessing military knowledge, should appear to doubt the advantage of having an extensive piece of ground like that at Aldershot for the purpose of military instruction. The scheme of having such an encampment was taken from the practice adopted by the French Government, who used to have a camp at Boulogne, and who, when they found what we had done in the same direction, bought a much larger extent of ground at Chalons; the expense of the camp there being much greater than that which we incurred. It is, however, contended that the barracks at Aldershot are a source of demoralization, owing to the population which has sprung up in the neighbourhood, and that we ought to buy up everything in its vicinity with the view of preventing such a state of things. But what, let me ask, is the condition of barracks elsewhere? Are we to purchase up all the ground in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth and Plymouth and other towns attached to which there are barracks, with the view of driving away that particular description of population to which allusion has been made? Are we to have barracks nowhere except in perfect solitudes, so that the men might be cut off from all communication of that character? Why, Sir, it has been strongly objected to Aldershot in the course of this long discussion that it was not near a town, and that there was not, as a consequence, due provision made for what is called amusement for the men. These arguments, it will be at once seen, destroy one another, while the charge made against Aldershot on the score of morality applies with infinitely greater force to those barracks which are situated in large and populous towns. With respect to the expense of the ground purchased there, I would simply ask whether if we had proposed to buy 9,000 acres of enclosed land we should have made a more economical outlay? What I should like to know would be the cost of these 9,000 acres, on which it would have become necessary to throw down all the fences, to destroy all the cultivation, for the purpose of reducing it to an open space on which military manœuvres might be executed? Why, it is obvious that land of that description would have cost a much larger sum than we paid for Aldershot, and I maintain that the purchase of the land there was, after all, a very economical arrangement. The expediency of having an encampment of this kind, however, for the purposes of military instruction, does not bear upon the Vote under our notice, and I trust the House will not hesitate to Vote the sum of £7,000 for which we ask, and which is required in order to render the barracks at Aldershot available for the objects for which they are intended.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to ask one question of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War. A case had been brought before him of the horses of the Blues having been put into stables at Aldershot last year which had been previously occupied by horses afflicted with that horrible disease the glanders. It was impossible to conceive anything more absurd than such an arrangement, and he wished to know whether the Vote would have any tendency to prevent a repetition of such conduct?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the Vote would certainly have such an effect as it would provide increased accommodation for the horses there.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Before we go to a division I may be allowed to question the doctrine which has just been laid down, that in discussing a Vote such as that before us we are not entitled to enter into the general subject of the expediency of maintaining the encampment at Aldershot as a permanent establishment. On a former occasion, when I took up that subject, I was told that it was not the proper time to do so, and now that we are dealing with a Vote in connection with it I am met with a similar objection. I am not surprised to find that the noble Lord at the head of the Government is partial to Aldershot, because it is his own child, and he acknowledged himself to be its father in 1857, on the occasion of the Motion made by Captain Vivian. Now, the Under Secretary for War has twitted me with voting in the majority on that occasion in obedience to my commander; but

I was at the time a subordinate Member of the Government, and the hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that “Sufferance is the badge of all our tribe.”

I would remind the hon. Gentleman, however, that I never voted in favour of the permanent system at Aldershot — nay, more, that I was always opposed to it. But to return to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, I find that on June 5, 1857, when Captain Vivian moved the reduction of the sum to be expended for permanent barracks from £100,000 to £50,000, he spoke as follows:—

“I thought, Sir, I had explained that permanent barracks are to be built at Aldershot for 4,000 infantry, 1,500 cavalry, and a few batteries of artillery, and that it is not intended to build barracks for a larger number of men than that. Troops are to be collected together there in a larger number during the spring and summer months for the purposes of exercise; but it is not intended to make it a winter camp.” [3 Hansard, cxlv. 1264.]

Now, that is the very thing which I have been urging on the Committee. I do not object to troops being collected at Aldershot during the summer months. What I am opposed to is the policy of making it a permanent barrack, and there is not, I contend, a single position which I have laid down to-night which has been contravened, although my statements have been nibbled at by the noble Lord and the hon. Under Secretary for War. An hon. Member from the sister country, who represents the cavalry, told us that if the Government had not brought forward this Vote he would have insisted upon it, because his horses had very sore throats.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE: The hon. Gentleman has misrepresented and misquoted every word I said.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I certainly understood the hon. Member to say that his horses had sore throats, and that, therefore, he thought the Vote a proper one. If the hon. Member can read, he may see on referring to the Estimates that the sum of £7,000 is intended to provide permanent stables for artillery horses; it has nothing whatever to do with officers' horses. I am so satisfied that it is bad policy to make permanent encampments that I hope the Committee will be asked to divide against the Vote.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. and gallant Gentleman has said that I denied his right to discuss the general question of Aldershot, and maintained that he ought to confine himself to the stables. I said exactly the contrary. I admitted that it was competent for him or anybody else to discuss the general question, but added that the Vote before us related merely to the stables. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, I must say, has excited my deepest compassion. He has most pathetically described the extreme sufferings he endured when he was in office, and was called upon to assent to the Vote for Aldershot. It is a lamentable thing that he should have undergone so much pain; but, on the other hand, it is some consolation to know that in his present position he has fully indemnified himself for his former privations. The free expression of opinion in which he has indulged this evening can be compared with nothing but the thawing of Baron Munchausen's horn, when all those notes, whether harmonious or discordant, which had been frozen up so long at last found vent into the open air, and either astonished or delighted the audience by whom they were heard. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not suppose that I have been merely nibbling at his argument, or that I have not contradicted anything he has said. I contradict every opinion he has uttered, and challenge him to prove his statements.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: It has been my misfortune to-night to fall foul of two Irish Gentlemen — the hon. Member opposite and the noble Lord who has just sat down. I think, however, it is a little unfair in the noble Lord to fire off at my expense the old jest about Baron Munchausen's horn, which, for the benefit of younger Members of the House, I may state I heard him six years ago apply to another Member. We have a much more serious matter before us than the venerable joke which the noble Lord has revived. Is the House of Commons prepared to sanction the expenditure of somewhere about £1,500,000 upon the camp at Aldershot? The noble Lord says he contradicts everything I have said, but I have quoted a passage from Hansard which cannot be disputed. In 1857 the noble Lord stated that it was not intended to make a permanent encampment at Aldershot; but now, availing himself of his acquaintance with the pages of our most ancient jester, he wants the Committee to give its assent to a different policy.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Gentleman has quoted from Hansard the amount of permanent barrack accommodation which I stated in 1857 was intended to be established at Aldershot. I believe he will find the amount of permanent barrack accommodation which actually exists at the present moment does not exceed that which I stated in 1857.

COLONEL KNOX said, he apprehended that the £7,000 now asked for was only the first instalment of a much larger sum.

COLONEL DICKSON stated that the permanent barracks had got plenty of good stabling attached to them. He would divide the Committee against the Vote.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £7,000, for Stabling of a more permanent character than that at present existing in the Camp at Aldershot, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 147: Majority 97.

Original Question again proposed,

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished some explanation of the proposed Vote of £10,000 for Colchester Barracks. The total estimate had been £60,000, including the purchase of land. £35,000 had been previously voted, leaving £25,000 to be voted in subsequent years. But now, after having spent £33,000, the £27,000 was increased to £60,000. He understood that part was for cavalry barracks. But they already had cavalry barracks at Norwich and Ipswich, and he supposed it was the intention of the authorities to remove them to Colchester. If they did that, what did they propose to do with the barracks at Norwich and Ipswich? If he was rightly informed, they could not sell these latter, because they could not give a good title to the land, and, therefore, they would be obliged to retain them. He wished also to ask whether the sum of £60,000 was the whole sum which they would be called upon to vote for barracks at Colchester? for it was rumoured that it was only part of a great scheme to spend something like £200,000. He thought the Estimates ought to show in the first column what was really the total sum to be spent.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that there was a vast increase on the Vote without any reason assigned. He thought the Under Secretary for War was bound to tell the Committee why such an increase had taken place. He also wished to know what they wanted with an enormous establishment at Gravesend, costing £60,000, while they had Chatham within seven or eight miles, where there were ample means of teaching soldiers to fire ball cartridge? With regard to Colchester he thought the increase was quite uncalled for. The Government were wasting money in the erection of barracks. He had been at Dover on the previous day and had seen the barracks erecting there, which were to cost £29,000, and accommodate only thirty officers—nearly £1,000 for each officer. The buildings were of a magnificent external character, with cut stone, but not a jot was added by them to the comfort of the officers. Such extravagant expenditure ought to be discouraged.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that with reference to Colchester the Estimates were perfectly clear. The Committee was asked to vote £16,000, part of £60,000 for the erection of cavalry barracks. The reason of these being erected was that the lease of the barracks at Norwich would fall in in a few years, and those at Ipswich were in a very bad state. He had no information of any such extensive plan respecting the camp at Colchester as that alluded to by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers). With respect to the purchase of land at Gravesend, that was only for the completion of a service which had already been approved, and part of the cost of which had been previously voted. The addition to the Estimate for Woolwich Hospital was to supply accommodation for an increased number of patients.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE asked for an explanation of the proposed Vote of £20,000 for the purchase of the Euston Hotel, Fleetwood, for rifle ranges and butts. £20,000 had already been granted for that purpose, and, besides the Vote now asked for, a further demand of £20,000 would be required to complete the work, making £60,000 in all. That was an enormous sum, and to raise the question he would move that £10,000 be deducted from the Vote.

MR. MONSELL said, he did not think the hon. Under Secretary for War's explanation respecting Woolwich Hospital at all satisfactory. The outlay upon that establishment was objected to last year, when a distinct assurance was given that the expense would not exceed £120,000. Instead of that, however, the Estimate had now risen to £200,000. Again, with respect to the construction of the barracks at the Royal Military Academy, there had been a distinct understanding when the works commenced that there should be a separate room for every cadet; but up to that time, as he was informed, two, and even three, cadets had to live in the same room, without having any place to retire to for studying.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he wished to call attention to the item of £15,000 for increasing the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, so as to accommodate 500 cadets. That was the first instalment of a scheme for entirely changing the mode of preparing officers for the army. Every young gentleman, it appeared, before entering the service, was to be required to pass a year at the Military College in acquiring the rudiments of his profession. All monopolies were highly objectionable, but a monopoly of education such as that proposed was, perhaps, the most objectionable of all. A special training like that would, he believed, not be advantageous to the army. It would be better if every officer entering the service were required to possess a liberal education, wherever that education might have been obtained. What security was there that an establishment for 500 cadets would be conducted in such a manner as to afford the education it professed to provide, and at the same time to keep up the high tone which had hitherto distinguished the British officer?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the object of purchasing the Euston Hotel at Fleetwood was to afford the means of instruction in rifle shooting in the north of England, instead of requiring officers to travel from distant parts of the country to the establishment at Hythe.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he wished to bring under the notice of the Committee the subject of Captain Grant's cooking kitchens, which were now established in all the larger barracks and encampments. Before 1855 the cooking system in the army was very indifferent, but in that year Captain Grant was directed by Viscount Hardinge to investigate the subject, the result of which was the establishment of a new system of cooking at Aldershot. Captain Grant had not only originally established the present system by which great economy and increased efficiency had been obtained, but it was found so successful at Aldershot, that it was in consequence of that success established at Shorncliffe, the Curragh, Colchester, Woolwich, and other places; he, therefore, has the merit of having established the first improvements, and he is deserving of consideration for his success, and it is not fair now to turn round upon him and say that others had subsequently improved upon him, but he ought to have credit for the five years conduct of a system which has been proved to be so advantageous to the service. Under the old system the consumption of fuel was about 3½lb. per man per day, but Captain Grant's improvement reduced it to about 5lb. per man per week, thus effecting a great saving of expense, as well as an addition to the comforts of the soldiers. When this subject was brought forward last year the noble Lord the Secretary for War observed that Captain Grant's system was only one of many that had been submitted to the Government, but, although others had lately been brought under notice, yet, as before stated, Captain Grant was the original inventor. The noble Lord also objected that Captain Grant's system was not original, that it had been tried and had not succeeded at the London Tavern; but subsequent inquiries led him (General Lindsay) to believe that that was a mistake; and, even if it were so, he has the merit of having applied it to soldiers. Other objections had been raised which for the most part had been got rid of by recent improvements by him, and the fact remained that Captain Grant had introduced a system which for a long time had been the only system of cooking in use at large camps. He thought that officer had a right to expect sympathy and encouragement from the Government, but, instead of that, those whose business it was to carry out the details had rather acted in opposition to him. Captain Grant had received £500 as compensation for his outlay, but not as a recognition of the merits of his invention. That sum was far less than he had expended, he having paid upwards of £750 out of his own pocket. One of Captain Grant's kitchens has been altered to carry out a system under the countenance of the War Department—and without reference to Captain Grant—the alterations have already cost £700. It is small encouragement to gentlemen to improve systems for the Army when they find themselves neglected, and treated without deference. I trust the Government will consider this question with reference to some compensation to Captain Grant, both for his success and for his exertions.

Mr. Monsell

Motion made, and Question,

"That the item of £20,000, for Purchase of the Euston Hotel, Fleetwood, Land for Rifle Ranges, and Erecting Huts, be reduced by the sum of £10,000."

Put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed,

LORD FERMOY observed that a very important question had been raised as to providing a special military education for officers. It was impossible to enter into that subject that night, and he should, therefore, move that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the Committee would have an opportunity hereafter of discussing that question, and he trusted, therefore, the noble Lord would not persist in his Motion.

MR. MONSELL said, he hoped that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would agree to report Progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the Committee would allow them to go on with the Vote, which they had been engaged upon since nine o'clock. If they were to go on reporting Progress in that manner he did not know when the Session would be over.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress," put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed,

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he should move the omission of the item of £15,000 for increasing the Royal Military College at Sandhurst to hold 500 cadets.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £15,000, for increasing the Royal Military College at Sandhurst to hold five hundred Cadets, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. T. G. BARING explained that under the new system which was proposed officers previous to joining the army would have to go to a military college for a year, for the purpose of learning the theory and practice of their profession. The plan would not come into operation until the beginning of 1863. Further details would be given, and, therefore, he thought there was no reason for refusing the Vote. His noble Friend the Secretary for State had been in communication with the authorities of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, with regard to a suggestion that the universities should also be used for the purpose of military education.

In reply to Sir FREDERIC SMITH,

MR. T. G. BARING said, the £15,000 would enable the present building to be extended, but would not provide the whole accommodation necessary for 500 cadets.

COLONEL KNOX remarked that the Committee should have some data as to the system which the Government proposed. When they knew what the system was it would be time enough to vote money to enlarge the building.

GENERAL LINDSAY suggested that the hon. Under Secretary should make some explanatory statement.

LORD FERMOY said, they were asked to proceed, and yet the Government had not made up their mind as to the principle they intended to adopt. Why should Parliament grant buildings that might not be required? He thought the Vote ought to be postponed.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the plan had been explained in the evidence given by His Royal Highness, Commanding-in-Chief, before the Committee on military organization. He was anxious to get rid of all patronage connected with his office, and it was proposed that after the 1st of January, 1863, all direct admissions to the army should cease, with the exception of those given to non-commissioned officers. All officers before entering the army would have to go through a course of one year at Sandhurst, passing a qualifying examination on going in, and another examination on leaving. The latter would include drill and military exercises. The present system would continue until January, 1863. With the exception of the commissions guaranteed by Act of Parliament to the sons of persons who have served in India, all commissions without purchase would be competed for by the cadets at Sandhurst.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wished to know in what manner candidates would be admitted to Sandhurst?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the names would be put down on a list as at present, and each candidate would take his turn.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the matter was one of such importance that he must press his Amendment for the omission of the item.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK moved that the Committee report Progress.

Motion made and Question "That the Chairman do report Progress," put and negatived.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought that as no information had been laid before the Committee as to the system which was to be adopted, it would be better to postpone the item for the present.

MR. AYRTON said, he also advocated postponement, as the item really belonged to the Educational Vote, which came next.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that if hon. Gentlemen would withdraw their opposition to the Vote, he would undertake that no expense should be incurred on account of it until the House had had an opportunity of giving an opinion on the scheme of education proposed.

Question put,

"That the item of £15,000, for increasing the Royal Military College at Sandhurst to hold five hundred Cadets, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 54: Majority 5.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,150, paid to the Sanitary Commissioners.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £50,000 for the 'Sanitary Vote,' be reduced by the amount of £1,150."

MR. T. G. BARING said, Dr. Sutherland was the highest authority upon these questions, and the improvements which, under his superintendence, had been effected in the sanitary arrangements of barracks had tended materially to reduce the mortality in the army. The appointment was not a permanent one, and in the course of another year or so his employment would probably cease.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that as he believed that in the present state of the Committee reduction was not to be hoped for, he should move that the Chairman report Progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was sure the Committee would feel that nothing was more important than the preservation of the health of the army. Putting it on the lowest grounds, there was nothing so uneconomical and so prodigal as carelessness on this point. But in reality it stood on higher ground, because if men were enlisted for the service of the country the Government was bound to take due care of their lives. When a large number of persons were crowded together in barracks, or in camp, there was until lately much ignorance as to the principles on which the preservation of health depended. Dr.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald

Sutherland was the first to examine into these principles. He had rendered invaluable service in the Crimea, as well as in the different hospitals and barracks of this country, and no money could be better laid out in guarding the health of the soldier from the influences to which it was subjected.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress," put, and negatived.

COLONEL GILPIN said, the noble Lord had not convinced him that when so large a sum was paid to medical officers in the army, some of those gentlemen could not be employed to discharge the duties performed in this instance by a civilian.

Question put, "That the item of £50,000 for the 'Sanitary Vote,' be reduced by the amount of £1,150."

Committee divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 78: Majority 68.

In reply to General LINDSAY,

MR. T. G. BARING said, that a sum of money had been awarded to Captain Grant as remuneration, but he was not satisfied with it; since that time the question had not been raised. If an application were again made it would be fully considered. He could not undertake to say that Captain Grant should be paid out of the saving his kitchen had effected, there being differences of opinion as to its economy. There was no disposition to depreciate Captain Grant's services.

MR. CAVE said, that Captain Grant's kitchen had been of great service in the North West London Reformatory, and a large district school at Southwell. What he complained of was that some sinister influence was at work to prevent his plans being properly carried out. It was a great evil that, rightly or wrongly, the opinion was universal that the State was a hard taskmaster but a bad paymaster; and that a man could not expend his time and talents in a less profitable service than that of his country.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, there never was a more successful improvement introduced into the army than Captain Grant's kitchen. It was both healthy and economical. Captain Grant had expended £700 out of his own pocket, and he had received £500.

Original Question put, and agreed to;

House resumed. Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, June 26, 1861.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Wolverhampton, v. Sir Richard Bethell, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Book Unions.

2° Church Endowment Act Amendment.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES BILL.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [8th May],

“That the Bill be now read a second time; and which Amendment was, to leave out the word ‘now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day six months.’”

Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to remind the House that the Bill was only a reproduction of a measure, the principle of which had been previously approved by a Select Committee, and received the sanction of the House in the previous Session. The law on the subject as it stood was not satisfactory. The provision for arbitration in the statute of 1824 was of a very complex character, and did not sufficiently facilitate the operation. The main difference between the Bill and the statute was that the latter did not permit the arbitrator to be named until a dispute had actually arisen, while the former proposed that the arbitrator should be appointed beforehand, while all parties were in concord and good temper. The Court of Arbitration was to be established on the voluntary principle, and to receive the sanction of one of the Ministers of the Crown. Some parts of the Bill which had been most objected to were, in point of fact, taken literatim from the existing Act. The hon. and learned Solicitor General, for instance, opposed the provision for establishing a rate of wages, which it happened was borrowed from the statute.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he believed the Solicitor General expressly pointed out that fact.

MR. AYRTON observed, that groundless apprehensions were also entertained that the Bill would create a charge on the Consolidated Fund. It was, however, specially provided in Clause 16, that the expenses of the Courts were to be paid by fees from the parties who made use of them. That was in strict analogy with the present statute, by which certain fees were fixed by the justice who served as arbitrator, and charged upon the parties who appealed to him. The Bill was framed at the suggestion of large bodies of working people as the best mode of getting rid of the difficulties of the present system, and of establishing a tribunal easy of access and simple in operation for the arrangement of disputes. The measure was not intended to settle strikes, but he believed it would tend greatly to prevent them, as it would promote a more friendly spirit between masters and workmen, and afford an opportunity of conciliation before any open controversy broke out. He could have understood the opposition to the Bill if it had come from those who were generally opposed to the claims of the working classes, but he could not understand its proceeding from hon. Gentlemen who were loud in their assertions that the great need of the workman was liberty to vote for Members of Parliament and a larger share of political power, because he knew no better training for the exercise of that power which could be given to working men than by means of such a Bill as this, allowing them to manage their own affairs, and to see how difficult a matter government was.

MR. G. HARDY said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would persist in his Motion for the rejection of the Bill, because he was anxious that the working men should be allowed to manage their own affairs without the intervention of Parliament by means of a most ineffectual measure. The decisions of the Councils to be appointed under the Bill would only bind those who had become parties to the appointment of the Councils, and would have no power over those who were beyond that line. For that reason the measure would be perfectly useless. Parties were now at perfect liberty to appoint arbitrators and refer their differences to them for settlement. [MR. AYRTON: Not to establish a Court.] They could have arbitrators; and it was because he did not want to establish a Court of Arbitration, which would be ineffectual, that he thought it would be desirable to reject the Bill at once. The machinery of the Bill would by no means effect the object to which it was intended to be directed. There was to be a registry of voters by whom the Councils were to be elected, and who would be the persons who would be bound by their decisions. But workmen were so continually changing their places of employment that it would be impossible to keep those lists correctly, and new workmen would come in who would not be on the registry, and, therefore, not bound to accept the decisions of the Council; and even if the list were accurate, an employer might at any time practically set aside a decision of the Council by discharging from his service all the men whose names were upon this list, and employing only those who were not inscribed thereon. He yielded to no one in his desire to improve and elevate the condition of the working classes, but he declined to vote for a measure which would only fill them with delusive hopes; and he thought that the workmen would be consulting their own interests far more if they relied upon the general principles which regulated the payment of wages for labour, and placed that reasonable confidence in the masters which, in the main, he believed they were entitled to.

MR. SLANEY said, that the principle of the measure had already been sanctioned by existing Acts of Parliament. Those Acts had proved entirely ineffectual, and hence the necessity for this Bill. It was, he thought, exceedingly desirable that before civil blood arose between the masters and men, a few cool, deliberate, and sensible men should have the points in dispute submitted to them, so as to see if their differences could not be settled. He admitted that a greater spirit of conciliation existed now than formerly, but he thought the adoption of some such measure as this was absolutely necessary, especially when they considered the prospect of a short supply of cotton in the winter. He hoped, therefore, that the House would repeat its sanction of the principle by reading the Bill a second time, and he had no doubt that his hon. friend who had charge of it would be ready to consider any objections which might be urged against its details when the House went into Committee. What would be thought by the intelligent and improving population of our large towns if the House summarily rejected the principle of conciliation? The hon. Gentleman had said that there would be a great fluctuation in the lists of voters, but he seemed to have overlooked the circumstance that the Bill required a residence of six months before a workman could become an elector of these tribunals.

MR. MACKINNON said, that the Bill having last year passed that House unanimously, and been read a second time in the House of Lords, it would be stultifying the House to throw it out upon the second reading. It would be like saying that the House having in 1860 voted that white was white, it was in 1861 to vote that it was black. The Bill was referred to a Committee upstairs, upon which there were five hon. Members who were large employers of labour—namely, the present Lord Mayor of London (Alderman Cubitt), the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir M. Peto), the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), the hon. Member for Coventry (Sir J. Paxton), and the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Fox), and that Committee came unanimously to the following Report:—

“From the evidence taken before them, in which both masters and operatives were examined, and also, after referring to the evidence taken before the Committee appointed in 1856, your Committee have come to the unanimous opinion, that the voluntary formation of equitable Councils of Conciliation would tend to promote a more friendly understanding between the employers and employed, to soften any irritation that might arise, and in most cases to prevent the growth of such a spirit of antagonism as too often leads to a strike. Your Committee concur in the opinion expressed in the Report of 1856, that ‘From the evidence before them they cannot but arrive at the conclusion that the formation of Courts of Conciliation in the country, more especially in manufacturing, commercial, and mining districts, would be beneficial; that by these means both the masters and operatives would be enabled each from their own class or calling to appoint referees, an equal number by each party, having the power to elect a chairman.’ Your Committee have considered the Bill which has been referred to them by the House, and are unanimously of opinion, that if the Bill passes into a law it will promote the welfare and good understanding between masters and operatives, and be advantageous to the country. Your Committee, in conclusion, add, that there is nothing in the Bill that gives power to any Council to regulate the rate of wages in any prospective manner whatever.”

After such a Report it surely was not enough for the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to say, Sic volo, sic jubeo, est pro ratione voluntas, and, without stating a single argument against the principle of the Bill, to ask the House to reject it on the second reading. The hon. and learned Solicitor General showed by his speech against the Bill that he did not understand the question. He had opposed the measure on the ground that the existing Act, the 4 Geo. IV., c. 96, was sufficient; but he seemed to have forgotten, or to have been ignorant, that, owing to the objection of the operatives to the appointment of the arbitrators by the magistrates, that Act was perfectly inoperative. The object of the Bill was to soften the feeling between masters and operatives, and so prevent strikes. He was recently informed by a well-informed workman that some workmen opposed the Bill because it would prevent strikes. He asked him how, and the reply was, "If five of our men meet five masters and agree to anything they will come among us and spread such division, that it will be impossible to have a strike." Under these circumstances he hoped that the House would consent to read the Bill a second time.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. SPEAKER do leave the Chair,"

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that he had made various alterations in the Bill, in accordance with what he understood to be the wish of the House on the second reading. He had given the controlling power to the Land Drainage Commissioners, and he had decreased the amount to be charged upon the estate in respect to each cottage to £120, which it appeared to him would be sufficient.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the proposal that the Preamble be postponed,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was unwilling to oppose the progress of the Bill, but he wished to call attention to the fact that there were already several private companies which were entitled by Act of Parliament to make advances for the purpose provided for by the Bill. There was also in existence an Act, 12 & 13 Vict., c. 100, which was well considered, and which enabled private individuals to make advances for the drainage of land under the sanction of the Enclosure Commissioners. He thought if that Act had been extended to labourers' cottages it would have effected all that was required.

Preamble postponed.

Clauses 1 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 8 (Notice of intended application to be given),

MR. HENLEY said, there were other persons besides encumbrancers who might be interested in estates, and he should move the insertion of words requiring that special notice should be given to every person interested in an entail or settlement.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he had no objection to the notice being given, but hardly saw how it was to be accomplished when the parties might be in America, Australia, or other distant parts of the world.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think it fair that a landlord who had been unwilling to spend his money on the improvement of cottages on his estate should have the power after his death of charging his successors. It reminded him of the course pursued by persons who used to be called "generous churchwardens."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the provisions of the public Act with regard to advances were incorporated in the private measure. Persons having a charge upon an estate in the end were thereby empowered to signify their dissent within two months, and in case they did so the certificate of the Commissioners was not to issue.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not want to carry his objection to the extent of stopping improvements. He was only anxious that some proper notice should be given.

MR. G. HARDY said, he thought the object in view would be best accomplished by the insertion of these words—"And notices shall be given to mortgagees and all parties interested, in such form and mode as the Commissioners shall require."

Words added.

Clause 9 (Application to Inclosure Commissioners by Landowner intending to build, &c., Cottage),

MR. HENLEY said, he thought a question might arise, how far the powers given to remove existing buildings were to be construed so as to protect the owner of the reversion against the consequences of waste. The power in the clause seemed to be unlimited; but it would be a very great sweep of legal alteration if a proprietor were allowed to pull down all the buildings on his estate, to drive out the population, and to lay down all the land in grass. He thought that the words "add to, on-large, or otherwise improve," ought to be struck out of the clause.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he felt some difficulty with regard to the words "enlarge or otherwise improve." If the operation of the clause were not confined to building or rebuilding, it might be extended in practice so as to include ornamental works, with the expense of which it could never have been intended that the remainder man should be saddled.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK explained that the intention was to give the power of surrounding dwellings with the comforts and decencies of life, such as drainage, &c., without which building operations would be comparatively of little value. He would not object to the omission of the words "enlarging or otherwise improving," but he trusted they would allow him to retain the words, "add to."

MR. SLANEY said, it was often desirable to add a sleeping room to a cottage which did not need alteration in any other respect.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS remarked that additions such as those contemplated might be conducive to the health and morality of the inmates, but he did not think the charges which they would entail ought fairly to be placed upon the inheritance.

MR. HEYGATE said, he hoped the words would be retained. The great object of the Bill was to enable landlords to improve the present class of cottages.

MR. EVANS said, the question was not confined to a single cottage. It often happened that several were built at the same time, and were deficient in the same points. The enlargement or improvement of all might be a serious matter, where in the individual instance the cost would be trifling.

MR. WALTER said, he altogether objected to the retention of the words alluded to. The object of the Bill was to facilitate further improvements in the building of cottages, both for the sake of the labourer and the landowner; but it ought not to be allowed to shift from the tenant in possession to the tenant in tail the duty of making small improvements. His experience of cottage-building—a subject in which he took much interest—led him to believe that the retention of those words would do great mischief, as they would tempt landlords to make additions to bad cottages, which ought rather to be pulled down and rebuilt. As he was not in favour of giving facilities for tinkering up bad cottages, he would suggest that the words "add to" be struck out of the clause. The same objection applied to the power to "enlarge and improve" cottages, the words being of such an extensive character, as to include making drains, putting down a wooden floor, or almost any improvement which could be conceived.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend who had last spoken that the enlargement of a cottage might not be a permanent improvement. In the north of England the stone cottages, which were very substantially built, frequently had a storey added to them. He thought it would be better to retain the words.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL referred to the improvement which was capable of being effected by putting down plugs, so as to make one well answer for four or five cottages.

MR. HENLEY said, the maximum amount to be spent on any cottage was fixed at £120, and it consequently became necessary to specify the minimum amount. But the cost of some of those enlargements and additions would be absurdly small, and, therefore, it would be better to exclude them from the Bill.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he also objected to the words, which might tempt landlords to incur foolish expenses. His experience of cottages was that the walls were usually proportioned to their height, and would not be capable of bearing up an additional storey.

In reply to the CHAIRMAN,

MR. WALTER said, it was not his intention to press the Amendment which he had proposed.

The words "add to" were accordingly retained. The words "enlarge or improve" were struck out.

MR. HENLEY contended that the "particulars" of the intended improvements required to be furnished to the Commissioners were not sufficiently explicit, and suggested that the words "plans and specifications" should be added.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he had no objection to the proposed alteration, but he by no means anticipated that the Commissioners would be satisfied with any plans and specifications which might be forwarded to them.

Words were accordingly added.

MR. G. HARDY proposed, in lines 26 and 27, to insert these words—"and the Commissioners may require the removal of existing buildings and dwellings, if they consider such removal necessary for purposes of the proposed improvements."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS had considerable doubt whether it would not be better to leave out the words with respect to the removal of cottages. It was possible that cottages might be cleared away and no new ones built.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that it would be well to strike out the words at the end of the clause, which would give owners a power of applying for liberty to demolish cottages, without making them undertake to build others in their place. He did not think the Committee wanted to give a power to demolish cottages. What they wanted was to have them enlarged and improved. He did not believe there was any occasion to give power to pull down cottages, for they came down fast enough. The words "unfit for human habitation," which were proposed to be used in the clause, were very wide, and he was afraid that it would not be difficult to find a great number of houses which might come within such a description. It would be a wrong step in the way of improvement to pull down cottages and allow the occupants to find lodgings in the hedge-sides.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that his object was to enable the Commissioners to sanction the removal of cottages which were unfit for human habitation, in order that better habitations might be erected in their stead. As amended in the manner which he proposed to amend it, the latter part of the clause would stand thus—

"And the Commissioners may require from time to time existing dwellings to be removed if they shall consider such dwellings to be unfit for human habitation, or from any other cause likely to be injurious to life, and shall not sanction the erection of any greater number of dwellings than they shall consider sufficient for the accommodation of the labourers required for the proper cultivation of the estate."

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE thought the words would delegate a very odious task to the Commissioners.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that persons might get a professional order to pull down cottages without building new ones. The power of removal should not be given at all unless on the condition that the whole of the improvements were carried out.

MR. G. HARDY said, he considered the objection of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) to be a serious one, and he would suggest that it would be better for his hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill to strike out the last part of the clause, and bring up a well-considered clause to effect the object which he proposed.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 14 agreed to.

Clause 15 (Inclosure Commissioners to grant Charging Order to Landowner who has obtained Provisional Order),

MR. HENLEY said, he objected to its retrospective or rather retroactive provisions. It provided that where a landlord, not having obtained a provisional order sanctioning a proposed cottage improvement, but having built or rebuilt, added to, enlarged, or otherwise improved any cottage on the land of which he was landowner, desired that the inheritance of the lands proposed to be charged should be charged with the expense of making the improvement, he might, within two years after the completion of the cottage improvement, apply to the Commissioners for a charging order under this Act in respect thereof. Rather than that such a power should be given he would move that the clause be omitted.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not think it was desirable that there should be any retrospective legislation contained in the Bill. One security seemed to him most essential if they passed the measure, and that was that the Commissioners should have the power to see the work was properly executed during its progress. The clause did not provide that security, and he should, therefore, support the Amendment.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he believed that the omission of the clause would go far to render the Bill inoperative. Gentlemen had a great objection to attend at public offices for the purpose of complying with preliminaries in cases where the object to be achieved was a small one. The inheritance would be sufficiently protected by the power of inspection.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he was of opinion that, if the clause passed, several other provisions of the Bill would be useless, for no one would take the trouble of going through the preliminaries which those other clauses provided.

Clause struck out; as were also Clauses 16, 17, 18, and 19.

Clause 20 (Limit of Amount to be Charged),

LORD HENLEY said, that there was a limitation as to the outside sum to be laid out on any one cottage. There might also be a limitation as to the smallest amount to be so expended. He would move that the sum should be "not exceeding £120, or less than £80."

SIR LAWRENCE PALK objected to the Amendment, and thought they might safely leave these matters of detail to the Commissioners.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought the maximum of £120 would in many cases be inadequate, and suggested that it should be £150.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he thought £120 had better be retained just as it stood in the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that such an Amendment as that proposed by the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Griffith) would render the Bill inoperative, because an agricultural labourer would not be able to pay a rent equivalent to the interest on so large an outlay.

MR. JACKSON said, that a good cottage could be constructed for £100.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY believed that a roomy and even handsome cottage might be erected for £95.

Amendment negatived.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Commissioners were to judge to what extent the inheritance of the lands to be charged would be durably benefited by the erection of cottages. He asked how the Commissioners would be able to judge of the pecuniary benefit conferred upon an estate by the erection of such cottages? He questioned whether any direct pecuniary benefit would accrue from their erection.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he wished to explain with reference to the introduction of the words as to an estate being pecuniarily benefited, that they had been introduced on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). If the erection of cottages did not directly benefit an estate it did so indirectly, by improving the condition of the people, morally and physically. It was well known that the cottages built by the late Duke of Bedford at Tavistock had such a result. That was the first experiment made in the country on the subject, and since then the question of labourers' cottages had gradually forced itself on the attention of the community.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the point had been already settled in Clause 10, where an applicant for building was to state to the Commissioners what the estimated increase of the value of the lands was to be. If it was not stated that the lands would be improved, the Commissioners would not grant the application, and, therefore, there was no necessity for the words proposed in Clause 20.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the restriction quite necessary, or otherwise there might be a great charge put upon an estate without any benefit whatever. Clause 10 only laid down what information the applicant was to give to the Commissioners, but that did not render the restriction in Clause 20 unnecessary.

LORD LOVAINE did not see by what standard the pecuniary benefit could be judged.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he would move the omission of the latter part of the clause after the words £120.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE thought it very necessary to make it incumbent that benefit arising from the building of the cottages should be shown.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the clause involved the chief difficulty in the Bill. The principle of the Drainage Act and other Acts of a similar nature was that the pecuniary benefit should be derived by the estate; and that meant benefit to the reversioner as well as the tenant for life. Every one knew that the building of labourers' cottages did not improve the rent of an estate, although it might be indirectly beneficial to an estate, by supplying more labour or improving its quality; but it was necessary to have some tangible standard which a court of equity would recognize; and it was impossible to resort to any better one than the standard of increase to the rental. He, therefore, thought that the words at the end of the clause should remain.

MR. HENLEY said, the Bill for the first time enabled a tenant in fee simple to make a charge on the land which would have priority over other encumbrances. If the power were given without the guard of pecuniary benefit, the Bill would be inoperative.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, if it were the wish of the Committee he would retain the words at the end of the clause, though he thought they would be detrimental to the usefulness of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed; Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

JERSEY COURT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. On moving for leave to bring in the Bill he had stated the objects of the Bill, and the necessity for amending the constitution, practice, and procedure of the Court of the island of Jersey. It would not, therefore, be necessary to detain the House at any great length. For a long period of time great complaints had been made about the delays in the law in Jersey, and three Secretaries of State had granted commissions to inquire into the state of the law and the mode in which it was administered. It was conceded on all hands that nothing could be worse than the administration of the law by the Royal Court of Jersey. That Court was composed of a bailiff who was appointed by the Crown, and paid partly by salary and partly by fees; and of twelve jurats, who were representatives of the several parishes in the island, and elected for life. These jurats not only acted as judges, but sat in the states and made laws for the island. In point of fact, they usurped the whole duties of the Royal Court, because the bailiff never delivered judgment except when the jurats were equally divided, and then he gave a casting vote. The attendance of the jurats was not compulsory, and they attended as they pleased. The consequence was that as all civil cases were adjourned, and as the Court at each adjournment must be constituted as at the first hearing, endless and vexatious delay took place before a case was finally decided. In 1846, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the criminal, as well as the civil laws. The Commissioners reported that the jurats seldom received any legal education, and that the Court, as now constituted, was unfit to administer the law. But the incapacity of the tribunal did not constitute the greatest objection to it. The Commissioners said party feeling found its way into the Court, and that the jurats sometimes had a personal interest in the cases which came before them; and that the result was that the tribunal did not possess the confidence of the inhabitants of Jersey. It was proposed by that Commission that there should be three paid Judges, and that the jurats should cease to exercise their functions in the court. That was in 1846, but nothing having been done to carry out that recommendation, another Commission was appointed by Her Majesty on the address of the House in 1859, to inquire into the municipal laws of the island. That inquiry was conducted by three very able gentlemen, who went into the whole of the laws of the island, and in a very ample and able Report impeached the administration of the laws, and showed, from the evidence even of the jurats themselves, that whatever may have been in ancient times the fitness of the tribunal for its purposes under a wholly different state of society, the island had outgrown its system of judicature, which must be either abolished or reformed. The modes of procedure were simple, but the intolerable delays and vexations were the natural result of having a Judge who was powerless, the actual arbiters numerous, and without legal knowledge, and punctuality precarious. Under these circumstances he, at the commencement of the Session, inquired if the Government intended to bring in a measure on the subject, and finding that they did not he had introduced the present Bill, which was confined to the amendment of the constitution of the Courts and their procedure; and the abolition of arrest on mesne process. It would leave the jurats as they were at present, members of the States, elected in the same way as hitherto. It would not interfere with their election or with their legislative power; but they would cease to administer the law in the Royal Court, and in their stead would be appointed three Judges as proposed by the Commission of 1853. The only difference was that the Commissioners proposed that the Judges should be elected, while his Bill proposed that they should be nominated by the Crown, as the bailiff was under the present system. One cause of the existing evils was the fact that the jurats, being elected, were mixed up with parties and obliged to take part in political matters, which sometimes related to the proceedings going on in the Court. The Bill would also abolish imprisonment for debt, except upon affidavit. Under the present system of arrest on mesne process, a creditor could obtain, on payment of 1s., a writ for the apprehension of the debtor. These documents were signed by the score. To illustrate the existing state of the law he might mention a single case. In 1857 an English gentleman, Mr. Dodd, was apprehended in Jersey, on mesne process for an alleged debt arising out of certain transactions relating to a trust fund in England, and in consequence of the English law relating to trusts not being understood in Jersey, the case was adjourned from time to time, referred to the greffier, decided in favour of the defendant by a Court consisting of a bailiff and two jurats, and then referred to the full Court on an appeal.

All the time the alleged debtor was in prison, and had no means of recovering his liberty, unless he had chosen to pay a sum of £300, which he really did not owe. While he was awaiting the result of the appeal, the creditor, who, according to the law of Jersey, had to pay 5s. a week for the maintenance of the defendant in prison, failed to keep up the payment, whereupon the defendant recovered his liberty in November, 1859, having been incarcerated since January, 1857. The appeal then came on, when the Royal Court decided that he ought never to have been arrested, and that the Jersey Courts had no jurisdiction in his case. Cases of that description could not occur if the proposal of abolishing mesne process without an affidavit was adopted. He might also refer to a case in which a gentleman, seeking to eject from certain property a person who had illegally taken possession of it, was told that he must join with himself in the action all those who had common rights over any portion of the property, and they numbered 800, and were most of them unknown to him; that was impossible, and he was obliged to abandon the cause. He might be met by an opposition emanating from the jurats themselves, setting forth that it would be a grievance if the Imperial Parliament should interfere with the affairs of the island. This representation was not entitled to much weight, because those who signed it had not then seen the measure. His Bill did not propose to tax the island, as the salaries of the Judges would be paid out of the Fee Fund and other sources. He should not have brought forward this Bill if he had not felt convinced that the States had determined not to apply any remedy. Indeed, from the very nature of the case, the reform could not be expected to proceed from the States, because the jurats took the most active and influential part in the proceedings of the States. As to the right of Parliament to legislate for the island, there could be no doubt legislation for Jersey had been going on from all time, and a great number of statutes applicable to the Channel Islands had been passed by Parliament. The question was whether there was not a necessity for the interference of the Legislature in the present case? In his opinion the reform was urgently called for, for the sake not only of the people of Jersey, but of Englishmen who went to reside there, and were injuriously affected by the maladministration of the law; and as there was no hope that the local legislature would do it, Parliament was bound to take it up. But if Her Majesty's Government had any desire to take the matter in their own hands, and thought that it ought not to be carried out by a private Member, he should with great pleasure give way to them. He was not anxious to force the matter, if he could be assured that the matter would be carried out by those who had a better opportunity of doing it successfully.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he regretted that it was not in his power to vote for the second reading. He did not object to the hon. and learned Member having an opportunity of explaining the manner in which the Bill proposed to carry into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, but it did not seem desirable that Parliament should interfere by its legislation in the internal affairs of Jersey, and by an Act of Parliament make a constitutional change in that island except in case of necessity. As the Report of the Commissioners was only brought under the notice of the States of Jersey early in the present year, it did not appear that such a delay had occurred as would justify Parliament in resorting to that extreme measure. No reasonable doubt could exist as to the power of Parliament to legislate for the Channel Islands. The inhabitants of those islands were the subjects of Her Majesty, and he conceived that the universal constitutional rule was that to all subjects of the British Crown, wherever they were in a community as subjects of the British Crown, the supreme power of Parliament extended. That constitutional doctrine, however, appeared not to be admitted universally by the inhabitants of Jersey, by whom it was very generally held that laws affecting the constitution of the island could only be made by the States and the Crown, and that Jersey stood to the Crown of England in the same constitutional relation as Scotland before the Union and as Hanover the while belonging to Kings of England. He did not subscribe to that doctrine, for he entertained no doubt of the abstract power of Parliament to legislate for the Channel Islands, but, at the same time, he admitted that it was not the practice of Parliament to introduce by its own legislation constitutional changes in those islands. The practice was when Parliament passed general statutes affecting the United Kingdom of England, which in their terms included Jersey, that those statutes were directed by Order in Council to be registered in the Royal Court, and then obtained the force of law. Under these circumstances he confessed that he thought it would not be discreet to read the present Bill a second time. The inhabitants of Jersey were a loyal and well-affected community. Their geographical position and their language would rather connect them with France than with the United Kingdom; but, nevertheless, they were firmly attached to their ancient institutions; and though hon. Gentlemen, if they tried those institutions by an ideal standard or by an analogy with English law, might be disposed to condemn them, yet the people of the island, having inherited them from their forefathers, and not finding anything in their working to which they materially objected, viewed them in a different light. In the absence, then, of any strong dissatisfaction among the inhabitants of Jersey he did not think it prudent for Parliament to interfere, and he should, therefore, move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Mr. Serjeant Pigott

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ROLT said, he questioned whether the British Parliament was authorized to legislate for Jersey. He was by no means sure that the people of Jersey were subjects of the Crown of Great Britain as the Sovereign of Great Britain. His recollection of their history was that they formed part of the Dukedom of Normandy. A large portion of that dukedom revolted from the duke, leaving him nothing but the sovereignty of a few places of which these islands formed part. If that was so, then Jersey was only subject to the Kings of Great Britain in their capacity as the Dukes of Normandy. Might was often represented to be right, and he did not say that at some time it would not, perhaps, be necessary to act on that doctrine, but it was a very serious matter, and the question arose whether, in legislating in the way proposed, they were not asserting the right of conquerors, although Jersey was not a conquered country? As the Government suggested that the second reading of the Bill should not be proceeded with, he would not enter into the question further, but whenever the matter was again brought forward he hoped some attempt would be made to show in what way the subjects of the Dukes of Normandy became subjects of the Sovereign of Great Britain. He hoped it would not be inferred that he thought the laws of Jersey to be in a perfect condition, but the constitutional authority ought to alter them, and if it failed to do so, then, if it was thought right that Jersey should be annexed to Great Britain, such a step ought to be taken openly, and after the greatest consideration.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was startled at the position assumed by the hon. and learned Gentleman that Parliament had no authority or right whatever to deal with the Channel Islands, or to legislate for them. At the revolution of 1688 the Channel Islands followed the Act of Settlement, and that was as great an interference as could be exercised under any Act of Parliament. He rather thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman pitched the claims of the inhabitants of the Channel Islands higher than they were disposed to do themselves. The right of Parliament, however, ought to be exercised with the greatest caution and discretion, and the best way of securing a change being effected by the ordinary legislative authority of the Channel Islands was to hold out the prospect of the interference of Parliament, if a strong case of necessity for such interference were established.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the hon. and learned Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) only stated that there was great doubt as to the authority of Parliament to deal with the Channel Islands, but did not give, as represented by the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke, any positive opinion that Parliament had no such power. In any opinion of that sort he, certainly, for one could not have agreed for he believed that it would be found that Parliament had a right to interfere, though probably in a different mode from that now proposed, and by address to the Crown to call for the exercise of the prerogative by means of Orders in Council. There were two classes of people in the Channel Islands—the representatives of the old inhabitants and Englishmen who had gone to reside there, and who took a different view of the customs and institutions of the islands from that entertained by the older inhabitants. That was an additional reason for proceeding with great caution. He thought it desirable not to go on with the present Bill. The best way was to leave the matter in the hands of the responsible advisers of the Crown, and in the meantime the inhabitants of Jersey would have the opportunity of considering the admirable Report of the Commissioners.

MR. HADFIELD said, the right of this House to legislate for the Channel Islands had been so often admitted that an objection to it then was matter of surprise. The right hon. Secretary for the Home Department asserted the right when this Bill was first introduced, and he had that day re-asserted the same opinion. The right hon. Member for Wilts, when he held the same office, two years ago, after full deliberation, and with the advice and approbation of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge, expressed in this House, had satisfied himself that the House had the right to legislate in the matter, and he advised a Royal Commission to be issued to inquire into the laws of Jersey in civil matters, with a view to reform them. In 1846 the right hon. the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, then Home Secretary, had advised to be issued a Royal Commission of Inquiry in matters of criminal law in Jersey. Three Governments of different political parties and principles, supported by both sides of the House, had asserted the right to legislate for Jersey. The right hon. the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in 1846 had sent a letter to Guernsey, expressing an intention to legislate for the Islands. [Sir GEORGE GREY: I did not give an opinion as to the right of Parliament to legislate.] He regretted he did not bring a copy of the letter with him, but he had not been aware of any distinction. No doubt he (Mr. Hadfield) was wrong. Why issue, at great expense to this country, two Commissions of Inquiry if there had been a doubt as to the right to redress existing grievances when ascertained? By this Bill it was intended to reform the Royal Court, and little more. It was impossible to begin the work of reform more mildly. It would assist in future improvement by establishing a sound process of administering justice; and it would constitute a fulcrum on which to proceed with safety in future measures. It imposed no new tax on the people, and that would delight every Jersey-man who loved our laws but disliked our taxes. It made no new laws, except to regulate and control the present law of arrest, which rendered it unsafe for an English trader to visit Jersey. So late as last week an advocate (M. Gibaut) said, in open court—

“If this system of arrest were continued it would be dangerous for English creditors to come over to Jersey and visit their debtors, if they could be put in jail on ex-parte statements.”

He asserted that that “Case was another illustration of a debtor arresting his creditor, because the former wished the latter to give up his goods without receiving cash.”

“No doubt it was a very ingenious way of getting goods and staving off the payment.”

Was this a proper way of treating Her Majesty's subjects in any part of Her Majesty's dominions or dependencies? The statements of grievances arising from this state of things were so numerous that he had despaired of being able to condense the recital of them so as to present them in an acceptable form to the House. Generally, they were admitted, and, therefore, the time had arrived to take some action. After the lapse of fifteen years, he contended, there had been deliberation enough. One or other of two courses was now before the House—either to read the Bill a second time, and thus assert the right of Parliament to legislate, or to let the Government undertake the business for the future, for the benefit of everybody. He insisted the Bill, when passed, would, under any circumstances, be useful, and he was assured it was approved by many of the inhabitants of Jersey as the foundation for future improvement. He cordially supported it, and was confident the late inquiries and reports would entitle the right hon. Members who had been the promoters of them to the thanks of the people of Jersey. He would divide with the learned Serjeant if he went to a division, and hoped he would do so, unless the Government would take in hand the future conduct of the needful legal reforms in the island.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT observed, that if there should be a division he should vote with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. He did not share in the opinion that Parliament was not competent to deal legislatively with Jersey, but such an opinion being held by hon. Gentlemen holding a high legal position, and whose judgment, therefore, was entitled to respect, formed a reason why Parliament should proceed in the matter with great reserve. He thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman had done good by bringing the matter under consideration. The Bill represented very fairly the opinion of the Commissioners as expressed in their very able Report, and the inhabitants of Jersey would understand that a great number of the Members of that House conceived that the laws and constitution of their island required entire remodelling. Unless they effected the necessary reforms themselves, he trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman or the Government would in a future year introduce some measure for reforming the laws of Jersey, and making them more in accordance with personal liberty and fair justice between man and man.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT, in reply, said, the doctrines started by the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire had very much surprised him. There could be no doubt that Parliament had a right to interfere in improving the proceedings of the states of the island, and if he could believe the question at issue was in training for ultimate settlement he should not object to the postponement which had been suggested. He trusted, however, that if no reform took place between that and the next Session in the direction to which the Bill pointed he should be afforded an opportunity of again bringing the subject before the House.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

VOTES FOR DISQUALIFIED CANDIDATES BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BUTT said, he would move the Second Reading of the Bill. It was in accordance with the recommendations of a Committee and the views of the law officers. It provided that a vote given in good faith for a candidate, who had been guilty of bribery, should not be held to have been thrown away, so that under its operation a candidate who had not really obtained a majority of votes in his favour could not be held to be entitled to a seat in that House.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would give his opinion upon the Bill before it passed through another stage. The questions which it proposed to settle were numerous, and had very much perplexed election Committees, and the consequence was that conflicting decisions had been arrived at. If voters were to be disqualified there would be a great inducement to petition against the return of Members. He hoped there would be a distinct declaration as to how the law now stood. If read a second time the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and it ought to be considered in reference to the question of bribery.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed that those most conversant with election law would admit that the rule generally acted upon was that the disqualification to be fatal must be a disqualification founded upon the fact that the public had knowledge that the candidate had been guilty of bribery. As, however, there appeared to be some uncertainty in the law with respect to the validity of these votes, he thought it would be well if the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill. He was, however, of opinion, that its operation should be limited to cases in which the voter could be proved to have willingly and knowingly given his vote in favour of a disqualified candidate.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he thought if they meant to put down bribery they should make the exercise of it as dangerous as possible. The law ought to be clearly and distinctly declared, as at present the decisions in the books of election Committees were strongly opposed to one another.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he was opposed to the present course of proceeding. If they desired to put down bribery, the man who bribed should lose his seat, and the man who did not should have it. That measure was piecemeal legislation, anticipating the other Bill which was before the House, and it ought to be dealt with at once and postponed for a fortnight. He should move an Amendment to that effect.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill introduced by him did not contain any clause on the subject, which he thought it was desirable to have settled. He thought the principle of the Bill was right, and, therefore, he was in favour of reading the Bill a second time. All the objections could be satisfactorily disposed of in Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he objected to the Bill. The 3rd Clause would exempt candidates from all fear of the result of committing bribery; and further time ought to be given to consider such a measure.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE LORD PRESIDENT acquainted the House, That Her Majesty had been pleased to create The Right Honourable Sir Richard Bethell, Knight, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, a Peer of this Realm, by the Title of Baron Westbury; and his Lordship, having retired to robe, was introduced in the usual Manner.

THE TURNER GALLERY.

QUESTION.

LORD ST. LEONARDS rose to ask the President of the Council, Whether any steps had been taken to provide a separate Gallery for Turner's Pictures in connection with the National Gallery, according to the conditions of his Will under which the Nation possesses the Pictures? The Nation under Mr. Turner's will received 324 paintings, and a vast number of water-colour drawings, and the Royal Academy had received £20,000, and both the Nation and the Academy appeared to be under the impression that these gifts were received without any conditions. But the pictures were bequeathed to the Nation on conditions, and the Nation took them subject to every condition imposed by the will. On a former occasion when he drew the attention of the House to this subject, the Government then represented by the noble Marquess opposite (Lord Lansdowne) pledged themselves that the intentions of Mr. Turner should be carried out, and his noble Friend (Lord Derby) after he had succeeded to the head of the Government said that he considered himself bound by the declaration of the preceding Government. The conditions upon which the pictures were received were these. Turner by his will gave two of his pictures to the National Gallery upon the terms that they should be permanently placed between two of Claude's, and as to those two pictures no question arose; the condition had always been performed. He also bequeathed his other pictures to the nation, and by a codicil he desired that a gallery should be erected for them, and that his pictures should form a separate collection, to be called the Turner Gallery. By the second codicil, dated in 1848, he gave his finished pictures, except the two previously mentioned, to the Trustees of the National Gallery provided that a room or rooms should be added to the present National Gallery, to be entitled "The Turner Gallery;" and the Trustees were not to have any power over the pictures unless his wishes were fully carried out by them. By a third codicil, also in 1848, he directed that if the Trustees of the National Gallery should not carry out the provisions of his will within five years then the bequest should be void; and by a fourth codicil, in 1849, he enlarged the term to ten years. He had no hesitation in saying that the Nation received these pictures subject to the legal obligation contained in the codicils. But there were higher obligations—moral obligation and national honour. The pictures were removed from the house in Queen Ann Street for fear of fire and for better preservation; but a question arose between Turner's relations and the Trustees of the National Gallery, and a decree made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley declared that all pictures, drawings, and sketches by Turner, whether finished or unfinished, were to be retained for the benefit of the public. This decree established the title of the Nation, but this title was clearly subject to the conditions of the will. It then became necessary to find a home for the pictures, and they were at first placed in Marlborough House, but subsequently another place was required for their reception, and a home was formed at South Kensington. To this arrangement he (Lord St. Leonards) could not object for a board was affixed to the gates of Marlborough House stating that the removal of the pictures to Kensington was only for a temporary purpose. The galleries in which the pictures were now exhibited were lighted by gas on certain evenings. Gas was well known to be highly explosive and otherwise dangerous, so that even if sufficient precautions had been taken to prevent injury to the paintings from the vapours of gas, still there remained a considerable amount of risk. No nation in the world possessed so large and so valuable a collection of paintings by one artist, and it would be a lasting reproach if those inestimable pictures were lost through any want of care. Mr. Ruskin, who, if no authority upon the subject of gas, must be admitted to be a high authority in art, has written a letter to The Times, exonerating himself from all responsibility for the removal of the pictures to Kensington, and stating his belief that serious injury might be done to the pictures from being exposed to the influence of gas, the works of Turner and Reynolds being peculiarly liable to injury from that cause. Other authorities had expressed the opinion that the use of gas in picture galleries was attended with great risk. After the recent additions to the National Gallery of which he highly approved, he observed with regret that no attempt had been made to perform the undertaking of two successive Governments to which he had before referred. This, therefore, rendered his present inquiry necessary. When Turner had painted a picture which he thought ought to belong to the country no offer of money would induce him to sell it. In the case of the De Talby picture, now in the National Gallery, which had been sold, he bought it back upon Lord de Talby's death at a great price in order to leave it to the Nation. The value of the pictures was enormous, and what now remained to be done was that the Turner Gallery should be annexed to the National Gallery, as part of the possessions of the Nation, and they should be removed from Kensington without delay in order to comply with the conditions upon which the Nation holds them. He had ascertained most satisfactorily that a gallery could now be erected in direct communication with the existing building in Trafalgar Square, and he hoped that no real difficulties would be found to lie in the way of a public grant for the purpose.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that he was quite sure the whole of their Lordships had a high admiration of the genius of Turner as a painter, and that they all appreciated the love of art displayed by the noble and learned Lord who had brought forward this subject. With respect to the will of the deceased artist, and the validity of the Nation's title to these pictures, those were points on which he did not feel himself competent to express an opinion, and which he would, therefore, leave to the proper legal authorities. As to the question of what was to be done with this collection, he must say it was at present placed in a building of a perfectly substantial character, and one admirably adapted for the purposes for which it was intended. It had been found, he believed, as perfect as any gallery in Europe for the display of pictures. Several plans had been suggested for providing accommodation for these pictures, but those plans had not yet been fully inquired into, and it would, therefore, be premature to express an opinion on the subject. Then, with regard to the question of the safety of the collection, he must say he did not agree with the apprehensions that had been expressed on that head. He believed this valuable collection was as safe as any pictures could be; and as to their being exhibited by gaslight, immense advantage resulted from that arrangement. The paintings were thereby showed in a manner in which they had never been seen before, their beauties were well brought out, and open to the inspection of classes of persons who could not visit them except in the evening. In the opinion of Mr. Faraday, Mr. Tindal, and other eminent authorities, not the slightest damage or danger to the pictures need be apprehended from the manner in which the Kensington Museum was lighted. The pictures had all been recently carefully examined, and no injury whatever could be detected. Those from which photographs were taken had been examined only last month, and they were all found entirely free from injury. It was most creditable to the authorities at Kensington Museum that both in winter and summer the ventilation had been of a most perfect character, a good and equable temperature being maintained: and some part of this good result was to be attributed to the assistance of gas in the ventilation. The recommendations of the noble and learned Lord, however, should receive every attention.

LORD OVERSTONE was anxious to say a few words on this subject. Their Lordships would easily understand that the Trustees of the National Gallery felt themselves placed in a somewhat embarrassing situation in consequence of the serious ambiguities which attached to the Turner Trust. He must beg to express his sincere thanks to the noble and learned Lord who had now a second time brought this subject distinctly under the notice of the Government, and he trusted under the serious consideration of their Lordships. He had listened to the statement of the noble and learned Lord with great attention and interest, and he wished that he could say that he had listened to the reply of his noble Friend the President of the Council with more unmixed satisfaction. With regard to the general question of these donations and bequests of pictures made to the country he thought it most important, on various grounds, that the Nation should exhibit the most strict and scrupulous fidelity in carrying out the presumed wishes and intentions of the testators. That was necessary on account of the moral effect which must result from such public example of good faith; and, in a secondary sense, it was of great importance as an encouragement to future collectors and lovers of the fine arts, who, stimulated by such noble examples, might be disposed to follow them, and add to the magnificent collection this country already possesses by donations of a similar character. With regard to the particular question now before their Lordships, he expressed the feeling of the whole country when he said it was impossible to speak of Turner's gift to the Nation in too high terms. It was a noble gift—at once a monument of the high point to which British art has been carried in our day, and of what might be accomplished by one man in whom the great gift of genius was improved and carried out by his own persevering industry and indomitable energy. There was, no doubt, some ambiguity in Mr. Turner's will. He was of a peculiar temperament, and perhaps sensitive in his feelings and wishes as to the mode in which his bequest should be carried out; but, notwithstanding the doubts which had been thrown on the purport of his will, he thought that any one who should faithfully and honourably endeavour to elicit the real wish and intention of the testator would encounter no great difficulty in arriving at it. He entertained not the slightest doubt that the ambition by which Mr. Turner was actuated was to demonstrate to the British nation that his works had a right to be brought into immediate contact, comparison, and competition, not merely with the highest productions of his own fellow-countrymen and age, but with the great works of the old and established masters. That this was his principle and wish might be inferred from the fact that the two pictures alluded to by the noble and learned Lord now hanging in the National Gallery had been bequeathed distinctly on the condition that they should be hung between the two great pictures by Claude, so that their merits might be put to the severest test by the comparison. Would any man say this was not a noble aspiration? had England any ground to be dissatisfied with the competitive examination, as he might term it, that Turner had instituted? It was an honorable rivalry and might it not be confidently said that to whomsoever the first prize should be awarded the second place might be held without discredit? Having so disposed of these two pictures, and coming to deal with that larger collection of works of art which had proceeded from his single hand, how did Mr. Turner proceed? Amid all ambiguities it was quite clear that he intended these pictures to be given to the Nation, and to be received as a solemn trust; that they should be placed in a gallery by themselves—a gallery to be distinguished and known by his own name, and that the gallery so erected should be in immediate contact with the great National Gallery—still looking to a comparison of his works with the collected works of art in the country. It was for their Lordships and for his noble Friend the President of the Council, who spoke on behalf of the country, to consider whether the present apartments at Kensington did really carry out the intentions of the donor. It seemed that this collection of Turner's works had been placed side by side with that given to the country by Mr. Sheepshanks. There was this difference, however, between the two donations. Mr. Sheepshanks, who was no artist himself, had formed a miscellaneous collection of pictures, the productions of artists of the present time, and his magnificent gift was expressly stated to be for the purpose of affording facilities of study to students of art, and with this view it was not to be placed in the hands of any body of trustees but to remain under the control and responsibility of a Minister of the Crown. It was to be specially placed on the site at Kensington, purchased in 1851, and where a School of Art was established. By the arrangements now existing the noble and honourable purpose of Mr. Sheepshanks was fully and faithfully carried out. The gallery of Mr. Vernon, to all appearance, was under the same regulations as that of Mr. Sheepshanks. But the views and di-reactions of Mr. Turner were the opposite of all this. The gallery was to be marked by his own name, and no allusion was made by him to schools of art or purposes of study in juxtaposition to the National Gallery for the purpose of direct comparison with the great works of art there assembled was the one predominant feeling and wish indicated in Turner's will. Indeed, he would say that, in proportion as the existing arrangements did full and faithful justice to the terms of the Sheepshanks' donation they failed to do justice to those of Mr. Turner. He believed that if Mr. Turner could have foreseen the present state of things he would have reverted to one of his earlier codicils and would have ordered his pictures to be sold, the proceeds to be placed, perhaps, at the command of the Royal Academy, or some analogous institution. He trusted, however, that the Government would recognize the obligation to carry out the obvious meaning of the will, and that the time was not far distant when the pictures would be placed in a gallery of their own attached to the National Gallery. The question was one which concerned the public honour and good faith and the encouragement of future donors, and he hoped that some arrangement different from that which now exists, and more consonant with the conditions under which the bequest was accepted by the Nation would before long be adopted.

LORD MONTEAGLE was glad to hear from the Lord President of the Council that the Turner pictures were never so well seen as at present. He was afraid, however, that they ran considerable risk of being destroyed. For his own part, he entertained the greatest apprehensions whenever there was an exhibition by night, and he doubted whether private individuals would expose their collections to the same danger.

THE EARL OF ELLESMERE said, he was not, from the experience of his own pictures, of opinion that gas was either so dangerous or deleterious as had been represented. Some danger there might be, but not more than could be easily guarded against.

THE PEERS' ROBING ROOM.

LORD REDESDALE rose to move the Appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the Progress made in the Wall Paintings of the Peers' Robing Room, and to report when the Room will be ready for Occupation; or in what Manner, if the Paintings are not likely to be completed shortly, the Room may be rendered available for the Use of the House during the Sitting of Parliament. He found from a Report presented to the other House of Parliament that so little progress had been made with the paintings in the Robing Room that, unless some pressure were put upon the artist, their Lordships would continue to be deprived of the use of the apartment in question for a long time to come. The first engagement with Mr. Herbert, whom he highly respected for his talent, was made in 1851. There were to be nine paintings in the Robing Room, for which the artist was to receive £9,000. Of that sum £1,000 was paid in 1851. Although the room had been delivered up for considerably more than three years, there was no certainty as to the time when the pictures would be completed. A Committee of the other House had inquired and reported, and he could see no objection to a Committee of this House, which was much more deeply interested, being appointed. He wished it to be distinctly understood that, except a general complaint of the dilatory progress of the artists, he made no imputation upon them. He desired to consult their convenience, but he thought it not impossible to afford some accommodation to their Lordships while the cartoons were being painted. As not one of the nine paintings was completed, it was obvious that the Peers would never have a chance of getting into the room unless some steps were taken to show a desire on their part for its occupation. The noble Lord concluded by moving the appointment of the Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he should be very sorry if the appointment of the Committee should be supposed to reflect in the slightest degree upon the artists. It was not sufficient to pay a just tribute to English artists—it was their Lordships' duty to encourage those men who were most likely to carry the reputation of British art to a very high degree. As far as Mr. Herbert was concerned, he had shown a most laudable disinterestedness by refusing magnificent offers to paint pictures for private persons. It was only in 1858 that Mr. Herbert was placed in possession of the room, and 400 feet of painting had been destroyed by his own hand, because, although others were perfectly satisfied, he was not himself satisfied with the result. He believed that it had cost Mr. Herbert more than £3,000, and he thought this a fact very creditable to him. At the same time, it was quite clear that their Lordships ought not to be put to unreasonable inconvenience, and on that account, as well as for the sake of Mr. Herbert himself, it was desirable to appoint the Committee. Entering into the spirit in which the noble Lord had proposed his Motion he should readily agree to it.

THE CENSUS IN IRELAND. QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If an unrevised Report of the result of the Census in Ireland, similar to that lately furnished for England and Wales, will be presented to the House; and, if so, how soon it may be expected?

MR. CARDWELL said, he had been informed by the Irish Census Commissioners that about the middle of July he would be able to lay a Return on the Table relative to the Census in Ireland. That Return would be a revised one, and would differ from the Census of this country, inasmuch as it would show the religious denominations into which the people were divided.

OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN NAVY. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT VALLETORT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any measures are to be taken, as formerly recommended by Lord Elphinstone, for improving the position of Officers in the Indian Navy, as regarded retirement and allowances; and, if so, what is likely to be the nature of them?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the recommendations of Lord Elphinstone as to the improvement of the Officers of the Indian Navy, together with other questions concerning that Navy, were under the consideration of the Indian Government, and that no decision had as yet been taken regarding them.

CASUAL POOR.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether the authorities of workhouses are not bound by law to admit at all times all persons who apply to them for admission, and, therefore, if, on the application of any person for admission into any workhouse, the portion of that establishment usually allotted to the casual poor should happen to be filled, the person in charge of such establishment is not compelled to find for the applicant accommodation in some other part of the premises, or a free lodging elsewhere, and whether it is lawful for the authorities of workhouses to place persons admitted in a clean condition in the same room with those who are not? He asked the question in consequence of poor persons having been frequently refused admission, and also on account of the bad accommodation provided.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS stated that, according to his apprehension of the law, the officials of workhouses were bound to admit all persons who had an order from the competent authorities, namely, Boards of Guardians, Relieving Officers, and Overseers; in cases of necessity they were bound to admit them even without orders, and if the House was full the Master was bound to refer the applicant to the Relieving Officer, whose duty it was to find relief in other quarters. With reference to putting persons in a clean condition into the same room with persons who were not clean, he had to state that all persons admitted to the workhouses were washed and cleansed before entering them, and were bound to be kept so while there.

CONVICT ESTABLISHMENT IN IRELAND. QUESTION.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether

Captain Crofton has intimated to the Government that, in his opinion, great difficulties will arise in carrying on the business of the Irish Convict Department owing to the reduction that has lately been made in the number of the Directors of the Convict Prisons; and whether Captain Crofton has, in consequence, announced his intention of retiring from the Service?

MR. CARDWELL said, that, on the occurrence of a recent vacancy it was thought right to ascertain by experience whether it was necessary to fill it up or not, and the Government intimated their intention to that effect. It was true that Captain Crofton had expressed himself to the Irish Government in the manner stated in the question of his noble Friend. A temporary arrangement had been made by which the local inspector of the department would be relieved from a part of his duties by a removal of a portion of the convicts to another place. He could assure his noble Friend that while the Government were anxious to make the most economical arrangements, they had no intention to interfere with the efficiency of the convict department. It was not true that Captain Crofton had resigned; but he had intimated an apprehension that he might be compelled to resign on account of the state of his health. He trusted that necessity would not arise, and that Captain Crofton would continue, as heretofore, to discharge his duties in connection with the Convict Department.

AFFAIRS OF NEW GRANADA.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government recognize a Notification issued by Senor Martin, Minister Plenipotentiary to this Court from the Granadian Confederation, better known as the Republic of New Granada, which announces a blockade of the Ports of Rio Hache, Santa Martha, Savanilla, Carthagena, and Zapote; and what Government does Her Majesty's Government recognize in the so-called Granadian Confederation?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the question was one of great importance. The Government of New Granada had announced, not a blockade, but that certain ports of New Granada were to be closed. Now, the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, after taking legal advice upon the question, was that it was perfectly competent to a Government of a country in a state of tranquillity to say which ports should be open to trade and which should be closed. But in the event of insurrection or civil war in that country it was not competent for its Government to close ports which were de facto in the hands of the insurgents; and that such a proceeding would be an invasion of the international law relating to blockade. Admiral Milne, acting under the advice of Her Majesty's Government, had ordered the commanders of Her Majesty's ships not to recognize the closing of those ports. He would answer the other portion of the hon. Gentleman's inquiry upon another day.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

EXPLANATION.

MR. LOWE said, that, in answering a question put the other evening relative to the South Kensington Museum by the noble Lord the Member for Herefordshire (Lord W. Graham), he had quoted what he believed to be a paragraph from the Report of the Committee of last Session. Since then the noble Lord had put a notice on the paper that he would ask—

“Whether he (Mr. Lowe) is aware that the paragraph which he quoted as from the Report of the Committee on the South Kensington Museum with respect to Captain Fowke's Plan was taken from the Draft Report drawn up by himself, which paragraph was considerably altered, curtailed, and amended in the Report adopted by the Committee.”

It was only after seeing that notice he was made aware that he had committed an error, and that he had read a paragraph from a Draft Report instead of from the Report adopted by the Committee. The paragraphs began in the same way, and he was thus led into the error, for which he would now beg to apologize. He would now read the paragraph which he intended to have read before. They were substantially to the same effect, the only difference being the omission by the Committee of some words laudatory of Captain Fowke's plan. The paragraph he meant to read was—

“Your Committee are by no means anxious to involve the revenue in large expenses for mere ornament. The Museum is yet in course of formation, and they think it unwise to commit the country to a heavy expense in anticipation of its wants. The Committee recommend that any plan which may be adopted for the buildings to be erected should be capable of being worked into a general plan which would at once fully occupy the ground, and be susceptible of a proper amount of decoration. Such a plan has been laid before the Committee by Captain Fowke.”

THE FIRE IN TOOLEY STREET.
QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he proposes making inquiry into the circumstances attending the commencement of the recent Fire in Tooley Street, with a view of ascertaining whether there was a sufficient supply of water in the mains of the Company supplying the district?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that in consequence of the notice given by his hon. Friend, he had applied to the Commissioners of Police, and the information which had been obtained from the Superintendent of Police who was on the spot at the time of this disastrous fire, was, that there was not a sufficient supply of water when the engines first arrived. He did not think that any additional inquiry was likely to throw further light on the subject.

OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN NAVY.
QUESTION.

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, In what position Officers of the Indian Navy will in future be placed by the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown?

SIR CHARLES WOOD was understood to say that the position of those Officers had not been altered by the change of Government alluded to.

ADMISSION TO SANDHURST AND WOOLWICH.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER JOHNSTONE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, How many Candidates are on the list for admission to Sandhurst and Woolwich at the present time; also the average number of direct Commissions from each College annually for the last five years?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the number of Candidates for admission to Sandhurst was 164, and for Woolwich 266. The number of Commissions from Sandhurst during the last five years was thirty-four upon the average of each year, and from Woolwich eighty, of which number fifty were to the Artillery and thirty to the Engineers.

THE GREAT EASTERN STEAM SHIP.
QUESTION.

MR. BRISTOW said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, To state the date of the Instructions to the Admiralty Surveyor to inspect and report upon the Great Eastern Steam Vessel, and the date of the Surveyor's Report in consequence of such Instructions; and whether there will be any objection to laying the Report of the Admiralty Surveyor as to the Vessel upon the Table of the House?

Lord CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Admiralty Surveyor was instructed to inspect and report upon the Great Eastern Steam Vessel on the 10th of June, and his survey was dated the 13th of June. It was not usual for similar Reports to be made public for many reasons; but as great interest was felt in this ship he should not offer any objection to the Surveyor's Report being laid upon the Table if the hon. Gentleman moved for it. It would be found to be very satisfactory.

FISHERIES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. GARNETT said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of Fisheries in Ireland have sent in their Report for the year 1860; and if not, what is the reason of the delay, and when it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL said, that the Commissioners of Fisheries in Ireland had sent in their Report for the previous year. It was in type, and would very shortly be laid upon the Table. He would endeavour to have it laid before the Select Committee on Monday.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL, &c., BILL.
CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Clause 3 (Composition of the Council of the Governor General of India).

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR moved to leave out the words "there shall be" and insert "it shall be lawful to appoint." The effect of his Amendment would be to make permissive instead of compulsory the appointment of the full number of the Council.

Amendment proposed, in page 2. line 27, to leave out the words "there shall be," and insert the words "it shall be lawful to appoint"—instead thereof—

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question had been already discussed and decided in Committee. Experience had shown that five Members were little enough to carry on the business of the Council.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, that although the present Secretary for India might think five Members necessary his successor might be of a different opinion. Yet as the clause stood he would not have the power of suspending the appointment.

Question put, "That the words 'there shall be' stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 155; Noes 60: Majority 95.

SIR CHARLES WOOD proposed to insert words providing that one Member of the Council should be a barrister of not less than five years' standing.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 37, after the word "two," to insert the words "one of whom shall be a Barrister or a Member of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland of not less than five years' standing."

MR. LAYARD considered that five years' standing was too short a period to entitle a man to be sent to India as a Member of the Council, and moved an Amendment that "ten years," should be inserted instead of "five years."

Amendment proposed to said proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "five," and insert the word "ten," instead thereof—

MR. VANSITTART supported the Amendment. The Judges of County Courts were required to be of seven years standing, and he thought that, compared with their duties, the functions which the legal Member of the Council would be called upon to discharge were very important, and that, therefore, a standing of five years was too brief a qualification.

SIR CHARLES WOOD observed that the proposition he made was in accordance with the practice in respect to legal appointments in India.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that the legal Member of the Governor's Council would have to superintend all the cases brought up from the different Legislatures of the respective Presidencies, and a standing of five years would hardly afford a sufficient security that the person appointed as legal Member was properly conversant with the duties required.

COLONEL SYKES remarked that a barrister of five years' standing might never have held a brief in his life, and yet it was proposed to make him qualified to hold one of the highest offices in the State with a salary of £8,000 a year.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR supported the Amendment.

MR. PULLER stated that a barrister of five years' standing, though without practice in the Courts, might have had a great deal of practice in special pleading; and it would be better to leave it to the responsibility of the Secretary of State for India to select a proper person to fill the office.

MR. WHITE thought it better not to insert either five or ten years' standing, but to leave it to the discretion of the Government to appoint the fittest person.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE concurred in that suggestion. The legal Member of the Council would have peculiar duties to perform, and a practising barrister would not be better qualified than a person whose studies had been in a direction to fit him for the office.

MR. DISRAELI was of opinion that, after all, the best security for the appointment of a person duly qualified for the performance of his duties, under the circumstances of the case, was to be found in the confidence which was to be reposed in the Government for the time being. It was easy to conceive that a man might be found young in years and standing, but very wise in experience, whom it might be desirable to send to India under the operation of the clause under discussion; and the Government, he contended, would be sufficiently controlled in the exercise of their power in making those appointments by the force of public opinion, as expressed in that House. For his own part, he should strongly advise the Government to avoid any definition of time in the clause, and simply confine its wording to the profession to which the proposed Member of the Council should belong.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that the principle of limitation was followed in the case of the Civil Service, and he did not see why an exception to that rule should be made in the present instance. Either the Government ought to be left unfettered altogether, or the provisions of the Bill should be consistent with one another. In restricting the choice of the Government, the only object was to secure that the appointments should be given to the man best legally qualified to fill it, instead of to some mere follower of the Government whom it was desired to provide for. He would support the Amendment.

MR. LAYARD said, if no test of the kind was necessary with regard to legal acquirements, why the restriction of ten years in the case of the civil element of the Council?

MR. MALINS said, the insertion of a five years' standing was intended to secure that the appointee should be possessed of something like legal qualifications. Experience, in such cases as that under consideration, was of as much value as ability; and he thought an experience of ten years was not too much to call for; and, therefore, he should vote for the Amendment, or even for some intermediate period, rather than for the five years, as inserted in the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS thought that a certain amount of fallacy lurked in the word "experience." Suppose, for instance, a barrister happened to have had an experience of five years at Nisi Prius or the Old Bailey, could that fact, he should like to know, be fairly held to qualify him for the position of a Member of the Legislative Council? It was quite clear that for such a position experience was not the quality required—what was required was the qualifications of a jurist. In the case of the Civil Service the experience required was appropriate to the duties to be performed, and what it was desirable to have under the operation of the present clause was a gentleman of high legal attainments, which he contended might be found in a barrister of five years' standing. Indeed, according to the existing law, the Chief Justices of the three Presidencies were only required to be of five years' standing. He might further observe that if the Government were disposed to make an improper appointment, they would have means of doing so by the selection of a barrister who had been ten as well as of one who had been only five years at the Bar. Indeed, it was probable that a larger number of incompetent persons would be found in the former class, which would in all probability comprise a greater number of men who had failed in their profession.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY maintained that the person appointed under the clause should be not only a barrister but a barrister of ten years' standing. If the Government were left unfettered in the matter, it was, he thought, quite possible that the Minister for India might discover more intelligence in a nephew or other relative than in all the rest of Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. LOCKE said, it appeared to him that the choice of the Government was sufficiently fettered by requiring a qualification of five years' standing. All that was wanted was to prove that a man was bonâ fide a barrister, and a qualification of five years would establish that as readily as one of ten years.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Malins

Question put, "That the word 'five' stand part of the said proposed Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 73: Majority 59.

Question, "That the words 'one of whom shall be a Barrister or a Member of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland of not less than five years' standing' be inserted after the word 'two,' in page 2, line 37," put, and agreed to.

Clause 19 (Governor General to make Rules for Conduct of Business at such Meetings),

SIR CHARLES WOOD proposed after the word "meetings" to leave out "and from time to time to alter such rules" and insert "but such rules may be subsequently amended at meetings for the purpose of making laws and regulations, subject to the assent of the Governor General." The object of the alteration was, he said, to place the Council of the Governor General in exactly the same position as the Councils of the Presidencies, in regard to the framing of regulations.

MR. J. B. SMITH thought that the Council should have the power of making their own laws and regulations in the first instance, subject to the approval of the Governor General.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR wished to know whether, under the Amendment, the Council would be able to discuss a Motion to ask the Governor General to amend the rules?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Certainly.

COLONEL SYKES understood that the Governor General was to have the right of veto in regard to the regulations framed by the Council.

Amendment agreed to; other Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup> To-morrow.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read,

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the main object of the Bill was to destroy the exclusive privileges hitherto enjoyed by the Covenanted Civil Servants of India. What was the object of Parliament originally in constituting the covenanted service? It was twofold—first to secure a body of well-educated and efficient public servants in India; and secondly to prevent the patronage of India from falling into the hands of the Crown. There was no doubt that it was admitted by Parliament in former days to be of essential importance to prevent this patronage from falling into the hands of the Crown, because it was supposed that it might lead to political jobbing and Parliamentary corruption. He did not know whether they were less liable to those vices in these days, but there had been a great change in the opinion of Parliament upon this subject, and the great object of Government and Parliament at this day seemed to be to grasp at all the patronage of India, and take the whole of it into the hands of the Crown. Last year a Bill was passed for the purpose of amalgamating the Royal and the Indian armies. In a military point of view that might be a necessary measure, but the result had been that the whole patronage of the Indian army had been placed in the hands of the Crown. He did not mean to say that that patronage was likely to be abused as long as a Royal Prince who was not a political partizan, and who had no object to gain by political jobbing, was at the head of the army: but as regarded the navy, the patronage in that service had been prostituted for political purposes for many years past. If any person entertained any doubt upon the matter, he had only to take up the Navy List, and he would find that nine-tenths of the Admirals, post-captains, and commanders, were members or connections of the great families. ["Oh, oh!"] He ventured to say that was the case. He did not attach blame to any Government, but to the system that prevailed. How would this apply to the present Bill as regarded the Civil Service? When the two Services were originally established by Parliament in India the patronage of the covenanted Service was given to the Court of Directors, and that of the uncovenanted Service to the Governor General, because it was understood that it was to be confined to the Natives of India. But a succession of Governor Generals had in process of time, appropriated the best places in that service to Europeans. The mode in which that was done was that young men were sent out from this country to India, with recommendations to officers in high positions in India or to the Governor General himself, and they were at once appointed into the uncovenanted Service. This Bill proposed to give to the Governor General the power of transferring these young men to the covenanted Service. Now Parliament, in deciding a few years ago that the covenanted Service should be filled only by persons passing a competitive examination in this country, had given those appointments to the public. But if this Bill passed, the effect would be to deprive the young men in this country of the positions which they would have been entitled to, and for which for many years, perhaps, they might be devoting themselves to study in order to qualify themselves. He knew of no mode by which such an abuse could be prevented, unless by introducing a clause to confine the uncovenanted Service to the Natives of India. If such a clause as that were introduced he should offer no further opposition to the Bill.

— MR. ASTELL said, that when the Secretary of State for India introduced these Bills he understood him to state that they had the general concurrence of the Council of India. He believed that that statement was not entirely correct, and he challenged the right hon. Baronet to state honestly and conscientiously whether he believed that, if the Members of the Council of India had an opportunity of recording their opinions upon the Bill now before the House, those observations would be borne out by them. Last year the right hon. Baronet proposed to his Council to bring into Parliament a Bill very similar to this one, but so far from the Council being favourable to the measure it was opposed by the majority of the Council, and was not introduced. Several members of the Indian Council (which it should be remembered consisted of only fifteen members altogether) expressed their dissent from the Bill; among others, Sir John Lawrence, whose name was a tower of strength on Indian affairs. Colonel Durand's dissent was, perhaps, the strongest of all; for he stated that he was only allowed about five minutes to look at the Bill: and the right hon. Gentleman treated the House in much the same way. Instead of having considerable difficulty in getting these minutes of the Council of India, it ought to be a Standing Order that whenever dissents were expressed they should be laid on the Table with the Bill, in order that the House might have an opportunity of giving its decision with all the facts before it. Was the right hon. Gentleman ashamed of consulting the able men who sat at his Council? In the first instance there was a majority against the Bill, no less than eight Members of the Council having opposed it; subsequently some of the Members became reconciled to the measure, though it was in nearly all respects the same. He warned the House against passing this Bill, which he believed to be fraught with injury to the country.

COLONEL SYKES said, the Judges and collectors who were appointed in India to the control of districts larger than German principalities had all passed through a course of elaborate instruction in the college of Haileybury. During the last thirty or forty years men of very eminent abilities had been produced under that system, the tests to which they were subjected being of a very severe character. But under this Bill he could not perceive any guarantee that the persons to be appointed would continue to be men of equal acquirements, or even to possess a liberal education. The second clause empowered the Governor General to appoint any one who had merely been seven years in India and could pass an examination in the languages. But a residence of seven years, and a knowledge of the languages, did not constitute the qualifications that would enable a man to perform the functions of a Judge and collector; the first must have a good knowledge of Hindoo and Mahomedan law, and the second have a practical knowledge of revenue systems, and both must be well read in the acts and regulations of the Government. It was true that the appointment was subject to the approval of the Home Government; but when was it likely that the Home Council would reverse a selection made by the Governor General? The Bill also affected the rights of a class of qualified Natives of India, who for twenty-five years had administered the civil law. The principal Sudder Ameens, the Sudder Ameens, and the Moonsiffs, underwent a rigid examination before they were appointed to their respective offices, and he (Colonel Sykes) could state from digests which he had published from official Returns of the administration of civil justice for twelve successive years in the three governments of India that these functionaries had decided 97 to 99 per cent out of every 100 cases with few appeals. Of the first class there were 64, of the second 81, and of the third—corresponding to the Judges of our small-cause courts—there were 493. These were Native gentlemen who had qualified themselves to administer the civil law in India, and their decisions gave universal satisfaction. What he feared was that the places of these men would be sought by English barristers of five years' standing, who would be glad to take them with the prospect of being afterwards promoted to judgeships. His right hon. Friend must be aware that the substitutions of English barristers for Native Judges must be at an enormously increased cost. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would take steps to provide that whoever was appointed should be subjected to the same intellectual and practical tests which had hitherto been adopted. The Indian Government had the merit of precedence over the English Government in having been the first to establish county courts, also to impose a test of the capabilities of pleaders, and in fixing the maximum cost of suits.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that one point in regard to this Bill seemed to have been overlooked. When Parliament took upon itself the government of India, it declared that all the contracts and liabilities entered into by the East India Company should be binding on the Crown. Now, it was a matter of great doubt among the Civil Servants of the late East India Company how far this Bill, if it became law, would affect them in respect to their Civil Service fund and their Annuity fund. These funds were maintained half by support from the State, and half by a percentage from the salaries. It was clear that if the number of covenanted Civil Servants was limited a blow was struck at the very root of these funds. He, therefore, wished to have from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) a clear statement of how he proposed to treat this question? Parliament was pledged to support the funds, and it ought to take care that neither the servants nor their wives and families suffered from the passing of the Bill.

MR. ADAM said, that the more he considered the subject the more he deprecated the course which Parliament was pursuing in regard to legislation for India. He thought it a great misfortune that the direct government of our Eastern Empire had been transferred to the Crown; and also that Parliament should have excluded from its benches Members of the Council. It seemed to him that in doing so it had, as it were, knocked out its own brains as regarded Indian legislation. But if it was not to have the assistance of gentlemen in this country—of gentlemen who had experience in Indian legislation and Indian affairs—it appeared to him most important that the House should be supplied with all the information that could be furnished it, and amongst these he considered the dissents of the Council held an important place. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted a very valuable saying of Mountstuart Elphinstone, namely, that legislation for India should be slow, gradual, and well considered. But would any hon. Gentleman say that those epithets could be applied to the Bill before the House?

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR submitted that hon. Members had not yet had time to read the papers which had been distributed to them, and the attentive perusal of which was necessary before they proceeded to the details of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman might tell them that they had notice of the measure last Session; but the House would remember that several eminent authorities had expressed their dissent to the Bill of last year. It was now stated that Colonel Durand and Mr. Mills had modified their dissent in favour of this Bill; but had Mr. M'Naghten, Mr. Mangles, Sir John Lawrence, and Sir Henry Montgomery done so? If that had been the case the fact would certainly have been stated. He asked whether it was right that so little weight should be given to the opinion of Members in Council for India? He had said on a previous occasion, and the more he considered the subject the more he felt that unless important Amendments were made in this Bill great reluctance would be shown on the part of candidates to enter into competition for the Indian Civil Service, and such was evidently the view of those members of Council, whose disputes to the Bill, of which the right hon. Gentleman had given notice last year, were now before the House. A deputation had lately waited on the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood), when, he was told, an address was made by Mr. Anderson, one of the Civil Servants, in which the claims of the Civil Service were set forth with an ability and a moderation which excited the highest praise on the part of all who heard him. The right hon. Gentleman himself was struck with the manner in which he laid the claims of the Civil Service before him; but, nevertheless, the Amendments which it was proposed to introduce into the Bill were not such as those claims required.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that there was not a sufficient number of competitors for the Civil Service; but the Returns showed that in 1857, when there were 12 places to dispose of, there were 60 competitors; in 1858, with 20 places, there were 62 competitors; in 1859, with 40 places, there were 119 competitors; and 1860, with 80 places, there were 154 competitors. If the Government had offered more places there would undoubtedly have been more competitors; but they had offered few places and then said the number of candidates were so few that the Civil Service must be thrown open. He believed that a Bill more precipitately introduced and more in opposition to the opinions of those who were best qualified to give an opinion upon it never had been introduced into Parliament. All the wisest and most judicious persons acquainted with India were against the opening of the Civil Service in the way proposed. Any calamity that in future might fall upon India through the operation of this Bill would be attributable to the right hon. Gentleman. It appeared from the Friend of India that already two gentlemen had been appointed to the Civil Service who were unacquainted with the Native languages. Was that a matter of slight importance? If they wished to rule India in a right manner those only should be appointed who knew something of the language, habits, and even prejudices of the people.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in order to a proper consideration of this important measure, all the information possessed by the Government on the subject should be laid before the House. There was no question that the "Dissents" were of the utmost importance; and the House ought to know to what points of the Bill the "Dissents" objected. It was also most desirable to ascertain whether Sir John Lawrence was or was not favourable to this measure.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought, as there was no Amendment before the House, it might be presumed that the principle of the Bill was approved, provided such restrictions were introduced as would prevent the abuse of the new system. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that very stringent restrictions were necessary; but the House ought to be in possession of the opinion of the Council of India on the subject before it could decide what these restrictions ought to be. When the Council was originally established it was clearly intended that the Members should have the power of placing their opinions on record, and it never was contemplated that such petty forms should be established as would prevent them expressing their opinions. The papers which had been laid before the House referred to the Bill of last year. He had placed on the table a short time ago a Motion for an Address for copies of any minutes of dissent by the Indian Council on this Bill; but the Secretary of State had informed him that there were no such papers. He should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether that was the case now? He warned the House not to allow it to be established as a practice that the House should not be put in possession of the opinion of the Members of the Council, or that those opinions should not be placed on record and produced for some small technical reason which had never been contemplated when the Council was established. If such knowledge was kept back, the House was not in possession of all the information it ought to have, and which might materially influence its decision.

MR. AYRTON wished to call the attention of the House to the view which had been taken by the hon. Baronet who had just spoken. He did not think that view at all to the advantage of the Council. Nothing would so soon conduce to the entire dissolution of the Council as to impress them with the idea that they were constituted for the purpose of supervising the relations between the Secretary of State and the House of Commons. The object for which the Council was established was that it should intervene between the Secretary of State and the Government of India. Every one felt that it would not be wise to allow a Secretary of State to send out despatches to the Government of India without the intervention of some independent body, and the Council was established as a check upon any ill-advised or indiscreet proceeding of the Secretary of State. It was perfectly clear, in a constitutional point of view, that the Secretary of State, when he desired to invite the House of Commons to legislate, had nothing to do with the Council. He might ask their opinion, just as he might ask anybody else's, and he might, if he liked, lay it on the table; but it would only be the opinion of so many individuals. Legislation was not one of the functions vested in the Council by law; and to encourage an impression in the Council that they were to intervene in the conduct of business in Parliament, having been specifically excluded from the House of Commons, would be to lead to their certain dissolution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was in the habit of frequently consulting the Board of Inland Revenue, but if that Board took to minuting the acts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer they would very soon have to be dismissed. If the House of Commons felt itself incompetent to go on with this Bill and wished to have the opinion of the Council upon it, the Parliamentary way of obtaining it was to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and then call the members of the Council before it as witnesses. But the fact was the House did not want to know what their opinion was, because it did not intend to shift to its own shoulders the responsibility of the Minister of the Crown. It was utterly in vain to attempt to induce the House to undertake the detailed arrangement of the Civil Service in India. It relied on the Minister to do that, and on him the responsibility would ultimately rest. At the same time it was of the utmost importance to inspire the Civil Servants in India with confidence in Her Majesty's Government—they ought to feel that when abroad they were supervised and protected by the Home Government. He hoped, therefore, that the House would go into Committee, and that such modifications would be made in the Bill as would dispel the alarm which had been raised.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE, in reference to the Minutes of the Council of India, said that he had a perfect recollection of what took place when the matter was formerly discussed, and he understood they were to be laid before the House if required. It appeared that important papers connected with the Bill were not laid before the Council for them to deliberate upon, and, therefore, it was the more necessary that the House should be fully informed of all that had taken place in the Council; and if the House felt a real sense of the importance of this subject they would insist upon the production of these papers before they proceeded further. He confessed he felt great alarm at the haste with which the House was asked to make vital changes in the administration of India.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) in his theory of the duties of the Council, which was established, in his opinion, not only generally to advise the Secretary of State on all matters relating to the good government of India, but particularly in regard to Bills like the present, which most materially related to the administration of affairs in that country. It was the duty of the Council to give their opinion on these matters, and that opinion ought to be laid before the House. No doubt, Parliament had a right to call for the Minutes made by the Council, and then, if anything important and requiring further explanation should appear in those Minutes, the House had a right to call the Members of the Council before a Select Committee. If the Members of the Council had changed their opinion, why was not a short memorandum signed by them, stating that they no longer entertained the same objections as heretofore to the Bill? No doubt, there was a majority in favour of the Bill as it now stood; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman would have better consulted the interests of Indian legislation if he had laid the "Dissents" before the House. It was assumed that this Bill was brought in solely on the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood); but the measure had been in the contemplation of the Government for many years past. He regretted that the Secretary of State had not fortified himself with the opinions of Lord Dalhousie and Lord Canning, of Mr. Halliday, and Sir George Clerk, all of whom recognized the necessity for this Bill. It was for the interest of India that the Civil Servants should be kept at the lowest number possible. He agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) that when any alteration was about to be made in the position of the Civil Servants they had a right to ask the Government what was to be their position in future. He thought that when an alteration of this sort was made the Civil Servants had a just right to ask the Secretary of State in what position they would be placed if certain contingencies happened which might happen under this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman ought to go further. The funds were now in a flourishing position, and it would be better for the Government at once to make some arrangement respecting them. If a large number of persons now came into the service this fund must necessarily deteriorate, and the Civil Servants, on the other hand, would have acted wisely in offering to give up some of the extra interest at present paid on account of the fund, on condition that the Government gave them some security in the event of their suffering injury from the provisions of the Bill.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State to the subject of the duties of the Council. He believed that the House was induced to decide that the Members of the Indian Council should not have seats in the House of Commons upon the understanding that they were to have full information given as to the subject matters discussed by the Council. The Council were to minute their opinions, and he distinctly understood that hon. Members would have a right to move for all the Minutes, in order that the House might be fully informed of the merits of every case discussed. He believed, however, that there were many Minutes on the subject of this Bill which had not been produced, and it was treating the House unfairly to keep them back. He was not surprised at the apprehensions entertained by the Civil Servants; but he did not share in those apprehensions, for their own ability and knowledge would secure them against injustice. He thought, however, that the right hon. Baronet ought to give some assurance on the subject.

SIR CHARLES WOOD was in hopes that when the House had agreed, without a division, to the principle of the Bill, they would have been spared discussion on this stage, especially as many topics had been touched on which were not very relevant to the subject matter of the measure. It was satisfactory, at all events, to find that the Bill had been treated throughout in no party spirit. It was the intention of the noble Lord who preceded him in office (Lord Stanley) to have introduced a similar measure, and the noble Lord had stated in the fairest manner that he felt as much responsible for it as he (Sir Charles Wood) was, and would give it the most cordial support. There could be no better proof of the absence of all party spirit. With regard to the Council of India, he thought the question which had been raised respecting the functions of that body had been settled last Session. The Council were to be the advisers, and in some cases a check, upon the Secretary of State in his executive capacity. But the Secretary of State was not bound to be guided by their opinions, or even to take their advice, in his legislative capacity. The Secretary of State for India was as unfettered and as free as the President of the Board of Control had ever been. The President of the Board of Control introduced Bills at his discretion, consulting the Board of Directors only when he chose to do so; and it was certainly never the intention of the Legislature to impose upon the Secretary of State fetters which were not imposed upon the President of the Board of Control. This question was raised when the amalgamation of the two armies was discussed. He then stated in the clearest terms this doctrine respecting the functions of the Indian Council; and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) entirely concurred in his views on this point. The words of the Act itself were conclusive, and clearly established that what he, as a Member of the Government, might do in introducing a Bill was not a question for the decision of the Council of India. As to the opinions of the Council on this Bill he had stated before that he introduced it with the general concurrence of the members of the Council. It was not true that it had been framed with the object of benefiting a member of the Council, but after the Bill had been agreed upon a case arose unexpectedly, which showed the great advantage to be derived from its provisions, which would authorize the appointment to a most important office of a man who was a member of the Council, but who, above all others, was the most fitted for it. The Minutes referred to by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) were recorded against the Bill of last year, and some of the Members of the Council objected to their being produced against the Bill of this year; but they did not object to the production of them with the memoranda appended to them as they appeared on the paper. He had been asked why he had not fortified himself with regard to this measure by the opinions of men of authority on Indian questions. His reply was that he had done so, and had on a former occasion referred to the recorded opinions of such men as Lord Auckland, Lord Hardinge, Lord Elphinstone, Lord Dalhousie, and Lord Canning. The fact was this—the persons who were in authority in India, and had the responsibility of making appointments, felt the necessity of some such provisions as those of this Bill being enacted, that they might find proper persons to fill those offices, or, to use a common phrase, to put the right man in the right place. It was, therefore, not without the authority of the Civil Service itself that he had introduced a Bill of this kind. With reference to the funds of the Civil Service of India, he had received some representations from it. A deputation of the Civil Service had waited on him, and stated the case very fairly. But they felt themselves that it would be impossible to include in this Bill any provision that would ensure the object they sought; but they wished him to state distinctly in the House what his opinion was on the subject. This he had not the least reluctance to do. His opinion was that they were not likely to be injured by any possible application of the provisions of the Bill, the object of which was, as he had before stated, to provide for special and exceptional cases. He could not, however, deny that there was a possibility, very slight though it was, of their being injured in their funds by the provisions of the Bill; but he had expressed to them the opinion which he had promised to repeat in the House, that if it should turn out that the existing members of the Civil Service were injured in respect of their funds, either for themselves or their families, by any use or abuse of the powers conferred by the Bill, they would have a fair right to claim compensation. This, they said, was all they could fairly ask, and they would be perfectly satisfied if he clearly stated this in the House. He had not the slightest objection to give them the full benefit of the statement. If the existing members of the Civil Service could show that they sustained any injury from the use or abuse of the powers of this Bill they would have a fair right to be indemnified for any loss.

MR. VANSITTART said, the members of the Civil Service now in London were not satisfied with this Bill; on the contrary, they objected to it, with or without restrictions. They thought it altogether unnecessary; and felt that it could have but one result—that it would gradually sap and destroy the noble Service to which they belonged. The time for the consideration of the Bill was very short; and the members of the Civil Service had not had any communication with their colleagues in India. It was never supposed that such a Bill would be brought in this Session. In March last there was no intention of doing so; but it had been brought forward in an extraordinary manner. Up to last night it stood as the third of the Indian Bills on the paper; and, the present discussion not being expected to come on till a late hour that evening, several hon. Members who were prepared to discuss it were not then present. For the satisfaction of the Civil Service they had only the right hon. Gentleman's ipse dixit—no doubt a just one; but they could not tell how long he would be in office, and they would like something equivalent to the statement to be inserted in the measure.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Certain Appointments not in accordance with the Provisions of 33 Geo. III., c. 52, s. 57, and like Appointments hereafter to the same Offices to be valid).

MR. VANSITTART rose to move, as an Amendment, the omission of the word "heretofore," in line 11, and the insertion, after "made," of the words "before the commencement of the present Session." In moving the insertion of those words he begged to draw attention to the wording of this clause. It was notorious that within the last six months the Indian Government, under a strong pressure brought to bear upon it by the press of Calcutta, had gone much further in appointing persons out of the service to high civil offices than they had heretofore done. He referred, more especially, to the creation of a number of Small Cause Courts in the Mofussil, and to the appointment to them of barristers on high salaries. These barristers were gentlemen who had only been resident for a year or two in the country, and were wholly ignorant of the languages—in fact, so ignorant as to require the aid of interpreters; yet under the wording of Clause 1 these appointments would be made effectual and valid. Now, he contended that the restrictions which would be applied to appointments in Clause 2 should also be made applicable to these appointments, or else they would have a number of offices filled in a manner contrary to the deliberate opinion of this House as expressed in Clause 2. Probably few subjects were more investigated and inquired into by the Colonization Committee, on which he had the honour to serve, than that of these Small Cause Courts. By the evidence of one set of witnesses, consisting of lawyers, barristers, and pleaders practising at the Sudder Courts of the different Presidency towns, it appeared that the one thing needed for the general improvement of India was "more lawyers." On the other hand, it was strongly contended by witnesses who possessed great practical knowledge of the habits and customs of the Natives and the country—namely, planters, merchants, civilians, and military men holding high civil and political appointments—that if there was one thing more calculated to add to the unpopularity of our Government it would be the introduction of English law to be administered in the English language by English barristers in the Mofussil courts. They pointed out the great hardship that would be inflicted on the Natives, plaintiffs, defendants, vakeels, and spectators, were the proceedings to be carried on in English, as they understood merely their own language; and that it would most assuredly be regarded by the Natives throughout India as an act of the grossest injustice, and, to make use of an expression of Mr. Hawkins, one of the witnesses examined before the Committee, "as a badge of conquest," designed to degrade them. He could remember when it was deemed expedient to abolish the Persian language in those courts, in order to introduce the vernacular languages—that is, Hindustani and Bengali. He would read one or two extracts from answers of witnesses who appeared before the Committee. Mr. Mackenzie, an indigo planter, in regard to the course of legislation which was being pursued, said—

"Since the time of Macaulay's Commission we have had a wholesale manufactory of laws in India. The laws we have introduced one year we have repeated the next. We had the Legislative Council making laws; we had the Sudder Court of Calcutta giving the construction of the law; and in many cases the terms of the law and the construction were quite opposed. I think that the great mistake we make in legislating for India is that we legislate for the people of India after our ideas and the habits and customs of this country, quite forgetting that they are entirely inapplicable to those of the Natives."

Mr. Marshman said—

"The Natives have shown a strong repugnance to any idea of extending the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court."

Lord Macaulay also expressed a strong opinion of the dread among the Natives of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and he spoke from documents and petitions that were presented to the Council. He would not, however, abuse the indulgence of the Committee by quoting any more of the evidence to this effect. It was enough to say that it was generally admitted by the Committee that, although these Small Cause Courts might be popular at Calcutta, yet the feeling was the very reverse as regarded their jurisdiction being extended to the Mofussil. The causes which were decided in Calcutta were generally simple contracts, or questions of sale, or any minor criminal actions, but they were quite different from the complicated cases which occurred in the Mofussil courts with reference to the proprietorship of land, the division of property, the land assessment, the settlement of boundary disputes and resumption laws. Again, it would be impossible to procure the necessary number of experienced barristers at Calcutta; and he could not believe that a young man, practising at the Bar in England and earning £500 a year, would be induced to relinquish that for a life of expatriation in a remote station in Bengal, far away from the civilized world, on a salary of £1,200 or £1,500 a year. It would, therefore, give rise to immense political power and patronage, because the Secretary of State for India would be enabled to oblige an avowed or shaky supporter of the Government of the day by providing any one to whom he was indebted for services rendered at his election with one of these appointments. India would, therefore, be flooded with briefless lawyers, and electioneering agents. A great injustice would, at the same time, be inflicted upon that useful and laborious class of public servants known as Moonsiffs, Sudder Ameens, and Principal Sudder Ameens, who are either Natives or East Indians, as they were being gradually superseded and absorbed by the Small Cause Courts.

Amendment moved to omit the word "heretofore," and to insert after the word "made" the words "before the commencement of the present Session."

COLONEL SYKES said, as it appeared that these Small Cause Courts had been established within the last year, and as there was no security that the persons who had been appointed had any knowledge of Mahomedan or Hindoo law, by which civil causes were determined, he objected to the clause confirming the appointments unless the parties were made subject to examination. And no future appointments should be made without an examination testifying the capacity of the candidates for the duties which would be required of them.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE wished to know whether the object of the clause was to make what had been done the rule for the future? If so, he should object to the clause, though he was not unwilling to give the Government a Bill of indemnity for what had hitherto been done.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the first and second clauses should be kept entirely separate, as they had nothing in the world to do with each other. The other night he stated that up to the present time certain appointments had been made in India with the common consent of everybody in India, not excepting the most rigid sticklers for the rights of the covenanted Service. The noble Lord his predecessor in the office of Secretary for India took the opinion of the then law officers on the subject of these appointments, and, according to that opinion, they were illegal. To remedy this state of things the first part of the first clause rendered all such appointments as had been made legal; and by the second part of the clause similar appointments would be made legal for the future. The second clause had a different object, and enabled the authorities in India, with the consent of the Secretary of State in Council, to appoint in special cases to situations hitherto exclusively reserved for the covenanted Service.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR thought it right to confirm the past appointments; but it became important to know from what date the appointments were to be confirmed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he should not object to meet the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) half-way, and should assent to the insertion of the words "before the 1st of April last," after the word "made," the word "heretofore" being omitted.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause amended, in accordance with Sir Charles Wood's suggestion, and agreed to.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE objected to the clause on the ground that it would empower the Governor General to appoint military men to perform civil duties, not only in the non-regulation, but also in the regulation Provinces. He could understand the existence of such a power in the old Court of Directors; but they were now engaged in providing statutory powers for the Governor General; and they ought to understand clearly what these powers were, or else consent at once to give the Governor General carte blanche. It appeared to him that under the clause the Governor General might appoint a military man to be a Judge in the Sudder Ameen.

MR. LONGFIELD also maintained that the latter portion of the clause went far beyond the exigencies of the case which it had been framed to meet. He could not see, for example, why, because an indemnity was granted for appointments illegally made in the past, a power should be granted, as was proposed by the latter portion of the clause, to make "similar appointments" for the future. He should, under these circumstances, suggest the omission of the latter portion of the clause.

Mr. Vansittart

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it was necessary to use the word "similar," inasmuch as if the word "same" only were employed the clause would not apply to the different appointments of the same character.

MR. LONGFIELD, notwithstanding the high authority of the right hon. Baronet, must maintain that the use of the word "same" would be much safer than that of the word "similar."

SIR HARRY VERNEY saw no necessity for the first clause at all. Nobody objected to or questioned the appointments to which it referred.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the law officers of the Crown had suggested the clause as requisite to render legal appointments which everybody approved.

MR. VANSITTART wished to move the omission of the words "or similar" in the latter part of the clause providing that appointments to "the same or similar offices, places, and employments" to those hitherto filled by uncovenanted servants, contrary to the 33rd of George III., and which were now to be legalized, might hereafter be filled in like manner. Unless his Amendment were adopted, every appointment would come within the scope of such general words as "or similar." Colonel Durand's appointment as Foreign Secretary, and the whole of the secrétariate appointments, would be thrown open by the terms of the clause. He, therefore, moved the omission of these words, in order that there might be no mistake as to the appointments intended for outsiders, and those which were to remain for the Civil Service.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, to leave out the words "or similar."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the hon. Member for Windsor mistook the meaning of this clause. Colonel Durand would be appointed under the next clause to a place reserved for the covenanted Service. The words "or similar" would have this effect:—Take the case of a Sudder Ameen. Nobody objected to a Native or an uncovenanted servant being appointed to such an office; but unless these words were retained it would be impossible to appoint such persons to such situations, except in the identical situations which they had held before.

MR. AYRTON said, that a Sudder Ameen had never been a covenanted civil servant. Certain defined appointments had hitherto been assumed to belong to the covenanted Civil Service; and the system had grown up in this manner. From time to time the old Court of Directors sent out despatches to define what appointments should belong to their civil servants, and those offices had consequently been regarded as employments restricted to that particular Service. But all other appointments had been deemed open appointments, to be held by Natives, military men, or anybody whom the Governor General, or the Governors of Presidencies might select. By omitting the words no injustice or inconvenience would be done to any one, whereas the retention of them would practically be putting an end to the Civil Service.

MR. FINLAY said, he had been in India several years, unconnected with the Government, and could, therefore, form an independent opinion. His experience was that the Civil Service, though a very efficient body of men, were not sufficiently numerous to carry on the duties devolved upon them; it was, therefore, found necessary to appoint officers from regiments to perform those duties, and the object of this Bill was to facilitate such appointments, which were found to be conducive to the good government of India. He thought the omission of the words would place an inconvenient restriction on the Government.

MR. LONGFIELD thought the words so flexible as to include all appointments, and offered no safeguard whatever to the Civil Service.

MR. PULLER objected to the word "similar" as wide and loose, and was not prepared to place the interests of the Civil Servants of India in jeopardy by the introduction of such words. If it was found that an uncovenanted Civil Servant had ever filled the office of Judge, magistrate, or collector, the word "similar" in the clause would permit of such appointments being made in any or all the provinces of India.

MR. AYRTON suggested words to the effect that where a class of offices had heretofore been filled by uncovenanted servants then the same class of offices might be filled hereafter in a like manner.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had proposed to make the clause apply to the same class of offices to which uncovenanted servants had been before appointed. He could only say the words of the clause had been most carefully considered, and he believed those which were in the Bill were the best that could be found. All that was wanted was to continue the power of making appointments, which up to the present time no one had questioned but the law officers of the Crown.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR thought that if it was intended to do away with the Civil Service of India it should be done openly, and not by a side-wind. The clauses were most imperfectly drawn, and he would suggest that the Bill should be submitted to some able lawyer to put into practical shape.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, an English and an Indian lawyer had been consulted in the preparation of the clause.

Question put, "That those words stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 31: Majority 15.

Clause 2 (Granting power to make like appointments to other offices, the special circumstances being reported in each case to the Secretary of State),

MR. AYRTON proposed to leave out "under the special circumstances of the case," and to substitute "as a special and exceptional case."

SIR CHARLES WOOD thought the alteration unnecessary.

Amendment negatived.

SIR CHARLES WOOD proposed to insert the following words:—

"Except in the departments of Finance and Customs in the Presidency towns, no person shall be so appointed who has not resided for a period of at least seven years in India, and shall not have passed an examination in the vernacular language of the district in which he is to be employed."

MR. VANSITTART thought that an examination in more than one of the Indian languages should be required.

COLONEL SYKES also thought that every candidate should be required to pass an examination in Hindustani as well as in the vernacular of the district.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ADAM moved to add the following words to the Amendment proposed by the Secretary for India, "and in all other local departmental tests which are now or may hereafter be prescribed for covenanted Civil Servants in a like case." He proposed the Amendment, he said, as an act of justice to the covenanted Servants and as an act of security to the public. Any ensign in a marching regiment or any idle young man about town might go out to India, and by reading half an hour a day with a Moonshee might in a few months qualify himself to pass an examination in the Native language, and such an examination was, therefore, no test of his fitness for appointment. On the other hand, the covenanted servants had to pass two very severe examinations, involving not only a knowledge of the languages, but also a knowledge of the duties of the collectorate, of the mode of keeping village accounts, and of revenue and judicial matters generally. It would be manifestly unfair to allow a non-covenanted person to be appointed without examination over the heads of covenanted servants, who had been so severely tested. It was a mere act of justice to the latter that non-covenanted candidates should be subjected to the same tests which they had to undergo.

Amendment proposed, after the word "employed," at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words "and in all other local departmental tests which are now, or may hereafter be, prescribed for covenanted Civil Servants in a like case"

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not be expected to defend the two provisions which in deference to the wish of the House he had agreed to insert in the Bill, although he believed it would be better without them. He admitted that a residence of seven years in India and a knowledge of Hindustani and other languages were not of themselves sufficient tests of fitness for office, and believed that these requirements might interfere with the appointment of very competent persons to certain posts. It was absurd to insist on a knowledge of Hindustani from a non-covenanted person appointed to a situation in the Madras Presidency, where no one spoke that language. It was necessary for a civil servant, who was liable to be sent from one part of the country to another, to possess a much more general knowledge than a man who filled a special office for which he was peculiarly qualified, and it was unreasonable to demand the same qualification from the one as from the other. The Committee must not, however, run away with the notion that because certain qualifications were not specified in the Bill they would not be required. There were many tests imposed on civil servants at present of which no mention was made in any Act of Parliament, and the Government would still have it in their power to require any qualification they deemed necessary, though they were not prescribed in the Bill. The disadvantage of inserting them in the Bill was that it might exclude from office a perfectly competent person because he did not possess qualifications which were really unnecessary. He had already cancelled an appointment made by the Governor General and another made by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, and there was no disposition on the part of the Government to allow offices to be held by improper persons. As a general rule it would be quite right that a non-covenanted candidate should exhibit the same qualifications as a civil servant, but it was essential that the Government should have a discretion in exceptional cases. Therefore he did not think the Amendment of the hon. Member desirable.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER begged to inform the right hon. Gentleman that Hindustani was understood both in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; indeed he had travelled a great deal in India, and he never passed through any district where Hindustani was not spoken.

COLONEL SYKES corroborated the hon. and gallant Member as to Hindustani being generally spoken in India. He held it necessary that the test should be enforced by Act of Parliament.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON deemed it essential that qualification for office should be proved before any appointment was made, as otherwise incompetent persons might slip into the service.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that Colonel Durand had stated that the check which was provided in this Bill would be no protection against jobbery.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE hoped that the right hon. Baronet would consider this Amendment. Why should not persons who were appointed to situations in India be subjected to the same tests as those to which candidates for the covenanted Civil Service were required to submit?

MR. PULLER thought that a residence of seven years in India and a knowledge of the language of the country was a sufficient test.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he did not think that all these important matters ought to be left to the regulation of the Secretary of State in Council. He wished to know whether the hon. Member for Kinross (Mr. Adam) intended that the gentlemen appointed to high offices under this clause should enter into the engagements to produce their private accounts, not to trade, and to avoid anything in the shape of bribery and corruption, which were now required of covenanted servants?

MR. ADAM said, that those engagements would be rendered necessary by a clause which he intended to propose to follow Clause 3 of the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 66: Majority 15.

SIR HARRY VERNEY moved that the following words be added at the end of the clause:—"And he shall pass the same examination as that prescribed for Civil servants in like cases."

SIR CHARLES WOOD thought this question had been already decided. He might mention that, having consulted persons who were well acquainted with the part of India referred to, he found that Hindustani was not the language generally spoken in the Madras Presidency.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, there were districts which were attached sometimes to one province and sometimes to another, and it was idle to suppose that the inhabitants did not speak Hindustani. At Nagpore and Sangur, for instance, all commissariat contracts were entered into in the Hindustani language.

MR. J. B. SMITH thought the wording of the clause, which only required a knowledge of the vernacular was sufficient, but the member of the covenanted Service, who was obliged to possess a more extended knowledge of Indian languages, would, of course, be in a more favourable position.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

MR. ADAM proposed the following clause:—

"Any person who shall have been or shall be appointed to any office, place, or employment under this Act shall be subject to the provisions of any Statute, Rule, or Order, now in force prohibiting the receipt of presents, trading, or other acts by Covenanted Civil Servants."

The object of this clause was to carry out the system first instituted by Lord Clive, since which date our Indian administration had improved and prospered, as was ably shown in the well-known essay of Lord Macaulay.

Clause brought up, and read 1<sup>o</sup>.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that his objection to the clause was that the covenanted servants were prevented accepting presents by regulations and oaths, and not by Act of Parliament. He did not see why it should be inserted in this Bill and made applicable by Acts of Parliament to one set of Servants, when it was not applicable to the other. Bribery was punished by the penal code, and no further provision was necessary.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 74: Majority 17.

On Question that the Preamble do pass,

MR. VANSITTART asked the right hon. Baronet if he did not intend to do anything with reference to the question which they had just divided on? He really did not believe that the House knew what they had been dividing about. It was a positive fact that by this division they had legalized the taking of bribes. The right hon. Baronet had said that it was already provided for by the penal code relative to the uncovenanted Service. But this was not the uncovenanted Service, and it would be quite competent for any person sent out by the right hon. Gentleman to engage in trade, and he wished to know how, in that case, they could prevent the receipt of presents?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, there would be an effectual check put upon the taking of bribes when the appointments were made.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought the clause altogether unnecessary. There was no such check thought necessary with regard to the army, and he did not see why they should make a special provision in this case. When the House was asked to include a general principle against corruption, to refuse it led to an improper inference which they ought not to be exposed to.

MR. WALPOLE said, the clause involved a general principle. The question was whether these servants were to be allowed to do what the covenanted servants were forbidden to do. Was it unreasonable that they should be precluded from receiving presents, trading, and doing other acts which the other civil servants in India were not allowed to do? Upon the former question he voted with the Government, because he thought the matter might be left to the responsible advisers of the Crown. But this clause embodied a principle, and he could not conceive how the Committee could reject it. The rejection of it by possibility implied that the new class of servants might be allowed to do these things. ["No!"] He did not suppose that the Government had such an intention; but when the Committee was asked to include in its legislation a general provision against what was and ought to be considered corruption, the negating that proposition led to an undue and improper inference, to which Parliament ought not to be exposed. For that reason he wished to press upon the consideration of the Government whether there could be any harm whatever in allowing the clause to be introduced.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the House that the question regarding the clause had been disposed of.

Preamble agreed to.

On Question that the Bill as amended be reported,

MR. ADAM stated, that the prohibition of the covenanted Servants was embodied in the 33 Geo. III., c. 52, and, therefore, the Clause he proposed ought to be embodied in this Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE warned the House that they were by this Bill putting in the small end of the wedge that would fructify to an extent which they perhaps little anticipated. They had created an enormous Service which it would be absolutely necessary to keep within strict rules and regulations, otherwise it would disgrace them in India. He hoped the hon. Member for Kinross would bring the question to which he had adverted forward upon the Report.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE hoped, to use the metaphor of this hon. Gentleman, that the small end of the wedge which he had put in would not fructify into a debate at this stage of the Bill. This was the first time he had heard a discussion upon a clause after it had been decided upon by the House.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Constitution of High Courts),

MR. VINCENT SCULLY proposed to limit the Judges in Bengal to a number not exceeding twelve. As the Bill stood the Secretary for India would have an unlimited power of appointing Judges at salaries from £3,000 to £8,000 a year, a state of things which he deprecated.

MR. VANSITTART asked the right

hon. Gentleman in what manner vacancies in the number of the Judges were to be filled up?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the Judges would be appointed by Her Majesty. With respect to the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Cork, he could assure the Committee that there would be no desire on the part of the Government to have more Judges than were necessary. There were at present at Calcutta three of the Superior Court, and ten—five regular and five additional—of the Sudder Court; therefore, he did not wish to limit himself to twelve as he could not now state the precise number which would be necessary. There were at present thirteen; and he would not object to have the limit fifteen, but it did not follow that that number would be appointed.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY was willing to make the limit fifteen, but he must certainly object to an unlimited power of appointment.

Amendment withdrawn; clause amended by the insertion of the word "fifteen" and agreed to.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY objected to the power proposed to be given to the Secretary of State to appoint as many Judges as he might think proper.

MR. VANSITTART wanted to know how the Judges were to be paid and appointed?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the object was to make such arrangements under the Bill as would ensure speedy justice in India. He hoped the Committee would not tie him down to a certain number of Judges until he had seen how the new system worked.

MR. HADFIELD moved to insert the words "or attorneys" after the word "barristers," his object being to give the right hon. Gentleman a wider choice in appointments.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he should be sorry to enter into a discussion on the comparative merits of the two classes of lawyers. He saw no reasons for departing from the qualifications imposed by the present law, and he must, therefore, object to the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. VANSITTART moved an Amendment making it necessary that a barrister shall be of ten years' standing before being eligible for a Judgeship, instead of five, as proposed by the clause. Ten years was the standing required from the members of the covenanted Service, and they passed through a much more severe and complete preparation than barristers.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, to leave out the word "five," and insert the word "ten."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that five years was the present qualification, and, having been found sufficient to secure competent persons for the office, he was not disposed to alter it.

Question put, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 41: Majority 58.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, the effect of the Bill would be to swamp the Courts by the admission of untrained Civil Servants, who ought to be barristers. He would propose that a moiety of the Court should be barristers, and he would, therefore, move to leave out "one-third" and insert "one-half."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the object he had in view was to insure a due proportion both of lawyers and civilians. The Government wanted the legal knowledge of the lawyers with the local knowledge of the Civil Servants. The Bill, therefore, provided that one-third of the Judges should be barristers and one-third Civil Servants, leaving it to the Government to choose the remaining third from either one class or the other, or from Natives or other qualified persons. To insist on one-half of the Judges being barristers would give the lawyers an undue proportion.

MR. J. B. SMITH quoted the opinion of an eminent Sudder Judge to show that a previous knowledge of the principles of law was most desirable as regarded the Judges, and he thought the Motion of his hon. Friend was a very reasonable one.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY denied that he had brought forward this Motion in any legal sense. He submitted it in the public interest.

MR. KINNAIRD supported the Government proposition.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ADAM, in line 16, moved to leave out the words "including the Chief Justice," the effect of which would be to leave the office of Chief Justice open to other than barristers. He contended that it was extremely probable that civilians who had acted as Judges, having to deal with questions of Mahomedan and Hindoo law, might be more qualified to act as supreme Judges than barristers. He trusted this "rag of exclusion" would not be kept up at a time when throwing open these offices was the general principle of legislation.

SIR CHARLES WOOD had endeavoured to constitute the Court as fairly as he could between the two professions. The courts in which justice was administered by English lawyers had given great satisfaction. He thought it essential that the Chief Justice should be a trained lawyer.

Amendment negatived.

MR. J. B. SMITH moved as an Amendment to insert in line 18, after "service," the words "Provided also that hereafter no member of the Civil Service shall be appointed a Judge of such High Court who shall not have previously undergone a legal training." He had known men in India who had never decided a case nominated to the Sudder Bench. Suppose, instead of the eminent lawyer who had just been made Lord Chancellor, the Government had appointed a Commissioner of Inland Revenue or a Receiver of Customs, what would have been said? This class of officers were appointed Judges in India; yet it was not a court of first instance, but a high court of appeal.

Amendment proposed, in line 18, after the word "service," to insert the words "and provided also, that hereafter no member of the Civil Service shall be appointed a Judge of such High Court who shall not have previously undergone a legal training."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the members of the Civil Service had considerable legal training. By the proposed constitution of the Court their knowledge of the country would be combined with the regular legal training of the other Judges.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 120: Majority, 115.

Clause 3 (Existing Judges of Supreme Court, and Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to be the First Judges of the High Court).

MR. VINCENT SCULLY moved the insertion of words in the clause to the effect that any Judge of the Supreme Court at present in office should be allowed to resign at any time with the same retiring pension that he would be entitled to if he had served ten years at the time of the passing of this Bill. The Bill, he said, proposed to impose upon the Judges much more onerous and abhorious duties than they had hitherto been called upon to perform, and they ought, therefore, to have the option of continuing in office, or retiring under the circumstances suggested by his Amendment.

SIR CHARLES WOOD opposed the Amendment. No Judges earned their retiring pensions so easily as the Judges of India. No less than £22,000 a year was at present paid in the shape of retiring pensions to such Judges. The effect of the Amendment, if agreed to, would be to enable any existing Judge, no matter how short his term of service, to retire with a full pension.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY considered the right hon. Gentleman's reply unsatisfactory, and, therefore, said he should divide the Committee upon the point.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Amendment could not be put, inasmuch as its operation would be to impose a charge on revenue which must, in the first instance, be sanctioned by a Committee of the Whole House.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Tenure of Office of High Court),

MR. VINCENT SCULLY moved the insertion of the words "their good behaviour respectively," in lieu of the words, "Her Majesty's pleasure," his object being to make the practice in India correspond with that in this country, where Judges were independent of the Crown, so long as they continued properly to discharge the duties of their office.

SIR CHARLES WOOD opposed the Amendment. It was not desirable to make any more change in the existing system than was absolutely necessary; and the clause as it stood simply went to maintain a system which had hitherto been found to work satisfactorily in India.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Precedence of Judges of High Courts).

MR. AYRTON moved the insertion of words at the end of the clause for the purpose of saving the prerogative of the Crown in regard to fixing the precedence of the Judges.

SIR CHARLES WOOD saw no objection to these words.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY saw great objection to them, and thought them most unconstitutional. There was a see-saw system going on in respect of this Bill between the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who was backing him, and the Secretary of State for India.

Mr. Adam

Amendment agreed to; Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (Salaries, &c., of the Judges of the High Courts).

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked whether the Civil Servants called upon to act in these Courts would receive the same retiring pension as the legal members? At present these Civil Servants were entitled on their retirement to superannuations of £1,000 a year, one-half of which had been contributed by themselves in the shape of deductions from their pay; whereas the legal members of these Courts would receive pensions of £1,200 to £1,600.

SIR CHARLES WOOD believed the Civil Members of the Courts would be entitled to their Civil Service superannuation.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that great injustice would be done to these Civil Servants if they were not put on an equal footing with the legal members of these Courts.

MR. VANSITTART said, this important point ought not to be discussed at that late hour (one o'clock). It was most unfair to reduce the pension of these highly qualified Civil Servants below that of mere barristers of five years' standing.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the Civil Servants had not hitherto been entitled to anything else than their superannuation allowance; but it would be in the power of the Secretary of State in Council to consider their claim to something further.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE thought the Bill would give the Government great power over these Judges, and suggested that words should be introduced into the clause on the Report, limiting the authority of the Secretary of State in Council to make regulations with respect to their emoluments and pensions, so that whatever was done in the matter might apply to the Judges generally, and not to individual cases only.

SIR CHARLES WOOD promised to adopt the suggestion.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion negatived. Clause agreed to.

MR. HENNESSY inquired whether, as this Bill seriously affected the bar of India, it had been when drawn submitted to the present Lord Chancellor, who was then first law officer of the Crown?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said it was not.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

House in Committee; Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

£250,000 on account Packet Service.

MR. PEELE hoped the Committee would consent to vote £250,000 on account of payments to the contractors for the conveyance of mails by sea. These payments were payable quarterly, and at the end of this month the different Companies under contract would send in their claims. The only available source from which they could be paid was a Vote taken in the course of the year, and this was the last night on which the Vote could be granted, if granted at all.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

MR. LYGON complained that they were about to sanction the expenditure of a million and a half of money for building these concentrated Law Courts without having as yet decided on the site. The Commissioners had taken only evidence respecting one scheme, that of the Incorporated Law Society, while there were two other plans suggested. One was to provide for all the Equity Courts in Lincoln's Inn, and the other to concentrate all the Law Courts in Lincoln's Inn Fields, the trustees of which were willing to expend the whole amount received for the site in carrying out metropolitan improvements. He, therefore, moved that the order for the third reading be discharged, and that the Bill be recommitted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Order for Third Reading be discharged,"—instead thereof.

MR. COWPER said, that the subject had undergone more consideration than the hon. Gentleman supposed. There had been a Committee in 1842, and another

In 1845. Sir Charles Barry was at first in favour of the Lincoln's Inn Fields scheme, but subsequently gave evidence in favour of that now proposed by this Bill. The object was to concentrate all the law courts upon one spot, or in immediate contiguity, and in that respect the Lincoln's Inn Fields plan would be insufficient. The freeholders of Lincoln's Inn Fields proposed to give 3 acres or  $3\frac{1}{2}$  acres for that purpose, while the area in this Bill was 7 acres. He must press the Bill now, because, having to pass the Standing Orders of the House of Lords for a private Bill, postponement would be equivalent to rejection. The House could not be committed to the scheme by assenting to this Bill, because another Bill, the Courts of Justice Money Bill, contained the operative clauses, and he would take care that there should be ample time for discussion before that Bill passed.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND thought that the site in Lincoln's Inn was preferable to the one proposed in the Bill, and would give five acres. He was afraid that the scheme favoured by the Government would involve an expenditure of at least £2,000,000.

MR. SELWYN said, the Government were pressing the Bill forward in a manner calculated to stifle all discussion. If the House were hastily to pass the Bill they would prevent the adoption, even the consideration, of a speedy, easy, and inexpensive plan for the accommodation of the Courts of Equity. In 1859 the Society of Lincoln's Inn offered to provide from their own funds, upon their own land, sufficient accommodation for the Courts of Equity, in return for which all they asked was 4 per cent upon the money actually expended by them, the sum so paid to them not to exceed, under any circumstances, £4,000 a year. The plans had been prepared and approved by all the Equity Judges, and they would have been carried out long ago but for this gigantic and visionary scheme of the Government, which would cost at least £2,000,000. He maintained, moreover, that the Suitors' Fund should be applied to other purposes than those of building courts of common law. The present Lord Chancellor was of the same opinion; and there could be no doubt, in fact, that the scheme of the Government virtually amounted to a confiscation of the Suitors' Fund. If the Bill were recommitted, he should propose the adoption of the plan submitted by the Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1859, and, therefore, he hoped the House would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that if the Government were to give the House an assurance that the question of site would be reconsidered, he should advise his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON believed it was the general opinion of the legal profession that it would be an enormous advantage to the public if the plan now proposed were carried out. There were insurmountable objections to building the Courts in Lincoln's Inn Fields. If the Courts were erected there they would occupy a vacant space in a part of the town where a vacant space was much needed. He doubted, moreover, whether Lincoln's Inn Fields would be large enough for the purpose. The loss of time and of money arising from the present scattered position of the Courts was well known, and he really hoped the House would not object to the passing of this Bill. If the Money Bill, which was the Bill that would determine the matter, should not pass, the whole scheme must fall to the ground; but the present Bill was necessary in order to enable the Government to carry out the arrangements provided by the other measure. The money was to come out of the Suitors' Fund, and it was only a contingent liability to the public—a liability, moreover, which he hoped would never be practically felt.

MR. LYGON said, that if the money Bill were referred to a Select Committee, with an Instruction to consider the question of site, he should have no objection to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. COWPER stated that a Select Committee had already agreed upon a site. He did not know whether the Money Bill was so drawn that the question of site would properly come within the order of reference; but, for his own part, he should have no objection to the reconsideration of that matter.

MR. LYGON said, there might be a special preference, and upon that understanding he begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3<sup>o</sup>, and passed.
